VOTERS TO PRODUCE PRESCRIBED DOCUMENTS

Mr. Scott: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 12, leave out 'prescribed' and insert 'specified'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 2 to 7.

Mr. Scott: In Committee on 28 November, I undertook, in reply to an amendment moved by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), to bring forward on Report a group of amendments to incorporate in the body of the Bill the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman's amendment, setting out the list of documents from which a voter will be required to produce one to obtain a ballot paper from a presiding officer or clerk.

The amendments seek to fulfil that undertaking, and I will explain why the Government believe that the list should consist of the documents set out in amendment No. 5.

We have looked closely at the reservations expressed in the House by a number of right hon. and hon. Members about the documents included in the list. I accept, as I must, the criticism of the right hon. Member for South Down that there is no document in the list which every person must by law have in his possession; there is no such document in the United Kingdom. I accept that each of the documents listed is not wholly satisfactory for the purpose of relating the person producing the document to the person described in the electoral register.

We have made it clear to the House from the outset that any list cannot be foolproof, but, bearing in mind the criteria that the documents should all be official documents issued by the Government or Government agencies, and that the list should not be drawn so tightly that any group of qualified electors is effectively disfranchised, or so widely that it would be simple for large numbers of documents to be obtained easily or be easily forged, I remain of the view that at least until we have the benefit of practical experience, the list of documents specified in the amendment is right. If any difficulties subsequently arise in connection with any particular document, the new paragraph of rule 37 will permit the list to be varied as appropriate.

In Committee, the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) said that the medical card alone could suffice as the specified document, because it is the only document on the list to which every elector is entitled and which can be obtained free of charge. I considered that idea carefully, because it has some attractions, but the essence of the Government's approach is that there should be the option to produce one of a range of documents, to make it easier for legitimate electors to have one of the documents easily available for production to the clerk or presiding officer.

Furthermore, if only one document were specified the opportunity would be removed for a voter to produce and for the presiding officer to consider another specified document in those cases where the first document produced a reasonable doubt in the mind of the presiding officer that the voter was the person on the electoral roll who he claimed to be.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) has made a particular point about the inclusion of a certified copy or extract of an entry of marriage. In view of the concern that he has expressed I should explain why we have nevertheless decided to include it in the form now before the House.

The document has been included to provide for the case of a woman who has registered in her maiden name and who subsequently married and, as a result of her marriage, no longer possesses any of the other specified documents in her maiden name. The provision has been drafted so that it includes women who might marry at any time during the period of registration—July to mid-September—and so that it continues to apply until the latest possible date in the life of the register bearing the woman's maiden name. The hon. Member for Upper Bann raised that point. That date will be 15 February in the year two years on from the year of the compilation of the register. That is why th provision applies to women married within two years ending with the day of the poll concerned.

The amendment incorporates in the Bill an amendable list of specified documents as a result of an undertaking that I gave. We have sought to keep the balance between disfranchising genuine electors and yet inhibiting and deterring those who would corrupt the electoral process. We have listened carefully to the views and concerns expressed by right hon. and hon. Members and have taken them into account in drafting the amendment. I urge the House to accept it.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: The Bill will certainly leave the House the better for the insertion in it of the crucial documents in proper terms instead of by a sidelong reference, as was the original form of the Bill, to documents that would be prescribed in regulations which the House had not yet seen. Certainly the necessity of throwing into proper legislative form the documents referred to in the notes on clauses which were available to hon. Members has resulted in a considerable tightening and improvement of the definitions.

I welcome the fact that the visitor's passport appears to have disappeared, having made a fleeting apparition in the notes on clauses. There is also undoubtedly an improvement, to which the Minister has just referred, in the opportunity for a married woman validly to produce as a specified document her marriage certificate. That reminds me that the description of the certificate is, at any rate, more comprehensive and accurate than it was in the form in which we were previously considering it.

However, two points in the clause as drawn may raise a query. Perhaps the Minister will be able to refer to them when he intervenes. Paragraph (a) deals with the driving licence. In the case of a Great Britain driving licence, the provisional licence appears to be excluded. Perhaps, by some other means, the provisional licence is excluded in the case of the Northern Ireland driving licence. But that does not appear on the face of the amendment. Will the Minister confirm that the provisional driving licence is also excluded, as it should be, in the case of the Northern Ireland driving licence?

I should be grateful too if the Minister will refer to the last words of his amendment:

That appears to be an ambiguous phrase. It might appear to mean varying the description given in this amendment of the identical document. That is, it would be the same document but differently described from the way in which it is described here. That seems a rather curious provision to make. One would have supposed that we would ensure that we had the definition right in inserting the documents in the Bill as we are doing now. On the other hand, if it means varying the description of documents that can be used for this purpose, that point is surely covered already by the words "adding or deleting documents". I hope that when the Minister replies he may be able to clear up those two minor points of explanation.

The Bill, however, is certainly more satisfactory for carrying upon the face of it, for those who will use it and interpret it, the documents that for the present are to be those the production of at least one of which is to be a condition of exercising the franchise in Northern Ireland.

I welcome the two concessions that the Government have made within the scope of the amendment. I hope that I may take the opportunity to refer to the patience with which the Minister has, throughout the proceedings on the Bill, listened to the arguments that have been put. Even if that patience sometimes appeared to be linked with obduracy, nevertheless it was a patience that the Committee and the House appreciated.

Mr. Scott: I should like to deal with the three points raised by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). First, contrary to what the right hon. Gentleman seemed to understand, the amendment includes a United Kingdom visitor's passport. Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman raised the question of the driving licence and the exclusion of the Northern Ireland provisional licence from the amendment. It is excluded because under article 12 of the Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 only full licences can be issued. The need to include a power to vary the description of documents is very much a longstop provision. It was included in case the law under which the document was issued were to be amended, in which case the description might have to be altered.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 2, in page 1, line 14, leave out 'prescribed' and insert 'specified'.

No. 3, in page 1, line 20, leave out 'prescribed' and insert 'specified'.

No. 4, in page 2, line 1, leave out 'prescribed' and insert 'specified'.—[Mr. Scott.]

Amendment proposed: No. 5, in page 2, line 5, at end insert—

'(1DA) For the purposes of this rule a specified document is one which for the time being falls within the following list:—

(a) a current licence to drive a motor vehicle granted under Part III of the Road Traffic Act 1972 (excluding a provisional licence), or under Article 12 of the Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 or any corresponding enactment for the time being in force;

(b) a current passport issued by the Government of the United Kingdom or by the Government of the Republic of Ireland;

(c) a current book for the payment of allowances, benefits or pensions issued by the Department of Health and Social Services for Northern Ireland;

(d) a medical card issued by the Northern Ireland Central Services Agency for the Health and Social Services;

(e) a certified copy, or extract, of an entry of marriage issued by a Registrar General, where the voter producing the copy or extract is a woman married within the period of two years ending with the day of the poll concerned.

In sub-paragraph (e) above "a Registrar General" means the Registrar General for England and Wales, the Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland or the Registrar General for Northern Ireland.

(1DB) Regulations may make provision varying the list in paragraph (1DA) above (whether by adding or deleting documents or varying any description of document).'.—[Mr. Scott.]

OFFENCES RELATING TO PRESCRIBED DOCUMENTS

Amendments made: No. 6, in page 4, line 2 leave out 'document prescribed for the purposes of rules 37 to 40', and insert 'specified document within the meaning of rule 37'.

No. 7, in page 4, line 6 leave out from 'a' to 'that' in line 8 and insert 'specified document within the meaning of that rule which either falsely bears the name of the person in possession or does not bear'.—[Mr. Scott.]

12.23 am

Mr. Scott: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Over recent weeks, a considerable amount of parliamentary time has been devoted to this important Bill. I welcome that, because it seeks to deal with a significant problem in Northern Ireland. During our debates, the House and the Committee have been united in support of the aims that underline the Bill. I believe that it is widely accepted both in the House and in Northern Ireland that in recent years personation has become a substantially greater problem. The objective of the Bill and of the Government is to protect the right to vote by diminishing as far as possible the opportunities for personation at elections in Northern Ireland.

I do not think that there is any dispute about the desirability of that aim. Experience in recent elections—and I have the general election in June 1983 especially in mind—has demonstrated that the existing legislation is inadequate to deal with the scale of the problem as it now confronts us. That legislation was never designed to withstand the pressures to which it is now subjected.

One of the fundamental principles in our electoral system in the United Kingdom to which the Government attach considerable weight is that it should be as easy as possible for the legitimate elector to cast his vote. That principle is continued in the Bill. In the debates on the Bill, a number of hon. Members, particularly the hon. Members for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) and for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley), have drawn attention consistently to this important requirement. We want to encourage the legitimate voter and to discourage the vote stealer. The legitimate voter, no less that the democratic process as a whole, is entitled to protection from those bent on abuse.

A good deal of time in Committee was devoted to the presiding officers' discretion. I understand and listened carefully to the case for giving wide discretion and not making the production of documents mandatory. This is a matter of judgment, but, having considered it again, I am firmly of the view that it would be the wrong course. No system that we introduce will be perfect, but there is a much greater chance of uniformity of practice if presiding officers are given minimum discretion in this sensitive area. Although I accept that in many parts of Northern Ireland electoral abuse may not be a serious problem, I do not believe that the electorate as a whole could have confidence in a system which conferred wide discretion on presiding officers.

The House will not want me to go over the ground that we have just covered on Report about the list of the documents which may be produced to obtain a ballot paper. But the House will wish to be reminded that the Government are determined to see the widest possible publicity given in the run–up to the elections in May next year to encourage electors to understand that they will have to produce one of these documents to be able to vote. The documents will, as I undertook at an earlier stage, be clearly listed on the poll card for these elections. I appeal to and urge the political parties to do all that they can to tell their supporters about the new arrangements.

Mr. William Ross: Will there be time between the issuing of poll cards and the election for an elector to get a medical card if he does not have one?

Mr. Scott: I cannot give that precise undertaking, but, once the publicity has started, it will be possible for anyone who needs a medical card to get it in good time for the May elections. I have to consider the date upon which it is proposed to issue the poll cards to establish whether it will be possible to do that within the time.

The political parties and the chief electoral officer and his staff jealously guard their independence, and rightly, at election time. But I hope that it will be possible, in coming up to these elections, for the Government, the chief electoral officer and the political parties all to work together to make this attempt to tackle personation in Northern Ireland as effective as possible.

At this stage, perhaps I might pay tribute to the chief electoral officer and his staff. We should not underestimate their difficult and testing job in Northern Ireland.

I draw attention to the importance of clause 3, which gives the police the powers that they need to apprehend those seeking to frustrate the key provisions of clause 1. We have sought to strike a balance between giving the police sufficient powers to be effective while keeping those powers in the sensitive and potentially controversial area of elections to the minimum.

As the House has noted, clauses 1 and 3 need to be read together. In my view, the whole is greater than the sum of the parts.

I am grateful for the constructive way in which the House and the Committee have tackled this difficult subject. I understand the concern that has been expressed by Northern Ireland Members and others as I understood the reasons which lay behind the amendments which we debated in Committee. I assure the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that in showing patience and listening carefully there was a genuine effort to determine whether the new ideas which came forward could be incorporated into the Bill to improve it. Ihope that by accepting one of his amendments and introducing a Government amendment on Report in response to that, we have demonstrated that the Government have had an open mind and have treated the arguments on their merits. Having listened to the arguments advanced in debate, the Government remain of the view that, given Northern Ireland circumstances, the approach taken in the Bill is right. Accordingly, I commend it to the House.

Mr. Molyneaux: I confirm what the Minister has said about common ground between us on the Bill's objectives and aims. From the earliest stage of the consultations in July 1982, we made plain our views on the issue when we said to the former Secretary of State that our general approach was a wish to see electoral law preserved and enforced but with the minimum divergence of the law in Ulster from that in the rest of the United Kingdom. It would therefore be inaccurate to suggest that the Ulster Unionist party has at any time pressed for correction at all costs and at any price. In fairness, I do not think that the Minister has suggested that.

We agreed that the electoral law should be observed and enforced, and we stressed that there should be the minimum divergence of the law in Northern Ireland from that in the rest of the United Kingdom. Over the years we have been consistent in our demand both for uniformity in the making of laws and in their enforcement. For example, before the first elections for the European Assembly in 1979, we asserted that the method of voting should be the same throughout the United Kingdom. We were supported on that occasion by the then Conservative Opposition, who are now in government, when a Division took place. Unfortunately, they have slipped out of the undertaking to ensure uniformity of voting systems for the 1984 European Assembly elections.

I suspect that the Government—the Prime Minister has said that they are rock firm for the Union—do not have their heart in the Bill. However it is dressed up, it imposes a real handicap on Northern Ireland electors. The divergences and variations might be tolerable if the measures in the Bill as it stands were likely to achieve the purpose that the Government had in mind when they set out on this journey. In the view of my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself, they will not be effective. They will fail and they will tend to penalise, for the first time this century, those who wish to influence through the ballot box, and only through the ballot box, the attitudes and policies of Parliament and the Government who result from any general election or, in the next local government elections, influence the choice of the men and women who in councils are closer to the electors than any other tier of elected representatives.

In recent weeks we have sought to improve the Bill. I have on other occasions paid tribute to the Minister and the Department for his and its willingness to discuss further and more significant changes. We have agreed some improvements but, from the start, we realised that the defects were so fundamental that, short of returning to the drawing board or the drafting table, it would be impossible to produce a measure which could deal effectively with the problem of vote stealing in certain constituencies.

If there had been more time to consider what was proposed between the point at which the former Secretary of State appeared to give up the struggle and the sudden appearance of the Bill, we could together have produced a workable measure. I regret as much as the Minister the fact we were unable to reach a wider measure of agreement. However, I think that he will accept and understand that the points of difference between us are so great that it makes it impossible for us to do otherwise than oppose the Bill on Third Reading.

Mr. Bell: The Official Opposition accept that personation happens in Northern Ireland. That was conceded by all sides and it was right for the Government to introduce the legislation. It was also right to seek to balance the right to vote, but it is not always possible to please every party.

The Government sought to improve the Bill in Committee. They have listened carefully to the arguments. No Bill is perfect and perhaps this Bill will be reviewed, as suggested tonight. The Bill attempts to eliminate personation in Northern Ireland. It is a step forward. We shall see at the district elections in May whether it is effective. We shall support the Government on the Bill.

Mr. William Ross: On more than one occasion the Minister has talked about sailing uncharted waters. He appears to have forgotten that, although the waters are uncharted to him and his officials, they are not to those of us who live in Northern Ireland. If we have not charted the exact waters, we have charted the adjacent waters in detail for many years. We have a fair idea of what the final charts will show. For that reason, we have been unremitting in our opposition to the measure.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), who spoke so briefly for the Opposition, said that we cannot expect to please every party. The Bill may please the Conservatives and others in Great Britain, but who does it please in Northern Ireland—that part of the United Kingdom which alone is affected by the Bill? It does not please the Unionists; it does not please the DU party, and I do not know whether it pleases the SDLP. We have not heard sufficient from them to know. No comment has been made by Sinn Fein, which in itself tells a story. Its members do not care two hoots about legislation passed here. They will attempt to carry on in their own merry way.

It is one thing if legislation does not please everyone, but when it displeases all responsible political opinion in the area affected, that is another matter. Hon. Members should reflect upon that.

The Bill's real objective is to cut Sinn Fein down to size —its real size—and to ensure that it is always defeated by the SDLP. If that is the intention the Bill is rubbish. In a Catholic area SDLP almost always defeats Sinn Fein. It would be wise for hon. Members to remember that after the last general election a Sinn Fein candidate was returned to this House. About one-third of the votes cast for anti-partition parties went to Sinn Fein. Only by a split vote in West Belfast did a Sinn Fein member win.

The objective of driving down the Sinn Fein vote is unnecessary and it is unlikely to succeed, because the real Sinn Fein vote is larger than some of us, especially on this side of the Irish sea, wish to admit.

The real objective should be to expose and isolate the extremists in Northern Ireland and to show the true face of Sinn Fein by having effective legislation. That objective requires us to do two things—first, to show Sinn Fein in its true colours, and, once that happens, the second objective of showing the true size of Sinn Fein will follow naturally. We would be gravely in error if we thought that the mass of the Northern Ireland people believe that terrorism has anything to offer them. If we get Sinn Fein down to its true size and get it to show its true face so that it can no longer hide in the mass of the people, more people will turn against Sinn Fein.

The Government clearly wish to reveal the true size of Sinn Fein, but their aim will be thwarted so long as there is legislation such as this and so long as they continue to use two differing electoral systems in Northern Ireland and, above all, so long as they continue to use the proportional representation—STV system. That system was brought into operation in Northern Ireland to help the so-called moderates such as the Alliance party, but the system helps not just one group but all groups to turn their minority vote into a quota. If that were not the case, Sinn Fein would not win elections, and the sooner the House and the Government face that reality, the better it will be. Once they face that reality, they will start to proceed down the road they should have taken long ago.

One can plainly see that this Chamber was not designed with fudged politics in mind. It is not designed with cross benches. It is designed to force people to make a decision —to face each other and argue out a case on the Floor of the House—whether angrily or calmly depends on the issue of the time or the time itself. This country's politics are built purely and simply on forcing people to decide on which side of the divide they stand.

I have seen many Northern Ireland politicians try to sit on the fence. Sometimes, when they sat down on that fence, they found that it was a great wide hedge. It was not long before the hedge was trampled down, and those politicians found that at its centre, there was a narrow, vicious strip of barbed wire. Usually, when one tries to sit in the middle, the people catch up with one. It is not pleasant whenever the electorate catches up with politicians.

Whenever we force people to make a real decision, we shall be moving in the right direction. We shall not do that so long as we allow them to fudge the issue in Northern Ireland by using the STV system or, for that matter, any other proportional representation system of election. Under such system, all groups and sub-groups can find a party that represents their own narrow view. That is not, in the long run, a recipe for calm consideration of the aspects that divide us. It is a recipe for bedlam, as the more, extreme elements always try, and often succeed, to drive out the less extreme.

If the Government really want to resolve the problem of Sinn Fein and to defeat Sinn Fein, they should go for the simple majority system that brought us all to this House, because, in the long run, that system gives more stability and sense to the elected body than the proportional representation system can ever do. The extremists in Ulster upon which the Sinn Fein——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I remind the hon. Member that he must deal with what is in the Bill.

Mr. Ross: As before, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have to point out that the Bill will be extended by order to be applied to proportional representation elections at two levels in Northern Ireland — at local level and at Assembly level. Therefore, what we say about proportional representation — [Interruption.] And, of course, to the European election. I was forgetting about that. I dislike the European election so much that I rarely give it any consideration. [Interruption.] I was not standing in that election, as the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) knows.

The House should keep very clearly in mind that this Bill does not apply only to elections to this House; it applies to other elections in Northern Ireland. It should be noted that under the simple majority system, Sinn Fein and other extremist parties have invariably done badly in Northern Ireland.

There have been many references in the debate to the number of votes cast for Sinn Fein with figures ranging from 70,000 to 120,000. If that is translated into the outcome in a PR election, whatever percentage that is of the total vote should be reflected more or less in the seats gained. The local government wards have an effect on that, as do the electoral areas. It was very interesting, whenever we went to the commissioner, at "the inquiry" into ward groupings in Magherafelt, to find that he had made it clear that, if he had known that he was to do the grouping of wards, he would have thought again. He said that the five-to-seven-wards rule in the electoral order in 1983 put him in a straitjacket. If the Minister was getting the same sort of advice on this Bill as he had in relation to the ward groupings—it probably came from the same quarter so he probably was—I can understand now why Sir Frank Harrison said what he did.

It does not take a substantial minority to get elected under PR; it takes one eighth of the electorate. We shall be back with this sort of legislation for wider areas of the United Kingdom if anything that has been said by English Members in the debate has any relevance to what is happening in this part of the United Kingdom. I view with very grave suspicion a turnout of 96 per cent. I have seen a turnout of 96 per cent. and 97 per cent. occasionally, but it should be realised that it does not happen very often. It can happen only in very favourable circumstances.

The circumstances are: good organisation, probably a small rural community, popular candidates, fear of the opposition, and a new electoral register. If any one of those items is missing, it is very difficult to get over 90 per cent., let alone 95 per cent. or 96 per cent.

It should be remembered that in March the register will be six months of age, because it is compiled with the date of 15 September in mind. At the end of its life it will be 18 months old. By that time at least 15 or 16 out of every 1,000 of the electorate will have died, and possibly over 20. That means that at an October election the register will be wildly out of date with very considerable variations from the original. It should be impossible to get 90 per cent. except under the most favourable conditions and the smallest populations.

The Government have fudged the issue, as they have fudged so many things in Northern Ireland. They are refusing to grasp the nettle and to provide proper means of identification and a proper system of election in Northen Ireland. Until they grasp the nettle and act upon it, we shall continue to have the sort of problem that we have been trying to deal with in the Bill, and which the Bill, despite the Minister's good hopes, will fail to meet.

Mr. Peter Robinson: I shall at once gain the support of the House when I say that I do not intend to speak at any length or to pad out my remarks.

The House is at least united on one thing — that personation is wrong, that it is cheating and stealing and that action must be taken. The House appears not to agree, however, on the best method of dealing with the problem.

In my view, the Government have shown a lack of resolve, first, in the fact that the Bill was introduced to assist the SDLP. Let there be no doubt about that. It was introduced to help the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and his party in the battle for the nationalist vote against Sinn Fein. The Minister should know that the best and perhaps the only way for the SDLP to ensure that it keeps its nose ahead of Sinn Fein is properly to enter the democratic process and to take part in democratic politics in Northern Ireland. It will otherwise be seen as a faint, similar product to Sinn Fein and when that product is on sale in Northern Ireland the voters will go for the original product and the SDLP will be left on the shelf.

Instead of telling the hon. Member for Foyle to stand on his own two feet and take on Sinn Fein, the Minister decided that he would have to do something for him. The Bill is the product of that thought. If the Minister had thought further, he would have realised that the best and most effective action would have been to proscribe Sinn Fein, but he turns away from that and allows the front men for the IRA gunmen to entertain the democratic process and to abuse democracy in Northern Ireland. They are an integral part of the Provisional IRA movement and as much a part of that movement as any IRA commanding officer. Members who care to go to the Library will find a book entitled "Beating the Terrorists?"——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman and the House that the Bill is about preventing personation in elections in Northern Ireland. We must not have such a wide debate.

Rev. Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister has made it clear throughout the debates on the Bill that the aim of this measure is to deal with Sinn Fein. That is why the Bill was sponsored in the House. Surely in this final stage of the proceedings it is in order for an hon. Member to state his view of that proposition and to comment on what the Minister has said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have had many debates—on Second Reading, on amendments, on new clauses, and so on. The Third Reading debate is concerned with what is in the Bill and my job is to preserve the proper procpedings of the House.

Mr. Robinson: I of course accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I merely point out that the purpose of the Bill is to make more difficult the task of those who would personate, and those whom the Minister recognises as most likely to do that are members of Sinn Fein, who are under the IRA command structure. The best way to achieve that aim is to proscribe them and to put them where they need to be—outside the democratic process —rather than allowing them to abuse it.

The second way in which the Minister showed his lack of resolve was in relation to the only real solution to the identification problem—purpose-made ID cards. He did not want to go down that road, because he thought that there might be an ulterior motive on the part of those proposing it. He told the House that some people might not want to go and have their ID cards prepared. Those people, of course, are the very people whom the Minister wishes to prevent from personating. But he prefers yet again to run away from the only effective way of dealing with the matter and to propose an unpalatable mish-mash of forms of identification which have little in common with one another and none of which has all the points required—photograph, name, address and, in our view, signature. The prescribed documents are thus a second-rate alternative.

The Minister again turns his back on the mayhem that will undoubtedly occur on 15 May and on subsequent election days when his plan is put into operation. He has thought little about the danger in which he places presiding officers. Ordinary decent voters will bring them prescribed documents, but what will Sinn Fein bring to the ballot box?

In the past, presiding officers were aware that Sinn Fein members were personating, but were afraid to take the necessary action. It will be the same on 15 May when Sinn Fein members again demand other people's votes at the polling station. What will the presiding officer do? The Bill shows what he should do. It is easy for us to put into legislation what he should do, but he must live among those who are personating, and he and his family will be in danger.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that the presiding officer must do that whether there is a list of identification documents or not?

Mr. Robinson: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman intervened to make my point. The Bill has little value if the presiding officer is in fear, as he was before. It does not do anything about that. If he denies people a vote, mayhem will result. I hope that the Minister will join me in my constituency on 15 May to see the reaction of those who are denied a vote.

The Bill makes it no harder for Sinn Fein members to personate. It makes the task of the presiding officers more difficult because the necessary administrative measures will cause delays before votes can be cast. It makes the party workers' task more difficult because they must convey the Bill's requirements to the electorate and probably run people to the polling station twice because they will forget the prescribed documents. It makes the voters' task more difficult, and will probably confuse him. The candidate will probably come off worst, not only because fewer votes will be cast in the face of the confusion that will arise, but because he will be blamed for this, not the Minister, who will not be at the polling station to see the results.

In conclusion, the Bill is a dog's breakfast. The Minister may have taken some of the ingredients out and put others in, but it is still a dog's breakfast.

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): I rise for the first time to speak about the Bill, and so I am one of the few who can say that whatever I say, will not have been heard before. I was happy to leave the Bill in the hands of my right hon. and hon. Friends, but when I listened to the Minister I felt that I should intervene.

This is a poor and bad Bill. It will cause many and immense problems in the future, such as those outlined by the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson). In parts of my constituency there has always been personation. Personation has always existed and will continue to exist, despite the Bill. Those who want votes will continue to get them by threats, intimidation or whatever means will achieve them. The Bill places presiding officers in a more difficult position than ever before.

I am worried about the parts of the Bill which relate to presiding officers. More than half of my constituency does not have the problem of personation, but it has been tarred with the same brush by the Minister.

The Minister has referred to Northern Ireland as a whole as being involved in personation, but only small parts of constituencies—it is not every constituency—have that problem. I find that intolerable, unacceptable and most aggravating.

There are many thousands of electors who never have and never will abuse their right to vote. I am worried that there are some who will be disfranchised by the Government's action.

For many, the act of voting can be an ordeal. It is something they are not enthusiastic about. The documents that the Government are asking voters to produce will dissuade some from even going to the polling station. The Government may be doing harm by introducing the Bill. I hope that I may be proved wrong but I doubt it.

I have as much experience at grass roots level as any hon. Member. I have good grounds for believing that I have more experience than those involved in drawing up the Bill and bringing it to this stage.

I have sat in a polling station as a personation agent and I have acted as a sub-agent. I believe that the Bill will cause more problems for those involved in elections in Northern Ireland before polling day, on polling day and after polling day when people realise the effect of the Bill.

The Bill does not strike the right balance. The Government have panicked; the Bill is a panic measure and one that the Minister will live to regret.

1.2 am

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I shall refer in a few sentences to what is in the Bill, because it contains two grave elements. First, it makes a fundamental alteration in the franchise by attaching a new condition—hitherto non existent—to the right to exercise the vote. Secondly, it changes the franchise in one part only of the United Kingdom thus introducing a differentiation between the right to vote for membership, for instance, of this House between one part of the United Kingdom and the remainder.

My hon. Friends and I, and, indeed, virtually all who represent constituencies in Northern Ireland, are bound to resist the measure because on both counts it fails to meet the requirements.

The new condition which is attached to voting is a condition which cannot, by its very nature—the debates on the Bill have shown this—achieve the intended object.

The documentation will be inadequate to ensure that personation does not occur, so that the purpose behind the innovation in the franchise will not be reached by the Bill.

The circumstances in Northern Ireland are not to that degree unique, nor is the consequence of those circumstances to the electoral outcome in Northern Ireland so grave as to justify the extreme gravity of the step of legislating differentially on this crucial matter of the franchise for Northern Ireland as against the rest of the United Kingdom.

Those who represent Northern Ireland seats would be failing in their duty if they did not oppose this measure at this last stage.

Rev. Ian Paisley: At this early hour of the morning I know that many hon. Members wish to get away, but the people of Northern Ireland and the candidates at local government elections, Assembly elections, elections to this House and EEC elections will have to live with the Bill. It is all very well for Members of this House to say that the Bill ought to be given a trial. We have said that the Bill ought to be given a trial for three years and that after three years it ought to be looked at again. But we have been told that the Bill must become law. Reasonable propositions have been ruled out. Ministers have said to me that the purpose of the Bill is to deal with the IRA threat and that the SDLP want the Bill.

Mr. Hume: I hope that the Minister will confirm that the request for the Bill did not come from the SDLP. The first request came from the former Secretary of State. He wrote to all parties in Northern Ireland and asked them to come and discuss the problems relating to vote stealing in Northern Ireland. On that occasion the SDLP opposed the introduction of such a measure as this. After subsequent elections, it became clear that the evils were so widespread that we ought to acquiesce. I have put before the House the only proposal which I believe is foolproof against vote-stealing in Northern Ireland. It relates to the moment of registration of voting. I said on Second Reading that the proposal was not perfect, but it is the only one which is before us now.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am very pleased that the House now knows that the SDLP do not want the Bill. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will express that view by the way he votes tonight.

Mr. Hume: That is not what I said. I shall acquiesce.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The hon. Gentleman says that he is going to acquiesce. Why acquiesce when the hon. Gentleman know that the Bill will not fulfil its task? In the past, this House has tried by legislation to prevent various aspects of Irish nationalism and republicanism and has failed utterly. Sinn Fein will not be defeated by the Bill, even when it becomes an Act. Anybody who believes that Sinn Fein will be defeated by the Bill ought to have his head examined. Everybody knows that those who intend to personate will steal as many votes as they can at the next election. If there is an increase in the Sinn Fein vote after the Bill becomes law, this House will be a laughing stock. Nobody will laugh more heartily at this House than Sinn Fein and the IRA. Therefore, the House needs to look very carefully at this legislation.

I am amazed by the Minister's explanation of the registrar's certificate. The registrar's certificate is copied from the certificate issued by the minister. His certificate is no good, but a copy will be accepted. I cannot understand why. Nor can any minister in Northern Ireland, whether he be priest or clergyman. I do not understand the Government's reasoning. The Government believe that their original proposals must be adhered to as though they were the laws of the Medes and the Persians. I am pleased that the Minister has accepted the proposal that the poll card should carry upon it a list of these documents. I am waiting to hear whether we shall have time during the elections in Northern Ireland to carry out the provisions contained in the Bill. I trust that we shall be told tonight that we shall have at least as much time at local elections as is provided on this side of the water.

Mr. Scott: The Order in Council that will extend the provisions of the Bill to local government elections will take account of the point that the hon. Gentleman and others have made about the length of polling hours. The draft order will be made available to the political parties for consultation before it is laid before Parliament.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I welcome that assurance, because it is essential that the people of Northern Ireland have time to produce the documents and time to cast their votes. The Minister's intervention encourages me. I know what happens on election day, and I know that time is needed. I agree that something should be done, and the proposition of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) was a good one, but it has been ruled out. The Bill includes a list of prescribed documents but does not include a document that would be produced by the presiding officer and confirmed by the voter. It is a pity that more thought was not given to the idea of the hon. Member for Foyle. The Minister told me that it would be impossible to have such a system in operation by May. That may be so, but why could we not introduce it after May?

It would be better for us not to rush through this legislation. That is why my hon. Friends and I will vote against it.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

PETITION

Human Embryos

1.22 am

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): I have the honour to present a petition for the protection of the human embryo, signed by some 1,295 residents of my constituency. They state

Wherefore Your Petitoners Pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

I support the petition, and beg leave to present it to the House.

To lie upon the Table.

Law of the Sea Convention

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mather.]

1.23 am

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): While I am delighted to have the opportunity to raise a matter of great and growing international importance, the House this morning has to face the reality that the Cabinet almost certainly decided yesterday that Britain should not sign the law of the sea convention. The convention has been open for signature for two years. The period comes to an end on Sunday. So far, some 143 Governments have signed out of a potential 162.

I believe that the decision that the Cabinet had to make was a major one, and that the Cabinet made the wrong decision. It was a negative, shoddy and shameful decision, and fell well below the level of events.

Britain's self-interest as a great seafaring country happily coincides with our international responsibilities and obligations. It is a matter of great international importance. Seventy per cent. of the surface of the globe is covered by the sea, and the international negotiations in which Britain proudly and rightly played a major role lasted for almost three decades.

On this matter of world importance, a Conservative Government have gone out of their way to divorce themselves from Commonwealth thinking — and have done so after the most recent Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference when a powerful and unambiguous statement was produced calling for support for the convention. In 1980, the Carter Administration in the United States said that they were willing to accept the principles of the treaty which were then agreed on. Britain, under the present Government of course, followed suit, as it was clearly felt to be in our best interests. The Reagan Administration, as soon as it came into power, demanded the right to reconsider the entire package. Enlightened opinion in that country is that the United States is making a mistake in not signing the treaty. Elliot Richardson, a most distinguished former United States ambassador to the Court of St. James, said a year ago:

"The real importance of the Law of the Sea Convention cannot be found either in the sum of its parts or in its extraordinarily comprehensive whole. It lies rather in its demonstration of the capacity of 160 sovereign states to work out accommodations among vital competing interests. This is an achievement whose significance will loom even larger as the world increasingly finds itself forced to come to grips with its own inseparability".

The House knows the reason for Britain failing to sign the convention, having previously supported it under Governments of both parties over the years. It is that President Reagan and the mining interests in the United States do not wish us to do so. As a strong supporter of the Atlantic Alliance, I claim that that is absolutely the wrong way in which to proceed. The United States' interests are not entirely the same as ours. Our U-turn suggests a willingness to be pushed around by the bigger partner.

In an editorial two years ago, The Times said:

"The Government's decision to go along with the United States and jettison the UN convention of the law of the sea is very much to be regretted".

The editorial ended thus:

"Britain, as a maritime nation rightly anxious to retain her distant-water naval capability has a higher interest in the fate of this convention than anything to do with polymetallic nodules on the ocean floor. Freedom of navigation, the limits of territorial rights, development of the continental shelf, the passage of international straits, oceanic pollution, the peaceful transit of warships—these are all matters about which uncertainty has arisen . . . They are matters which, when uncertain are likely to give rise to conflict. They are all matters that are amenable to resolution under a system of validated international law."

More recently, the Financial Times of 30 November advised:

"In the end, there must be some stable international legal regime for exploiting the sea-bed beyond coastal waters, if those waters are to be exploited. Difficult though it may be in practice, the Law of the Sea Convention is better built upon than demolished or ignored".

I like to think that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is in favour of this international measure in principle. For the Ministry of Defence, it has great importance, especially for the Royal Navy, and for dealing with creepy crawlies and submarines. For the Department of the Environment, it has much to say about pollution; and the Department of Trade and Industry must be only too conscious of the strong support of the convention from maritime interests.

Only one part of the whole—indeed, only one part out of 17—is disputed. That is the mining aspect. The advice that I have been given is that such deep-sea mining is highly unlikely before the beginning of the next century and many experts think that it will be uneconomic for the foreseeable future. The cost of setting up a deep-sea bed mining operation is usually put at $1 billion to $1·5 billion. No investor will be prepared to commit such sums unless he has assurance that he has exclusive and unrestricted access to the mine site. The only way in which such access can be obtained is through the treaty.

I am told that Shell and BP are both potential deep-sea mining companies, as well as major shipping companies. Both have said that while they are dissatisfied with the mining provisions, the overall interests in freedom of movement must take precedence, and both companies favour signature. How much more important, therefore, is it for the Government to support the convention? Other nations with deep sea mining potential have signed, such as the Soviet Union, Japan, France and Canada.

We learnt today that the European Community is to sign those parts of the convention that it can sign, and Britain has acquiesced in this move. This has put us into a ridiculous position. It would have been far better to have reaped the rewards of signing ourselves.

In the past, Ministers have talked of Britain's increasing international importance. For example, I recall the Government's success in settling the Rhodesia issue, which had been a sore for so long. Only last night, we debated the considerable achievement of the agreement with Hong Kong. Why, then, do Ministers allow such effective and worthwhile international work to be constantly undermined by short-sighted, and sometimes penny-pinching attitudes? I think of the Government's decisions on overseas students fees, overseas aid, the external services of the BBC, the British Council, information officers overseas, and Wilton park. All these weaken our standing in the international community.

Yesterday, with one blow, the Conservative Government upset the Royal Navy, the Commonwealth and the maritime interests that are vital to our island community in the developing world in which we trade. Yesterday, they quickly took a decision that our party, our people and country, and many of our international friends will live to regret. Let wiser thoughts prevail. Let us work within the international community. Above all, for God's sake, let us have some vision.

1.32 am

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) has made a most valuable contribution, and I congratulate him on it.

In creating a constitution for the oceans, the convention was described by Ambassador Koh of Singapore as:

"a monumental achievement of the international community, second only to the Charter of the United Nations."

It is a convention of supreme importance for those of us who believe that world peace can be achieved only by a greater global security through international law. The convention sets out a regime that governs 70 per cent. of the surface of the globe. At Montego bay in December 1982, 119 nations were able to sign it immediately. It is an international agreement of a magnitude unparalleled in the history of the world. Is the United Kingdom to have no part in this? Where is our international responsibility to greater order in the world? The Secretary-General of the United Nations described the convention as:

"Like a breath of fresh air at a time of serious crisis in international co-operation and a decline in the use of international machinery for the solution of world problems."

I asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary three questions in November this year. I asked:

"(1) if he will recommend that Her Majesty's Government should accede to the United Nations convention on the law of the sea before the deadline of 9 December.

(2) which aspects of the United Nations convention on the law of the sea are still unacceptable to Her Majesty's Government; what progress has been made in the last 12 months to resolve such difficulties; and what progress he expects to make in the future;

(3) if he will make a statement on the United Nations convention on the law of the sea. — [Official Report, 29 November 1984, Vol. 68, c. 591.]

I received an unsatisfactory answer—I say with respect to my hon. Friend the Minister — because it merely referred me to a reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford, North (Mr. Skeet). That reply stated merely:

"We have as yet taken no final decision. We remain in touch with other European countries which have not signed the convention."—[Official Report, 9 November 1984, Vol. 67, c. 42.]

I think that my detailed questions merited a more comprehensive reply than was given.

A parliamentary question was asked and answered today, which told us, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath said, that the European Community, whose competence on the convention is limited, will sign the convention, and the Government will not stand in its way. It is time that we took a lead. We should not be equivocal: we should be in the forefront of the EEC. Only the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy, as I understand it, have said that they will not sign. So, although we agree to the EC, of which we are a member, signing, we will not do so ourselves.

On 2 December 1982, questions were put to my hon. Friend, and he said that the Government would do their best to achieve a more satisfactory solution. I ask him to say what the Government have done positively in the last two years to fulfil that promise?

Let this Great Britain of our have the courage to lead and not just to follow. We are not, nor must we ever be perceived to be, the lap-dog of the United States, even though she may be our closest friend and ally. Unlike the United States, we have not refused to sign the treaty totally but have said that there should be improvements and that we are prepared to work for further compromise. We must do so, and the initiative must come from us.

On 29 November, I asked my hon. Friend what benefits would be lost to the United Kingdom if we failed to register under the preparatory investment protection resolution of the United Nations convention on the law of the sea. I received the surprising and incomplete answer:

"I am not aware of any United Kingdom entity with deep seabed mining interests which wishes to take advantage of the deep seabed regime presently proposed under the United Nations law of the sea convention."—[Official Report, 29 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 591.]

Yet the reality as set out in the recent excellent pamphlet on the subject by David Ward is that

"Britain's mining companies can enjoy special status as 'pioneer investors' only on condition that we sign the convention within the two-year signature period which expires on 9 December 1984. The privilege of virtual guaranteed access to future seabed mine sites offered under the PIP resolution was among the major concessions offered to the industrialised countries by the Group of 77 at the end of UNCLOS 3. Ironically, Britain stands to throw away the benefits gained from earlier negotiations simply because of reluctance to sign the convention, which in any case requires ratification by 60 states including Britain before it can be enforced on our mining companies.

Should Britain fail to sign, our mining companies will fall behind those consortia or state enterprise that have been able to register as 'pioneer investors'. Already four countries — France, India, Japan and the USSR—have registered, which clearly indicates their intention to carry out deep-sea mining under the regime established by the convention. In particular, the Soviet Union and India have agreed an understanding to avoid competition for mine sites prior to their application for registration as 'pioneer investors'."

We should be prepared to lead in Europe, in the Commonwealth and in the world. That is the aspiration of every hon. Member and every citizen. Especially of this Government, who have done so much to restore our international prestige and position, we have a right to demand it. The eyes of the world are on my hon. Friend when he responds to the debate. I hope that he is able to do so with sufficiency of purpose. Our country's influence is crucial and will determine the success or failure of the law of the sea.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): It is a great pleasure to support my hon. Friends the Members for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) and for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best). It is regrettable that the only hon. Members present are Conservatives. We keep hearing from the Opposition that the Labour party, the Liberals and the SDP are worried about this matter, but tonight they are absent. It is a great shame, because this is a national and an international issue.

I understand that the Government are saying that they do not intend to sign this treaty on the basis that they do not intend to ratify it and therefore they do not sign what they do not intend to ratify. I understand that point of view. I also understand and share the Government's considerable disquiet with part XI, dealing with deep-sea mining. It is substantially flawed, but it is my belief that in the main the convention produces such considerable benefits for us that if we sign without ratification we can engineer changes in the convention that will allow part XI to be amended so that it is acceptable to the nation.

The Government say that they will not sign that which they will not ratify. However, there have been occasions when they have signed but not ratified. I shall give three examples. In 1971, we signed the International Maritime Organisation convention on liability for the carriage of nuclear materials in ships at sea. We have not yet ratified it. In 1977, we signed the north-west European offshore civil liability convention. We have not yet ratified it. Again in 1977, we signed an important convention, the Geneva convention on the laws of war. We have not yet ratified it.

I suggest that we should take as an example the 1973 Marpol convention of the IMO. We ratified it only in 1980. We did so only after a protocol had been negotiated to amend the convention before it came into force, allowing us to accept some but not all of the annexes. That is a good precedent for us to follow. We can sign with honour the convention on the law of the sea. We do not need to ratify it until we have negotiated far more sensible arrangements on part XI. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider that approach and, therefore, to urge on his right hon. and learned Friend that we sign the convention and work for a much fairer system in part XI. The convention will stop, or at least contain, maritime anarchy, and that is desperately important.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) for affording me two minutes during his excellent Adjournment debate to make my contribution on my own behalf and on that of the the United Nations Association in my constituency. I support the wisdom and faith in his words and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Ynys Mon (Mr. Best) and for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) in major respects.

We must, for the sake of British trade interests, settle and codify international maritime law, especially navigational rights. Secondly, we must settle now, well before commercial interests run riot in the next century, the deep-sea mining problem. We are storing up trouble for ourselves from the year 2000 onwards and we must have the foresight to deal with it. Thirdly, we must show confidence in the concepts of the Commonwealth, the European Community and, above all, the United Nations. There is no better way of doing that than by signing the convention on the law of the sea.

I believe that the opposite of co-operation is isolationism, that of foresight is narrowmindedness, and that of generosity is greed.

1.43 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I very much agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) when he spoke of the seriousness and importance of the subject. I can assure him and my hon. Friends the Members for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best), for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) and for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) that the Government attach the same importance to it. I can confirm that the Government's view has not changed from the one expressed in 1982 and that we have taken the decision that Britain should not sign the United Nations law of the sea convention.

Although 9 December is the last date on which signatures can be attached to the convention, it remains open for accession by states after that date. It would be open to the United Kingdom, or to other countries which have not signed, to become a party to the convention if in future it is improved in a way that we would find appropriate.

We have decided that, although we cannot sign the convention, we shall not object to the signature of the European Community being attached to it. The Community's competence is limited to fisheries, pollution, customs matters between landlocked states and commercial policy to a limited extent. There is nothing illogical in us not objecting to the Community's signature. The parts of the convention for which the Community is competent are parts to which we do not object. We should have been happy to sign the convention if it had dealt only with those issues.

I take exception to the idea that the United Kingdom is simply following United States policy without considering the British national interest. I urge my hon. Friends to reflect on that accusation, because it is unworthy. We have not followed the United States. We have insisted on participating in the preparatory commission and have shown our willingness in certain circumstances to accept the desirability of signing the convention, while the United States has taken a harsher position on most of the issues.

The suggestion that the countries which have refused to sign the convention are the lapdogs of the United States does not hold much water when one sees the list of countries which have refused to sign the convention. Over 30 countries, including those well-known followers of America such as Libya, Nicaragua and Albania, as well as many countries with varying political complexions, have refused to sign.

When about 14 years ago we entered the negotiations on this convention, the United Kingdom hoped for agreement on a comprehensive regime on marine matters which was generally acceptable to all nations. In the latter part of the conference it became clear that agreement could not be reached on the provisions related to deep sea-bed mining. Instead of being adopted by concensus, the text of the convention was put to a vote, in which the United Kingdom abstained.

Although much of the convention was recognised as valuable, the proposed regime for deep sea-bed mining was unacceptable to almost all the states which had the capacity to develop the industry. Although some countries involved in deep sea-bed mining might have signed the convention, all the western countries with an interest in the industry have made it clear that they do not intend to ratify the treaty unless substantial changes are made to it. Only ratification will introduce new rights or obligations.

We came to the position which I have described to the House on 2 December 1982. We were not prepared to sign the convention with the current mining regime.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn asked what we have done in the last few years. We have tried to influence the improvement of the convention. We have faithfully followed that objective. We have participated to the extent that our being non-signatories made possible. We have put forward proposals and ideas and have fully participated in attempts to improve the convention. However, that has not produced the results for which we hoped.

We have a number of objections to the mining regime —the onerous financial and other terms governing the participation of commercial operators, the cost that would accrue to this Government of supporting the over-elaborate structure of the authority and the activities of its operating arm—the Enterprise.

I shall explain the costs. For example, the fixed administrative cost of ratification at 1983 prices, with the sea-bed mining provisions unaltered and in force, would for the United Kingdom be between £3·6 million and £8 million. Running administrative costs would be between £1·5 million and £1·8 million.

In addition, the estimated cost to the United Kingdom of financing the Enterprise on the present basis would be between £25 million and £40 million in interest-free loans, plus the same amount in debt guarantees. That is on the assumption that the United States is also participating in the convention and paying its 33 per cent. share of the total cost. Since we know that the United States has no intention of participating, we have to add about 33 per cent. to those figures. Very large sums are therefore involved for a profoundly unattractive regime.

A further objection is the undesirable regulatory powers of the authority, in relation to production limitations, for example. In addition, there is the mandatory transfer of technology which sets an unacceptable precident which cannot have attracted any of my hon. Friends.

Finally, it is proposed that there should be a review conference 15 years after commercial mining commences. That review conference could force through an even more unattractive deep sea-bed mining regime through the use of the majority vote by which countries that had no deep sea bed mining interest of their own could enforce their views on those that did and were paying for the whole operation.

Our delegation to the preparatory commission went to considerable lengths to put across our views and to open up possibilities for obtaining improvements, but only a few limited technical proposals met with any response. Accordingly, the balance of advantage had to be decided between the greater part of the convention which is acceptable, but much of which is codification of existing laws, and significant aspects which are unacceptable to us. Those parts of the convention which cause us difficulty raise such significant problems that it would not be in our interest to sign. Moreover, none of the benefits to us in the convention is certain or, indeed, will take effect until the convention comes into force. There may be 138 signatories to the convention, but only 14 countries have so far ratified, and the convention will enter into force only after 60 states have ratified or acceded. There is no legal status under the convention which has not yet entered into force.

Some people, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn, have suggested that, by not signing, the United Kingdom loses the possibility for our companies to operate as pioneer investors under the convention's final Act. However, the terms are unattractive, and no United Kingdom entity interested in sea bed mining has indicated to us a wish to take advantage of those provisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East has argued that we should sign the convention and show a commitment to it in the hope that the preparatory commission will listen to our concerns. As I have mentioned to the House, it is not our practice in the United Kingdom to sign international treaties that we do not think we will be able to ratify. We are not in a position to undertake to ratify the United Nations law of the sea convention. Even those who favour signature would regard ratification of the present convention as against our interests.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East mentioned various examples which he described as precedents — there is no such thing. The examples he cited are not cases where we signed a convention or a treaty in the declared knowledge that we did not intend to ratify them. In some cases there have been reasons that delayed ratification. The original signature may have been rendered inappropriate in the light of the new, changed circumstances. There is no precedent for the United Kingdom to sign a convention that it already knows it cannot ratify. That is an important consideration.

I must emphasise the fact that all the major European Community countries and other countries such as Japan which have signed the convention have made it clear that they will not ratify the convention. It may be acceptable to them to sign treaties that they do not intend ratifying, but that is not a principle that has carried weight in the United Kingdom. I should be surprised if my hon. Friends were suggesting that we should go back on a basic principle of our approach to international treaties, simply because it might have a beneficial political effect on our international relations.

The Question having been proposed after Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned accordingly at seven minutes to Two o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 7 December 1984

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Human Embryos

Sir Humphrey Atkins (Spelthorne): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present two petitions from residents of the borough of Spelthorne. The first petition was initiated by Mr. Christopher Redding of Ashford, Middlesex, and contains 489 signatures, and the second was initiated by the Reverend Peter Brown, the vicar of Laleham, and contains 108 signatures.

Both are in identical terms. They affirm the petitioners' belief that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real, living individual human being, and both oppose all practices which discriminate against the embryo or violate his or human dignity and right to life.

Sir, the petitions continue as follows:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

The petition initiated by Mr. Redding concludes:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

That initiated by the Vicar of Laleham concludes:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray for the guidance of Almighty God upon all your deliberations etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Associated Octel Plant (Closure)

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of several thousand electors of the constituencies of Tatton and Eddisbury.

The petition shows that it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to secure the reduction and eventual elimination of lead in petrol; and that this policy has led directly to the closure of the Associated octel plant at Northwich in Cheshire, causing the loss of 250 jobs; and that those employees to be made redundant are statutorily entitled only to the limited benefits available under the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978; and that such benefits are a mere fraction of those available under special Government schemes for redundant mineworkers, steel workers, dockers and others working in industries which, unlike Associated Octel, have been an extensive drain on the taxpayers for many years.

The petition prays that your Honourable House will express support for legislation which will allow the same generous redundancy benefits for Associated Octel workers as are provided under the Redundant Mineworkers' Payments Scheme.

The petition concludes:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Torture

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg leave to present a petition to the House which has been collected by members of Amnesty International in the Orkney part of my constituency.

The petition states that those who have signed it wish to register strong support for the campaign against torture run by Amnesty International and to declare their wish that torture should be totally eradicated from the world; they believe that this would be advanced if Governments implemented Amnesty International's 12-point programme for the prevention of torture.

The petitioners pray that this House will urge Her Majesty's Government to support an effective United Nations convention against torture and in particular the extension of compensation to torture victims, to support proposals both at the United Nations and at the Council of Europe to create an international commission to make unannounced visits to any place of detention, and to intercede whenever and wherever possible on behalf of prisoners being tortured. It concludes by saying:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

I believe that the terms of the petition will have support in all parts of the House. Torture is degrading to human dignity. I hope that it will be especially noted by Her Majesty's Ministers who are in a position to exert influence in international forums.

To lie upon the Table.

GENERIC SUBSTITUTION (NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE)

Mr. Laurie Pavitt, supported by Mr. Willie W. Hamilton, Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. Ken Eastham, Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mr. Frank Haynes, Mrs. Renée Short, Mr. Michael Meadowcroft, Mr. Reg Freeson and Mr. George Foulkes, presented a Bill to permit a dispensing pharmacist to substitute a generic substitute for a medicine prescribed by a general practitioner in the National Health Service unless the general practitioner specifically orders that such a substitute may not be dispensed: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 February and to be printed. [Bill 39].

PLANNING AUTHORITIES (RESTRICTION OF LIABILITY)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams, supported by Mr. Martin Stevens and Mr. John Wheeler, presented a Bill to restrict the liability of planning authorities for the payment of compensation under the provisions of section 165 or 169 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 25 January and to be printed. [Bill 40].

Tourism

9.40 am

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I beg to move,

That this House recognises the great importance of tourism as a growing industry in this country and in particular the East Midland Region of England; welcomes the significant part it can play in reducing the number of unemployed; and accepts the Government's commitment to further growth of the industry.

Taking advantage of my luck in winning the long-standing Back-Bench privilege to choose the subject for today's debate, I worded the motion with my constituency and the unemployed in mind.

Those who were lucky enough — or unlucky, depending upon one's view—to hear my maiden speech last year will recall that my constituency's major industries are mining, agriculture and tourism. I need say nothing more at present about mining in my constituency, except that it is the greatest coalfield in Britain.

I doubt whether anyone in the country or in the world has not heard of Sherwood forest and its famous characters Robin Hood, Maid Marian and the wicked sheriff of Nottingham. Increasing tourism means more jobs. I am not a recent convert to the needs of the unemployed. As long ago as the last election I said that this human tragedy was our party's greatest enemy. I was in the distinguished position, according to a Sunday Times survey of the time, of being the only new candidate to say that and be elected.

Today I am worried that we might be blinkered by the euphoria that the new technology will be our saviour. That is true only in as much as it can create new wealth, not wholesale jobs. The latest estimate for jobs in high tech is about 6 per cent. of the working population, leaving the service industries as the only viable alternative for job creation in the non-academic sphere. Sticking out a mile as the industry with the greatest growth potential is tourism.

My noble Friend the Earl of Stockton, in his historic speech in the other place, talked about new horizons, more leisure and fewer working hours not only for the British people but for the rest of the western world. With that potential reservoir of customers we must build on what we have already achieved to provide services and amenities for visitors.

Last year, British tourists spent £4·5 billion here and overseas tourists £3·5 billion, making an impressive total of £8 billion. In the first nine months of this year, a record 11 million tourists visited Britain. That is 12 per cent. more than last year. The 1973 total was 7·5 million, which shows that the tourist industry is the leader in terms of growth and employment. It is ahead of aerospace and the motor industry. Projected forward to the next five years, that works out at a 54 per cent. increase in income, amounting to £14 billion at current prices, and shows the immense opportunity before us.

With that record, it is clear that the industry's future can be established by the continuing involvement of the national and regional tourist boards, with their expertise and cash working in harmony with local government, and with private and commercial enterprise. Such pump priming with taxpayers' money will give us an excellent return on a ratio of one to four between local authorities and commercial investment.

I believe that this expanding industry will find its growth in the regions and cities. No region is better placed than the east midlands, which is situated midway between the first leg of the tourist milk run from London to York and Edinburgh. That analysis is endorsed by a recent ministerial review of tourism.

I remind the House of the important part that the industry plays in the east midlands economy. Visitors spend about £360 million annually on accommodation, in restaurants, shops and garages and on entertainment.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): My hon. Friend is concerned about employment and the economy in the east midlands. Will he comment on the astonishing fact that 20 times as many Conservative Members are in the Chamber as Labour Members? Only one Opposition Member is present. That is disgraceful and shows a complete lack of care by the Opposition for employment and the economy of the east midlands and the rest of the country.

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend speaks for us all.

About £54 million is spent by overseas visitors, £212 million by British tourists staying away from home and £101 million by day trippers. It is no idle boast to say that there is something for everyone in the region's five counties — Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire and Nottinghamshire.

The famous Peak district of Derbyshire has added attractions, with the new impressive cable car at the heights of Abraham Matlock and the opening of the new Brittania park in 1985. There are many local initiatives. An example is the centenary celebrations of the famous author, D. H. Lawrence.

This year the number of jobs in the region was equal to 32,000 full-time workers, with many more in supporting roles. I draw particular attention to the cost to the Government of creating one new job in the tourist industry. It costs £4,500, compared with £35,000 to create a new job in the manufacturing industries. It will not have escaped the Minister that £4,500 is less than the cost of keeping someone on the dole.

I have provided only a glimpse of what we have achieved. We are looking to the future and to the direction in which we should be going to help. After close consultation, the East Midlands tourist board, local authorities, regional organisations and the private sector have issued a framework for the east midlands. It aims at improvements to provide a better quality of attraction and accommodation in line with market needs, at encouraging the development of new accommodation and facilities where there are deficiencies in provision and, where potential exists, at creating new areas of tourist activity.

To attract and accommodate new and expanded tourism, effective and co-ordinated marketing and information dissemination, including signposting, is needed. Since Nottinghamshire has been chosen as one of the two trial areas for additional signposting, I ask my hon. Friend to confirm that the charge to local authorities will be outside the ceiling for increased expenditure for the current year.

We must help to extend the tourist season with all-weather, health and recreational facilities as well as tourist accommodation. We should develop the holiday village concept. Rural tourism projects such as farm accommodation, countryside hotels, accommodation in pubs and attractions based on rural traditions will strengthen the rural economy. This will cater for the present growth sector of short holiday breaks for families at the weekends. Travelling tourists and senior citizens might take up the midweek places.

Another significant group is the 18 to 30-year-olds who must be persuaded that Britain is better for an away break than going abroad. Such people are not satisfied with visiting places depicting our traditional heritage. They need a crowd-puller such as a theme park. There is no better place to start than right there in Sherwood forest.

For visitors, Sherwood forest goes hand in hand with Nottingham—like Robin and Marian, like Torvill and Dean. In the middle of 500 acres of natural forest is that gigantic tree, the Major Oak, under which the devoted couple spent their romantic moments. It is now gazed upon by 1 million people annually.

When in Nottingham, the visitor's mind turns to the barbaric sheriff who did so much to persecute the innocent peasants of that time, when justice had a totally different meaning from that of today. Perhaps we are seeing something of those far-gone days on the picket lines that are part of the coal dispute. Acts of violence are condoned and encouraged by the equally hated and self-styled sheriff of Sheffield.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): When all the evil was going on to which my hon. Friend has referred, was the Nottingham council Labour-controlled?

Mr. Stewart: The Labour party is a modern phenomenon which is being phased out gradually but surely. Sheffield tried only recently to turn history on its head by claiming that Robin Hood came from that area. I must tell Sheffield to be patient, as it will have a winner in the near future. It will be able to show tourists the 20th-century castle of the last union dictator.

Nottinghamshire's success so far has been spearheaded by the local authorities, mainly by the city council and the county council. They have been supported by the East Midlands tourist board and the Countryside Commission. I pay tribute to the countryside division of Nottinghamshire county council, which has developed with vision and attraction during the past 10 years the two famous country parks of Sherwood and Rufford, which have attracted 2 million visitors. A further 500 acres of reclaimed pit spoil is now being transformed into the Leen valley country park.

Nottingham would not forgive me if I failed to mention Newstead abbey in my constituency, which was the home of Lord Byron. The abbey attracts worldwide attention.

My purpose in using the opportunity that is afforded to Back Benchers to submit motions to the House is to ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State whether he has any new initiatives which can be implemented to finance the essential theme park, whether it is situated in the city or the forest. As local authority expenditure is being capped, the regional tourist board's budget is being apportioned according to the national board's allocation. Its role will be mainly marketing and advising, and private and commercial interests will be left to capitalise on our heritage.

Nottingham, without a doubt, has been outstandingly successful and the Robin Hood theme park will take us forward to the next important stage in the county's provision for visitors. Above all, it will create new jobs.

I hope that I have presented sound facts, figures and statistics, but perhaps the most vital factor in ensuring a successful tourist industry in my area is fun. It can be said that fun covers laughter, interest, action, suspense and even education. The role of the theme park will provide all those things. It will capture the imagination of all ages. It will offer the choice of active participation or exciting spectatorship. Our pubs, hotels and restaurants will present the most delicious food and the warmest welcome to visitors. We propose to build for the east midlands a reputation as the best tourist region in Britain.

9.54 am

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) on his initiative in introducing the debate. I am glad that so many hon. Members are present to avail themselves of the opportunity of giving their constituencies an advertising broadsheet and perhaps to give my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State some useful advice on the promotion of tourism.

I appreciate the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood but I think that he spelt incorrectly the name of the area of greatest attraction in the midlands. In fact, it is Shrewsbury and not Sherwood. It seems that he rejigged some of the letters in Shrewsbury. It is a great privilege and an experience of considerable interest to represent one of the finest Tudor towns in Britain. Hon. Members may be aware that Shrewsbury is listed by the Department of the Environment as being among the top 12 towns of the most historic significance. It is a town that I commend hon. Members to visit. I had great pleasure during the summer recess in seeing many hon. Members wandering around the Pride Hill shopping area of Shrewsbury while visiting a beautiful and historic town.

Shrewsbury, like many historic areas, is not without its transportation difficulties. We are in the process of a major public inquiry into the extension of the M54, which runs from the M6 to Telford. It would not be appropriate now to comment on the outcome of the inquiry. However, it is of considerable importance to historic towns that they have a sensible road system so that the inhabitants can enjoy their life while having the benefit of the trade that tourism brings by various forms of transport, especially the motor car. Motor cars bring about 70 per cent. of the tourists that visit the midlands.

Shrewsbury still has the benefit of a rail link but one wonders for how long that will continue. It is not the fastest service in the country. That is much to my regret during my weekly journeys by rail. Shrewsbury has an attractive railway station and can be described as a typical country station. It is being modernised considerably, but the historic nature of the town is being kept in mind.

We all look forward next week to an announcement on Stansted airport. I shall be able to support the Government only if they propose to develop Manchester and Birmingham airports. It is important to the midlands that those airports are developed. The development of a third London airport at Stansted would not find favour with those of us who have a regional interest to express in the House.

Mr. Jessel: Many of us will sympathise with my hon. Friend's wish to attract more airport traffic through Manchester and Birmingham airports and other airports in the midlands. Does he agree that it is essential to prevent an increase in traffic through Stansted and Heathrow? Will he insist with equal force that there should not be a fifth terminal at Heathrow? He will recognise that a decision not to proceed with a fifth terminal would direct more traffic to the north.

Mr. Conway: My hon. Friend's intervention would obviously be better directed to another quarter. Most of us who represent tourist areas away from London appreciate that London is an important gateway for tourism and that many of the tourists whom we welcome to the midlands begin their stay in Britain in London. We are not so naive as to think that we should stop tourists arriving in London and ask them instead to come direct to us. To have them arriving in Stansted would discourage them from travelling to the west, and the House will understand that I have a particular interest in Shrewsbury. It would discourage them also from travelling further on, into Wales. My hon. Friend's concern about the development of Heathrow and increasing traffic in other regional airports may be lessened when the Government come to denationalise British Airways. When that happens we may be able to sort out the mess of scheduled, charter and part-charter travel which is distorting the market.

I direct the attention of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to his Department's activities in the promotion of tourism in Britain. The House will know that that responsibility lies with the Department of Trade and Industry, especially with my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), the Minister of State. The Department is aware of the importance of tourism to jobs and trade. However, there could be a great deal more co-ordination. There are several tourist boards and I am pleased to serve on the Heart of England tourist board. It has dedicated officers and it does an extremely good job.

There is a role for the Department in co-ordinating to a greater extent the efforts of the English regional tourist boards and the activities of organisations such as the British Overseas Trade Board and the regional employment promotional councils, which are part-financed—up to 50 per cent.—by the Department. It would be useful and a recognition of the importance of tourism to jobs and trade if more foreign missions that promote industrial employment and orders also developed a role for tourism. A great deal of co-ordination at minimal cost could be achieved and could be of considerable benefit to Britain.

Hoteliers in my constituency, who, naturally, I meet regularly, tell me that one of the greatest things the Government could do for their business would be to seek to end the wages control that applies to that industry. That is a false control. It does not reflect the market available to them and goes a considerable way towards generating the amount of foreign labour employed in many of our tourist areas. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will use his considerable influence with the Treasury to reduce the cost of employing people at the lower wage scale levels, especially with regard to national insurance contributions.

During the last Session, I introduced, on behalf of Shrewsbury and Atcham borough council, a Bill to enable us to provide more car parking spaces to cater for tourists in Shrewsbury. Sadly, it did not receive the necessary support from hon. Members, and it failed to progress. To a considerable degree, therefore, the House has a responsibility for the traffic problems in Shrewsbury. I intend on many occasions to return to that issue—regardless of how boring the Department feels it is—when we debate Department of Transport issues. Traffic causes a problem in Shrewsbury and hurts that attractive and historic town.

I look forward to learning of the success in Sherwood of the signposting exercise mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood. Lack of signposting is a problem in my constituency also, and the hoteliers feel—I sympathise with them—that a more sympathetic view by those involved in planning and other controls would considerably help to increase employment in the constituency.

Those who visit Shrewsbury can be assured of a warm welcome and the friendliest staff in this country. I look forward to welcoming hon. Members, if they find time during the Christmas recess, to visit the finest historic town in the country.

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): I recently gave a talk at a conference organised by the City branch of the Institute of Directors. That conference was about the regeneration of the economy so, having been given a choice of subject, I chose tourism as the most hopeful growth industry. I was dismayed, however, after I had finished my speech and the questions started to come in, to hear one man say how pleasant it was to have a diversion from the main topic of the day. I fear that I retorted rather sharply that, if that was how he regarded it, my message had failed completely. Insufficient understanding of the importance of tourism is too prevalent, even among a fairly sophisticated audience of business men.

Tourism is not a candyfloss industry or some peripheral activity—acceptable, but not like the serious business of earning the country's wealth. We must get that message over firmly and, for that reason, I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) chose this topic and placed the emphasis on jobs and job opportunities.

The size and scope of the tourist industry is not clearly understood even within this House, and certainly not outside it, except by those closely connected with the industry. I am not especially keen on figures, but perhaps a few will illustrate the point. In 1983, the tourist industry generated £7·6 billion—the latest full figures available. That is a colossal sum. When it is compared with the output of any other industry, one notes that, far from being a peripheral industry, tourism is essential to our economy's well-being. The English tourist board estimates that about 1·5 million people are involved in the tourist industry. I should add that I act as an adviser to that board.

We must realise that it is not simply a matter of hotels or caravan sites. They are certainly central to the industry, because if tourists spend time away from their homes—I suppose that if they do not, they are classed as day trippers — hotels and other forms of accommodation are important. The importance of the industry spreads much further than that. As well as hotels, restaurants and cafes are affected. That excellent but perhaps little known paper "British Business", which I believe is a product of the Department of Trade and Industry, says that in the last year there was an increase in the number of jobs in the hotel trade of 17,000 and in the cafe trade an increase of 6,000. When we consider the difficulties of producing that number of extra jobs by more artificial and deliberate means, we can see the potential and importance of the tourist industry.

What about transport? I do not know the proportion of visitors travelling on the London underground, but I suspect that they must be making a substantial contribution to the running of that system and the money generated from it. British Rail and the coaches that travel all over the country benefit from our visitors. I hope that we can encourage more people not to do just the circuit of London-Stratford-on-Avon-Edinburgh or some such route, because that under-values and under-plays what can be offered by other towns and cities and parts of the country. We could thereby greatly increase the amount spent on transport.

Theatres also have a great part to play in entertaining visitors. I have American friends who come over here especially for the west end theatre. That is the one aspect that pulls them—not only because the variety and scope is far greater than they can find on Broadway, but because the theatre is far cheaper. They get better value all round. I hope that there will be a development of the theatres in the provinces.

Hon. Members may know that recently we established the Theatre Royal in Plymouth which is generating great interest and is very much a tourist attraction. I need hardly say that there were numerous and passionate arguments and disagreements about whether it should be built. There can be no gainsaying the fact that, now the theatre has been built, it is providing a wide range of entertainment from classical to pop and is drawing in visitors. That theatre is a great advantage and addition to what my city of Plymouth can offer.

I am pleased that the English tourist board's latest promotion is going under the theme of "England entertains". If we increase the quality of the entertainment and the number of entertainers—whether in a hotel or in the theatre—more employment will be provided in that profession.

I shall now consider the role of the Government, local authorities and private enterprise in promoting tourism and, thus, the growth in jobs. As a Conservative, I believe that the key role should go to private enterprise. It is right and proper that private enterprise should bear the brunt. It is essential that in tourism, which is so scattered in its impact, there should be a good lead from the Government and good support from the regional tourist boards. In that respect, local authorities certainly have a part to play in supporting their local tourist board and in providing an impetus for others. I commend to the House the marketing bureau set up in Plymouth, which was one of the first in the country. It brought together representatives of the local authority and private enterprise. They work together to promote Plymouth as a place where tourism is important.

I am pleased to see that this example is followed, for example, in Bristol. It is tehnically part of the west country but I am not sure that Devon and Cornwall see it that way, although that is irrelevant for this argument. Bristol has brought up to date a derelict part of the docks and has made a good and enterprising area out of what was a seedy and rundown one. There is no end to the scope, not solely in the more obvious tourist attractions, but within cities as well.

I thought it worthwhile to study what is happening in a part of England far removed from my own, because it is easy to become parochial on these occasions. It is extremely instructive to look at Northumbria. It could not be much further from my west country.

When the Northumbria tourist board was set up in 1969, it calculated that tourism was worth about £4 million —not much. It is now reckoned to top about £200 million and there is still great scope for going further. I have read that Durham county council has an ambitious project to recreate an entire 19th-century lead mining complex at Killhope Wheal—not something that one normally associates with tourism, but how enterprising to have a little of our industrial history put in a form which tourists can understand. I hope that that will be done in different ways all over the country.

The chairman of the Northumbria tourist board has rightly said:

"Tourism is our only growth industry, so it is vital that it continues to grow."

I share the dismay expressed about the lack of representatives from those areas. They are the ones who ask for most, and badger the Government most about unemployment. That is right, because it is a vital subject, but why are they not present today when the debate deals with the greatest capacity for increasing employment and hope for our young people?

Mr. Jessel: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Miss Fookes: Reluctantly.

Mr. Jessel: When my hon. Friend hears what I have to say I do not think it will be reluctantly, because I am sure that she will agree with me that no Member of the Liberal party or the SDP has been present for at least half an hour.

Miss Fookes: Yes, it was worth giving way. I hope, however, that my hon. Friend will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to make his own contribution when I shall look forward to doing the same to him.

I was about the make a point about prospects for young people. It is essential that tourism is promoted by those who have resonsibility for such matters as a worthwhile occupation for young people to enter, whether that be in the traditional occupations in hotels, cafés and the like, or in the leisure and entertainment centres—the complexes which are springing up to cater for visitors—or in the theatre, or transport which has a tourism input.

I look forward to hearing my hon. Friend the Minister tell us what the Government are doing to promote training in those occupations. My understanding is that the youth training schemes are beginning to recognise the possibilities and to allow that tourism is a possible work experience for young people. I believe that that must be geared so that young people at school are aware of the possibilities of tourism when they come to consider a worthwhile career.

I come now to a point which many hon. Members may feel controversial, but which I believe has an important input to our tourism potential. It is what is called, rather curiously, the continental fixed link — the Channel tunnel, Chunnel or possibly part bridge, part tunnel. I do not pretend for one moment to have any idea what might be the best form in engineering and financial terms. What seems to be glaringly plain is that such a link would be extremely valuable in making it much easier for continental visitors and even American visitors, who may fly direct to the continent rather than to us, to come here. I recognise, of course, that we may have a flow the other way. Apart from the employment opportunities available in building the tunnel — they are not to be underestimated — it would make us much more accessible to the continent and therefore increase vastly the opportunities for tourism.

Mr. Forth: I recognise the force behind my hon. Friend's argument. The sea crossing can be, in itself, a pleasant experience and take little over an hour on some of the faster ships. It is a highly acceptable way of crossing the Channel and provides a great deal of employment. How will an underground railway tunnel, where one has to get on to the train to go under the Channel, be a step in the right direction and significantly improve the pleasantness or speed of the journey?

Miss Fookes: I suspect that the answer to that will depend upon how good a sailor one is. Many people dislike crossing the sea and would infinitely prefer to go under it.

I am not suggesting that there should be only one way or the other. Surely my hon. Friend agrees with the Conservative principle that there should be freedom of choice and as much choice as possible. No one will be sent underground if he does not want to go. I should expect that the links over the surface of the water will continue, as they did after the advent of aeroplanes. I see a role for that crossing, and I hope that the Government will look kindly upon that suggestion. They have already said that they will not put public money into it, and I accept that. If private enterprise judges that it is worth building and is willing to risk its money, that is the best bet for the country and the House.

I do not wish to detain the House long because many of my hon. Friends are anxious to speak. I hope that the lessons to be drawn from the debate will not be lost upon those outside the House. Tourism provides a better opportunity for employing more people than any other industry that we can think of, or are likely to see in the foreseeable future. I do not underestimate the value of manufacturing industry, but I suggest that tourism and manufacturing can go side by side.

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): I must declare an interest in these matters. I am an adviser to Horizon holidays and Best Western Hotels. I am a governor of the St. Andrew's Old Course golf hotel and country club. I wish to speak not about those matters, but about the effect on tourism generally and on the west midlands.

I have listened to my hon. Friends speaking about enchanting places such as Shrewsbury and Sherwood forest, which I have had the delight of driving through on many occasions. I appreciate them and the vistas of the coastline around the country, which provide the traditional form of holiday tourism. But they are not something that I have in my central west midlands constituency of Birmingham, Yardley. What I have is another form of tourism, which does not enjoy the same benefits. It is exhibition, conference and business tourism, which is the fastest-growing employer of labour, contrary to what the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) muttered from a sedentary position. Instead of destroying industry tourism is helping to preserve and perpetuate it and to give it the richness and wealth that it deserves.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I sought to make the point that hon. Members from Humberside are fully aware of the advantages of tourism, but that manufacturing is a major area of employment. Considering that the hon. Gentleman comes from the west midlands, it should be in the forefront of his mind that something must be done about manufacturing if he genuinely wants to do something about jobs.

Mr. Bevan: It is because the west midlands has been the iron heart of England and has been concerned about jobs and manufacturing that the Government gave the equivalent of assisted status in a discretionary way to the west midlands. I would appreciate it if the hon. Gentleman would make a full speech on the matter later because, Lord alone knows, his ranks are so depleted that he needs to. It is astounding and bewildering that Labour Members are completely uninterested in the subject of our fastest-growing industry. I shall listen to the remarks which he will make from a more proper stance later.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I can understand the hon. Gentleman's anxiety to move from a point on which he is on such weak ground, but will he tell the House what has happened to manufacturing employment in the west midlands during the past five years?

Mr. Bevan: I listened to the point made from the serried ranks of the Labour party. Industrial capacity in the west midlands has been much reduced during the past 40 years by the actions of successive Governments, especially the Labour Government, who introduced the formula of assisted area status through the President of the Board of Trade in 1945. Under the Labour Government that policy continually militated against the west midlands. The area was additionally burdened by the policy of not granting industrial development certificates to allow factory development.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I do not wish to divert the debate into an equally important question, but does my hon. Friend agree that the most prominent estimate of jobs lost to the west midlands region through discrimination against it in regional policy has numbered about 112,000 jobs? Does he agree that the region has been an industrial blood donor to other parts of the country?

Mr. Bevan: I agree with my hon. Friend, who puts the point succinctly. The west midlands has been a blood donor to the body politic which was laid out for operations continually by the Labour party when it was in Government. That being so, it is essential that we start to make provision, despite the St. Vitus' dance example from Opposition Members, for a healthier framework and body in the west midlands.

I welcome the presence of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary who has done much to assist the west midlands lately. I hoped that his right hon. Friend the Minister who has special responsibility for tourism would be present this morning, but I am aware that he has additional responsibilities brought about by the great tragedy wrought at Brighton by the outrageous bombing. I hope that my hon. Friend will pass on the important messages about tourism.

I have the honour to chair for Conservative Members the committee that deals with tourism matters. Because tourism is so important, it is essential that there should be a Secretary of State for tourism with Cabinet rank, and a full and separate Department. I hope that the Government will see that that is an appropriate way in which to recognise and give a sense of direction to these most important matters.

The Minister has just conducted a review of tourism and introduced many new matters, including a new structure, which are welcome. It is essential to have a Select Committee to undertake a permanent review of the accomplishments of tourism and progress made by it, and to give inducement and encouragement because vast sums are involved. Tourism brings vast improvements to employment. We must back up the new structure for tourism.

All those engaged in tourism are subject to the adjudication of at least six Ministries at the moment, including the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Transport, the Scottish Office, the Welsh Office and the Northern Ireland Office. As a result we are subject to the considerations of many Ministers within those Ministries. That diffusion is not in the best interests of the sector, and points to the need for an adequate reform, which I hope will come about shortly.

I asked a written question on 15 July 1982 regarding the numbers then employed in the tourist industry. The Minister replied that precise numbers employed were not available as the 1968 standard industrial classification

"does not identify tourism as a separate industry."—[Official Report, 15 July 1982; Vol. 27, c. 434.]

Although attempts have been made since then to get a better overall presentation of the figures, it is not possible to assess the full benefit of tourism to the country in terms of wealth and the jobs. That needs continual attention.

In a subsequent contribution in the Chamber I urged the Minister to give us regular monitored figures — I suggested quarterly figures—but it was not accepted. It is still necessary to argue the point that we have an intelligence of overall tourist figures that distinguishes all the categories of employment involved. When the question was asked in July 1982, the answer was that about 813,600 people were employed in some departments of tourism. It is variously estimated now that 1·2 million to 1·4 million people are currently employed in tourism.

The BTA's most recent publication opts for a figure of 1·4 million people employed in the industry. If the earlier figure was correct, that is an increase of about 600,000 in three years. The BTA makes the more modest claim that at least 50,000 jobs are being created every year. While most other industries, including many in the west midlands industrial sector, have, regrettably, been shedding jobs in one way or another, the tourist industry is accumulating jobs, generating employment and bringing more and more people, especially young people, into the profession, for that is indeed what it is—a trade, a profession and a vocation.

Tourism is and will continue to be Britain's biggest job creator. That is why special attention must be paid to giving it the necessary muscle to continue that progress. It is already the third largest industry in this country and will be by far the largest well before the year 2000. It is also the second biggest currency earner, after North sea oil, which it will shortly overtake just as it is overtaking industries at present considered more important, such as the motor industry and the retail industry, considered as a conglomerate.

To back up the necessity for new labour, we need a young persons' tourist task force. On previous occasions I have urged consideration of this as a means whereby young people can give a national service to their country just as when I was younger, and in better condition, I and others contributed in a more military sense.

If young people today wish to serve in that military sense, I hope that there will be opportunities for them in the armed forces, but in a civilian sense tourism offers breath-taking opportunities to take up even more of the unemployed. Such a task force could help in the planning sphere through pilot schemes and later general schemes and in building and refurbishing the heritage, which has been a major feature of the presentation of our castles, country homes and estates as a tourist attraction. The theme park concept also needs to be developed further, not just in Sherwood forest, but perhaps also in docklands and around the national exhibition centre complex in the west midlands.

Young people could be employed on a local, residential basis just as national service men were, acting as guides or linguistic helpers and generally training for entry into the hotel sector and other areas of the profession. If the service chiefs say that such a scheme is no use to them, it could certainly be of use to tourism. Let us not, therefore, throw away this chance for a substantial take-up of unemployment.

By 1985, the number of overseas visitors to this country should reach 15 million per year, including 3 million from the United States and Canada. Visitors already bring in approximately £5 billion in foreign exchange, and domestic tourism generates about £6 billion for the home market. That is the size of the industry with which we are concerned.

The CBI has announced that it intends to examine the job creation prospects of the tourist industry to sharpen awareness of that vital aspect of the industry. In the public sector, the Government should set up a Select Committee to examine in detail the importance of tourism in continued job creation and the provision of the necessary private and public investment in the infrastructure needed to support the industry. For the first time, our tourism figures have caught up with those of the sunshine areas of France, Italy and Germany and will shortly leave them behind, to achieve the highest level in the world per head of population.

Holiday tourism is still in the lead, but it is being closely chased by business and conference tourism. Nevertheless, there is still a dire need for capital schemes to assist the industry. Capital schemes for sewage disposal in many seaside resorts could lead to sewage-free seas and mammoth clean-ups of the beaches. It is also vital to continue to create and refurbish the necessary hotel support. We must reintroduce building and refurbishment assistance, either as grants or as pump-priming loans to modernise and improve the infrastructure.

We must also widen employment in tourist-related industries. In the second quarter of 1984, employment in restaurants increased by 6·9 per cent., in public houses by 4·2 per cent., in hotels by 6·4 per cent, in sports areas by 3·2 per cent. and even in museums by 6·4 per cent. at a time when the increase in all industries was just 1 per cent. and in the service industries together only 2·5 per cent. In Scotland alone, figures for the tourism sector showed an increase of 18 per cent. between 1982 and 1983.

It is in the context of golf in particular that sector tourism can be developed in Scotland. The number of north American tourists to the United Kingdom — I realise that it was affected by the low value of the pound compared with the dollar—increased by 33 per cent. between 1982 and 1983.

Let us consider the necessary reforms that we must introduce to satisfy the tourists. We must not lag behind the continentals in this respect. A reform of our licensing laws is long overdue. We must allow free access to hotels and public houses at any hour of the day for the taking of refreshments of an alcoholic nature if that is what is desired. The obsolete laws introduced in 1916 to keep munitions workers out of the public houses should be repealed immediately, as was suggested by the Errol report among others.

Shopping hours should also be reformed. That would create jobs just as jobs would be created in the licensed trade by freeing the hours. The industrial building licence should be allowed for the large stores. That would affect tourism directly, because tourists from the continent home in on the big stores in the south of England. They come over on one-day and two-day trips and clear the shelves of clothes, often by midday. The large stores contribute to tourism and they should be helped.

There was an increase of 17 per cent. in the number of overseas visitors between August 1983 and August 1984. The contribution to the balance of payments increased by 23 per cent., and earnings increased by 15 per cent. in 1983 compared with 1982.

Areas of the west midlands considered by some to wear a sombre robe are in fact dynamic and attractive centres for exhibition, conference and business tourism. My constituency of Yardley is cheek by jowl with the newest and fastest-growing centre in the world in this respect, providing great prospects for job and wealth creation.

There are three wards in my constituency. Two of them have unemployment rates of 18·4 per cent. and 18·7 per cent. In the third ward, Sheldon, which is the nearest to all the new infrastructure that we have created in Birmingham the unemployment rate is only 11 per cent. That is no accident. As a councillor in those days, I was proud to contribute to many of the decisions that led to that result. Nine years ago, we created the national exhibition centre, with its nine halls. We planned and built Birmingham international station at a cost of £6 million—a magnificent station giving immediate admission to the exhibition centre for passengers from London and Birmingham and on the main inter-city trains. We also have the Birmingham international airport terminal. We have plans to build another industrial and commercial estate in the area, extending over 120 acres.

At our urging, the Government wisely agreed to the creation of the freeport. I thank my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for his contribution. The freeport is shortly to come into existence in Birmingham. Also, a few miles away, we have created a sports arena. There may even be plans to create a sports quadrena in the fullness of time—one of the most futuristic in the world.

We shall ask for Government assistance to add to the national exhibition centre an international convention centre, and to take up a further 80 acres of total dereliction in the Gas street basin area—the inner area of Birmingham. We shall ask the House for permission to run a road race for motor cars on the roads of Birmingham as part of our tourist effort. Contemporaneously, we should aim to reduce the cost of travel in this country. This has partly been achieved by the running of express coaches on the motorways. A further achievement will be the reduction in internal air fares that must come about.

We must also be aware of the vast advantages of conference tourism. Birmingham demonstrates the great role that the cities will play in providing for conference and business tourism. The number of international meetings held in Britain has increased by nearly 80 per cent. in 10 years. Birmingham was able to host the international Rotary convention this year—[Interruption.] That is no laughing matter. It was the largest single conference ever held anywhere in the world, and it was hosted at the national exhibition centre. It was reckoned to bring in a vast amount of money, not least in terms of spending by each tourist. The average delegate spends £360 per visit, or £56 a day. That figure must be compared with the £23 a day generated by holiday tourists. A delegate spends more than twice what the holiday tourist spends, and therefore he employs vastly more people.

In 1983-84, the exhibition business in Britain brought in £1,250 million. Sixteen million people have visited the national exhibition centre since it was opened nine years ago. Thirty-five exhibitions are held there annually, with 65 other events, including sporting events. A total of 2·5 million people spend £70 million in the region in spin-offs in hotels, travel, theatres and restaurants. Some shows can produce as much as £50 million individually, 25 per cent. of it from overseas.

The national exhibition centre is responsible for creating 4,000 jobs—that is not chickenfeed—and half of those jobs are permanent. As my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) said, tourism is not a candyfloss business. It is a serious business and a job creator.

I ask the Government to help us to finance the international convention centre. If they cannot give us first division status for regional aid, let them help us in respect of the £54 million which will be required over and above the Brussels money which will be forthcoming and the local and private money to be invested in the Birmingham convention centre. We are asking for an injection of money to prime the pump.

When completed, the convention centre will generate an additional income of £38·2 million a year at 1983 prices. That is sufficient to support another 1,857 full-time jobs. Spending generated by the centre and those jobs will lead to the creation of a further 876 jobs. That makes a total of 2,733. A new 500-bed hotel is to be built in the city centre privately. An entire new area of the city will be developed. The canals, or "cuts" as they are called in Birmingham, will be rebuilt. There are more miles of canal in Birmingham than in Venice and recreating the canal structure will generate more tourism in Birmingham.

I have made my plea for continued help with the convention centre and for the car race, a Bill concerning which will shortly be laid before the House. That race will bring in at least £1 million in the first year in profits. We recently had a trial, which was fully supported by the police. No fewer than 250,000 people turned out to see the vintage cars. Those figures will be regarded as chickenfeed in the future. We in Birmingham are not wailing. We regret that our industry is not stronger but, given a chance, we shall reinforce it. Given the chance we shall create wealth and employment in conference and business tourism.

Sir John Wells (Maidstone): Hon. Members will not be surprised if I start by paying tribute to our former colleague, the late Lord Geoffrey-Lloyd, who, in a few short years of work with the Leeds castle foundation, built up the notion, activity and reality of Leeds castle, which is in my constituency, from one of the nation's unknown beauties into one of our premier tourist attractions. That success is due almost entirely to the energy and loving care of our late colleague.

I do not wish to bore the House with special pleading but I firmly believe that those parts of the home counties with interests and features to offer visitors and tourists should put their best foot forward. London hotels are, lamentably, far too expensive. Just a few miles out of London there are hotels in my constituency and elsewhere which are nearly as good and a great deal cheaper. I urge overseas visitors to sleep out of London and see some of our local beauties. [Laughter.] I remind right hon. and hon. Members who are laughing that Charles Dickens made one of his characters say:

"Kent, sir — everybody knows Kent — apples, cherries, hops, and women."

We have perhaps the premier carriage museum in the world, tucked away in what were formerly the archbishop's stables. We have great spring blossom routes signposted by the Automobile Association and the Royal Automobile Club. People drive round our farmland and see the beauties of our countryside. We have many farm trails. They are important for overseas tourists and for educating our urban neighbours.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan) dealt at length with the nature—I shall not say the beauties—of Birmingham. He has mentioned the charms of its canals. I remind my right hon. and hon. Friends and Labour Members—there are no Liberal or SDP Members present—of the importance of educating the urban young into the rural way of life. Kentish farmers are leading the way in providing farm trails and educational facilities. However, there is one great danger, which applies to Wales as much as to Kent. People walking in the countryside with dogs allow them to run loose and worry sheep. That is a serious matter as we now have more sheep worrying. That happens because some visitors to the countryside do not understand the country code. I hope that the tourist boards and those who encourage visitors to the countryside ensure that they behave themselves and see that their dogs do likewise. Nevertheless, we who live in the country are privileged to be there and want to share it with our neighbours from the towns.

Kent has the two great cathedral cites of Canterbury and Rochester. I should like to make a specific point to our tourist authorities. Our great historic buildings are in danger of wearing out as a result of too many feet pounding through them. There is also a real danger of inconvenience and unpleasantness for people who live there and wish to live a quiet and peaceable life. Cathedral closes were designed not as tourist attractions but as places for clergy and meditative people to live in peace and some seclusion. A balance must be struck.

I should like to pay tribute to the extremely good work of the Historic Houses Association. It has maintained the flow of publicity material and ensured that historic houses that are visited by the public are still living entities, nearly always inhabited by families who have been there for several or many generations.

A completely new aspect of tourism has hit Britain this year. I refer to the Liverpool international garden festival. Everyone knows that Chelsea is the greatest flower show in the world, and I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland — the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott)—in his place. Chelsea has a new rival in the form of this imported continental notion of a garden festival which runs for some six months rather than the four days of Chelsea.

The festival is over, and technically it is unnecessary for me to declare an interest. However, I should inform the House that I was an exhibitor. My only faintly light-hearted criticism of the organisation is that I received a £4·20 invoice for the amount of electricity I had consumed. I wrote to the Merseyside development corporation and pointed out that I should be delighted to pay for the electricity if it would reimburse me for the few hundred pounds it owed me in prize money. I am delighted to be able to inform the House that the prize money was forthcoming and that then I paid £4·20 for the electricity I had consumed. It is unfortunate that the organisers made the recipients of prizes wait for their cash until they had the neck to write and ask for it. Liverpool was the first venture of its kind. I believe that we shall go from strength to strength with this new style of exhibition.

I wish to pay a tribute to two people who not only made the Liverpool festival possible but brought about the smooth working of its day-to-day arrangements. The commissioner, Lord Aberconway, was very largely responsible not only for the vision he brought to the organisation but for its execution. There are many other people whom I should like to single out for praise, but there is one person in particular I should like to mention. He had great charm and energy. Above all, he possessed the great British quality of pouring oil on troubled waters. Anybody who has ever tried to stage an exhibition knows that tempers become frayed. This person was Mr. Bill Richards. He should be named in this House as the person who carried out the most wonderful work in Liverpool during the past summer.

Before I leave the new international garden festival concept, I must warn my hon. Friend and the Department than when unattractive city after unattractive city comes bidding for an international garden festival to rescue their nasty dumps and make them into more attractive places, it must be borne in mind that those cities must possess the basic charm of Liverpool. They must have fine buildings, fine parks and the potential of Merseyside. It is no good going to places where it always rains and where the natives are unfriendly. Nobody could have been kinder, nicer or friendlier than the people of Liverpool. It was due to the natural good nature of the citizens of Liverpool that the festival was such a success. It is essential that the Department, or whoever considers the granting of licences for the holding of such festivals, should be selective.

Finally, may I say a word about Chelsea and the horrors which afflict Chelsea because of the traffic jams. The Royal Horticultural Society is trying very hard to alleviate the problems. It is looking at every possible way in which to maintain the pre-eminent excellence of Chelsea and at the same time make Chelsea a more pleasant place for its inhabitants. I have already mentioned the wearing out of facilities and the wearing out of buildings. It is essential that life should not be made intolerable for those who live adjacent to our great tourist centres. For this reason I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott) is here. He is the only Minister sitting on the Government Front Bench. He will be well aware of the problems, even though he is unable to voice a constituency interest. I hope that I have been able to voice that interest for him.

I turn to another rural aspect of tourism. The depleted Benches opposite will probably howl at me for what I am about to say. There is no doubt that the blood sport industries of this country provide a massive tourist import. Fishing in all its forms, shooting in all its forms and hunting in nearly all its forms attract people from America and from the Continent in ever-growing numbers. These interests provide employment not only for those who live in the countryside but also for those in the sporting industries. My hon. Friend the Member for Yardley, in his wide-ranging dissertation on Birmingham, forgot to mention the very successful gun-making industry in Birmingham. If it were not for the great tradition of the English best gun we should not have that great industry in Birmingham. The fact that one of our great gun-making companies in Birmingham is celebrating its centenary this year is to be welcomed. Therefore, we should be grateful to those of our rural colleagues who are providing such pleasant, healthy and open-air recreation for visitors.

My next point has already been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Yardley—the tourism generated by exhibitions and conferences. Not sufficient people know about it. The exhibition industry falls into two parts: the hall owners and those who stage the exhibitions. The national exhibition centre has been excellent for the nation and for the west midlands. However, when one drives through that area one finds that the car parks are miles away from the NEC. Better car-parking facilities ought to be provided. It is unfortunate that the car parks for the greatest motor show in the world should be scattered over so wide an area.

Mr. Bevan rose——

Sir John Wells: I shall not give way because many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. Let me continue with the point I am making about the division of the exhibition industry into its two component parts: the hall owners and those who organise the exhibitions.

The hall owners are charging higher and higher rents. It is possible for a British exhibition organiser to hire a hall in Gothenburg, Boston in the United States, Hamburg or New York and mount a cheaper exhibition than can be mounted in London or by the NEC. Hall rental and service charges are getting out of hand. In part this is due to the activities of authorities like the Greater London council which have pushed up the rates. It is also due in part to the demands of the fire officers. We respect the sensible rulings of fire officers, but I have a nasty suspicion that they believe that they must exert an ever-increasing tightening of the regulations in certain areas, not in order to save lives but in order to save their jobs. This is a harsh criticism to make, but I believe it to be true. British fire officers have a superb record. Virtually no lives have been lost as a result of fire hazard. The hazards have come from the collapse of stands and other such matters. My hon. Friend the Minister and his Department must give some guidance to fire officers. They should not be over-zealous because that is one of the contributory causes of increased charges. They should not be negligent, but there is a sensible mean course which has not been pursued in recent years.

Will my hon. Friend make representations to all the hall owners not to price themselves out of the market? In addition, I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the need for another exhibition hall or centre in Greater London. There are opportunities in the docklands. There are opportunities, not on green field sites but on demolition sites. When my hon. Friend seeks advice on that matter, I hope that he will seek it from not only one man representing one point of view, and a vested point of view at that, but from as broad a base of people as he can find who really understand the industry.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday, I asked for a statement from the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on the incident in my constituency yesterday in which what was described as an undercover unit of the British Army killed two people who were described as an active service unit of the IRA. That incident raises fundamental questions as to whether the authorities in Northern Ireland have abandoned——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): Order. I must have a point of order on which I can rule. The hon. Gentleman must not develop an argument.

Mr. Hume: I am about to make my point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That issue raises the fundamental question whether the authorities in Northern Ireland have abandoned the rule of law as their approach to the problem or whether they are dealing with——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now abusing the procedures of the House. If he has a point of order on which I can rule, I shall try to help him, but he must not try to develop an argument.

Mr. Hume: May I seek your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker? If that incident had happened in broad daylight in any city in this island it would call for a statement from a Minister. It seems to show an acceptance of a level of violence which is unacceptable to me at any rate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret that I cannot help the hon. Gentleman, but I am sure that he will be able to find ways in which he can raise the matter about which he is obviously worried.

11.12 am

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): First, I warmly welcome the excellent motives of my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) in bringing before the House today one of Britain's most important industries — tourism. I must declare an interest as parliamentary consultant to Consort Hotels, an important organisation of independent hoteliers, and also as secretary of the all-party parliamentary tourism committee.

As many of my hon. Friends have already said, tourism is an important growth industry. Britain is one of the few countries in Europe, if not in the world, which does not give adequate recognition to an industry employing some 1·5 million people, earning £5,000 million a year from overseas visitors. I am saddened—I put it no stronger than that—that the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry who has sole responsibility for tourism has not found the time in a busy day to join us in this debate, but I know that my hon. Friend the Minister will make known to him what is said. Nevertheless, this is the first debate on this important subject since the general election. We have had one short statement and several parliamentary questions, but this is the first debate.

Tourism should be managed in such a way that it generates wealth and employment at both a national and local level. Look at the enterprise in areas such as Bradford and the successful harnessing of tourists with history, along with the revitalisation of the inner cities. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) is, I am sad to say, missing, but no doubt if he were here he would mention the Bradford chop. However, the matter goes much further than gastronomy. The old satanic mills of the 19th century have been reborn.

Let me take the example of my constituency of York to illustrate the link between history and tourism. Fairfax house, recently opened in York, must be one of the finest Georgian houses in Britain, with an exquisite range of Georgian furniture. There is also a link with overseas countries. The most imaginative development of the Viking centre links Denmark with the United Kingdom —perhaps York is the Commonwealth of Scandinavia. Not least, there is the work of the churches, such as the Undercroft museum in York minster. I could give many other examples in other fine cities but those are a few that I want to single out in York.

Local initiatives rely upon councils and the Government to be sympathetic and to set the groundwork. Have local authorities an effective tourism strategy? Does each acknowledge the employment aspects and ensure close links between, for example, further education and industry? Is the infrastruture of car parking and signposting provided? When we as tourists so often visit lovely parts of the country, we find that the signposting is inadequate. The conflict generated in turn forces the local population to wear badges saying, "I'm a resident, not a tourist."

We do not want to alienate this vital and important part of our economy. It is a growth area. In England last year the local economy benefited by £7,600 million, £4,300 million of which came from British tourists. The balance came from overseas.

Does each local authority belong to its regional tourist board? There are some glaring anomalies. The south-east tourist board covers Kent, west Sussex, east Sussex and part of Surrey. Yet west Sussex, a prime county for tourism, is not a member of the board. Will my hon. Friend the Minister write to the county and district councils—to encourage them to join and participate in the management of tourism? I should like the carrot to be voluntary. Unless we can spell out the key advantages to participating in the decision-making process, we are partly working in a void.

The absence of west Sussex from the south-east tourist board means that inquiries to the board by the travel trade and the public cannot be fairly dealt with. Justice is not done to that important geographical area while a major constituent part fails to pay its dues and participate.

Of course there are and should be constraints. So far in the debate we have heard a lot in favour of tourism. However, it would be wrong not to mention some of the environmental constraints. Some years ago the Greek Orthodox church announced the text of a new prayer asking the Lord to have mercy on Greek cities, islands and villages

"which are scourged by the worldly touristic wave" and to protect the Greek people from

"these contemporary western invaders".

Many inhabitants of Britain's tourist centres, especially London, would fervently subscribe to that plea. I am not sure whether that would apply to the see of Durham. The Bishop of Durham should be mindful, before he moves into that area as well, that within his jurisdiction there is a substantial tourist trade. I hope that we shall not require such prayers on too common a basis here. We should appreciate that while tourism has many plus points we should not at the same time consume our environmental seed corn.

In an industry with a turnover of some £9 billion, more than the aerospace industry and not far short of the motor industry — an important point when one takes into account the hon. Members from the west midlands who have participated in the debate — the growth signs continue to excite. Employment in the hotel trade has increased by 7·5 per cent., or, to put it in numbers, by 17,000 and in restaurants and cafés by almost half that figure, with an additional 6,000 jobs simply in the second quarter of this year. When compared with the rest of British industry, that is a sizeable leap forward, as there was only a 1 per cent. increase for all industries and a 2 per cent. increase for the service industries. Not surprisingly, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is devoting more time to the service sector of the economy.

New jobs are being created in tourism at the rate of some 50,000 a year. That is a striking contrast with many parts of our economy, but do the Government appreciate that investment in the service sector will produce more employment per pound invested than the manufacturing and processing industries? The investment is not all in de luxe hotels. Indeed, no new hotel has been built in the nation's capital for some time. The plans for the development of the South Bank have not materialised. Tourism is just as much about the marginal hill farms with an income derived from farmhouse tourism.

One or two specific points concern me and others who have tourism closely at heart. The first is the thorny question of classification. Earlier this year, the Minister asked the English tourist board to examine ways to strengthen the voluntary registration scheme to make it a more effective weapon against poor standards. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister how far the discussions between the English, Scottish and Welsh tourist boards have gone, and how much consensus there is. Is my hon. Friend aware of the unrest in the hotel sector?

There was a proposal to have a unified registration system of one to five crowns and for it to be adopted by 1987, but hearts are being developed by the Heart of England tourist board and another symbol is being developed in the Isle of Wight. There is great confusion not only for British tourists going to another part of the country, and who want a recommendation for hotels and other forms of accommodation through such symbols, but for the overseas tourists coming to the country who see the great number of symbols and try to understand what they mean. We need one common symbol system for the United Kingdom, and proper verification, especially with all the electronic data that can be easily retrieved by the tourist and travel trade.

[Mr. Conal Gregory]

We want one system and a nationally agreed scheme, but the Grant report for the Scottish tourist board showed only 42 per cent. of its establishments were classified correctly. We need a self-policing voluntary scheme, as just under half of the establishments approached by the inquiry were not able to fill in the forms properly.

Consultation has not been adequate. Why have important organisations such as the RAC, with its vetting system and officials, the AA, Michelin and Egon Ronay not been consulted? There seems no qualitative aspect to the proposed system. We effectively have registration, which is different from classification, through the fire and hygiene regulations, but this can cause problems. At what stage is a house promoting tourism? I have this problem in York, which is a thriving centre for tourism. Does an advertisement placed by a house owner constitute a change of use? Is it letting one room to a student? Is it letting two rooms to tourists on a regular basis, or is it, as the York city council suggests, the letting of 25 per cent. of rooms? I could go on and give other examples of what is interpreted by district councils. I am trying to emphasise that, in the absence of case law, which is extremely expensive and time-consuming for small bodies to take through court, we need a move by the Executive in setting out clearly what is meant by registration. We should not leave it to local officials of each district to set different criteria.

Signposting has been referred to by my hon. Friends the Members for Sherwood and for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway). I welcome the experimental tourism signposting scheme that was used this summer in Kent, which included new brown and white signs with symbols to denote a range of tourist attractions. I look forward to hearing the outcome of the second scheme, which is to take place in Nottinghamshire next year. However, let us move further on from these two experimental schemes. Why do we not show access to hotels? Why, if one is going to a particular centre, is it not possible to see the hotels clearly shown in advance? There should be more than a little symbol on the wall saying "hotel". Is that the hotel that one is booked into? Does one want to go there? Why is there no consultation before the signs go up?

My hon. Friend the Minister may respond that this is a matter for the highways authorities, usually the county councils, which do not generally permit hotel signs within the highway boundary. There is the associated problem, as the nation takes more and more to cars, of car parks in national tourist parks. Tourists clearly require accommodation, refreshment and a variety of services. Therefore, the responsibility for requiring a criterion that will be adopted on a local and regional basis may revert to the Department of Trade and Industry. Again, in the example of signposting, we are showing lack of co-ordination.

The third sector in which we show a lack of co-ordination is licensing. This occupied the time of the House a week ago, and many of us participated in that debate or read with considerable interest the views of our hon. Friends. However, it is time to implement reforms and to see licensing in the wider framework of tourism. Why should a visitor from another part of the country or an overseas visitor who is seeking refreshment, whether alcoholic or not, find only that he is told the time of day?

It would be remiss if we did not draw attention to the importance of education for tourism. Clearly, there is an inadequate link between education and tourism. There is too great a concentration of resources on management skills rather than on craft courses. We need assistance at all levels. How often, when we have been to a hotel, restaurant or café, are we served by non-EC nationals or EC nationals of another state? I am in favour of mobility and I am glad to see that so many people come to Britain, but it is sad when so many youngsters are not going on craft courses despite unemployment. We need to develop the craft side and give a feeling of satisfaction in a growth industry. I hope that my hon. Friends in the Department of Employment will take this on board. Will they visit jobcentres and the hotel and catering schools and talk to hoteliers and restaurateurs?

Many of my points have been about the lack of co-ordination. Different Departments are working on tourism. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan) referred to five Departments concerned with tourism, plus the Department of Trade and Industry. That is stating the case by half. Twelve Departments are involved with tourism, and I shall mention these to show how much we need a co-ordinating committee that will pull this together.

First, there is the Department of Trade and Industry, with specific responsibility for tourism. Secondly, there is the Treasury, with responsibility for fiscal matters. How much of the new tax approved in the autumn statement in this House last night will go towards developing the infrastructure of tourism? Thirdly, there is the Department of Transport, which is concerned with highways, with coach and train regulations, and with the provision of adequate coach and car parking in great cities such as London. Fourthly, the Home Office has responsibility for licensing and for fire regulations. It is also responsible for television licensing. There was a significant lack of consultation when the new rates for television licensing were introduced for the hotel industry. Fifthly, there is the Department of Employment, which obviously is concerned with employment matters.

Sixthly, there is the Department of Education and Science. Here it should be noted that the tourist industry, through its hotels and catering, provides two vacancies for every university graduate. No other industry in Britain could make that claim. Seventhly, the responsibilities of the Department of the Environment include sport. Eighthly, the Department of Health and Social Security is responsible for the health regulations governing hotels and other accommodation. Ninthly, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is concerned with farmhouse tourism. Tenthly, the Foreign Office obviously has a responsibility for the overseas aspects of tourism. The eleventh and twelfth examples are the Scottish Office and Welsh Office, and to make it a baker's dozen we have also the Northern Ireland Office.

Through unco-ordination there has been confusion in an industry that is essentially voluntary. We need to co-ordinate and to recognise the potential of tourism. We need a Minister whose sole responsibility is tourism and who will ensure that the industry goes from strength to strength.

Little mention is made in Britain of the European Community's investment in tourism. In the period from 1975 to 1983, tourism projects represented under 1 per cent. of the total European regional development fund allocation. Britain benefited most. The allocations of grant to Britain for tourism for infrastructure projects were £9·03 million. It is interesting to note how we compare in that respect with the other member states of the European Community. It is obvious that we are doing extremely well. West Germany comes next, with an allocation of £7·2 million. Then there are Italy, with £6·8 million, France with £1·5 million, and Denmark with a mere £42,000. There is no such investment in Ireland, the Netherlands, Greece, Belgium and Luxembourg. Therefore, we are using our channels of communication correctly in the interests of tourism by seeking sums from the EC, and that effort should be applauded.

In November last year, my hon. Friend who has responsibility for tourism announced that he planned to maintain grants for section 4 expenditure in England at about the current level over the four years until 1986-87, making a total of about £35 million for the period.

The industry needs more incentives. There is a need for much more co-ordination and recognition. We are sowing a seed that is bearing fruit. Let us consider that today.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I intervene at this point in the debate because I think that there is a danger —I exempt the hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory), who has just made a thoughtful speech, from my criticism —of the debate becoming a series of encomia for the tourist attractions of the constituencies represented by the speakers, and I am anxious to give the debate a slightly sharper focus.

I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) chose tourism as his topic following his luck in the ballot. His interesting contribution gave the debate a worthwhile start. I wonder whether his constituents in Sherwood, when looking at the hon. Gentleman's 1 per cent. majority and thinking of the deficiencies of the Conservative Government's record in regard to tourism and many other matters, may think that he did enough this morning at least to guarantee himself a job in tourism after the next general election.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Does not the hon. Member recognise that in the past six months 20,000 members of the National Union of Mineworkers have withdrawn their political levy to the Labour party?

Mr. Gould: I thought that I was rather generous in giving way so early in my speech, but I shall not be diverted by that sort of point. However, I hasten to agree with another point that the hon. Gentleman and other speakers have made—that we should all welcome and recognise the importance of the tourist industry.

There is no question but that an industry that now has a turnover of about £8 billion is of very substantial significance. It is an industry whose foreign exchange earnings will, we hope, approach about £5 billion. That is of very considerable value and benefit to the economy. We are told that 1·4 million jobs are produced by the industry. There is some slight variation in the figures that are given. It is notoriously difficult to ascribe certain kinds of economic activity to tourism. It is difficult to separate the meals bought in restaurants by tourists from those bought by local inhabitants. Nevertheless, I am content to accept the figure of 1·4 million jobs. I also accept the argument that tourism, by its nature, is a labour-intensive industry, and is likely to provide yet more jobs in the future.

I listened to and understand the predictions that tourism might well create 50,000 new jobs a year, and that there might be 250,000 jobs to come from that source over the next few years. That has been recognised by the Confederation of British Industry, which has instituted its own examination of the job creation prospects.

The debate takes place in the context of a somewhat wider argument concerning the role of service industries as compared with that of manufacturing industries in our economy. I do not think that we need get too bogged down on that argument. However, when I hear Conservative Members, such as the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), claim that tourism is our only growth industry, I fear that that tells us little about tourism but a great deal about the state of the rest of the economy. If our economy were as flourishing and as healthy as is sometimes pretended by Conservative Members we would not be pointing to tourism as our only example of growth. We would be looking, as the Prime Minister herself did only a year or two ago, to electronics and information technology, not to mention all the other aspects of manufacturing industry that have so sadly suffered over recent years.

While registering the point that the tourist industry figures, in terms of turnover, foreign exchange earnings and employment, all look somewhat better than they should—simply because the industry is at least keeping its head above water while so many others are sinking —we cannot afford the luxury of picking and choosing between jobs in one industry or another. We are not in a position to say that we would much rather have higher paid jobs or more highly skilled jobs somewhere else. In our position we are bound to take what we can get. That is a sad reflection of our present economic plight, but it is nevertheless a realistic acceptance of it. So, when hon. Members and all those involved in the industry point to the real prospect of job creation, I am prepared to acknowledge and welcome it. But that in turn imposes an obligation on the Government and on the industry to make sure that the job prospects are brought to fruition, and that real efforts are made to maximise that potential. In that context there has been a danger this morning of being somewhat carried away by euphoria.

One speaker after another, intent on praising the attractions of his own constituency, has tended to give a somewhat one-sided picture of the way in which the industry is developing. As in so many other matters, Conservative members have a curious blind spot—it may be shared by the Minister when he responds—in looking at balance of trade figures. They are very content to point to figures that show an increase in our foreign exchange earnings but seem totally oblivious of the other side of the account. Although the picture is promising and offers some hope for the future, it is by no means as healthy and as satisfactory as has sometimes been suggested during the debate.

The number of overseas visitors, for example, is only now approaching the peak that it reached in the late 1970s. There followed an enormous trough, and that in turn was reflected in tourism's contribution to the balance of trade figures. In 1981, virtually for the first time in modern history, an industry which traditionally had earned us a substantial balance of foreign exchange payments went into a deficit of £302 million. The following year the deficit rose to £472 million. In 1983 there was a slight improvement, with a deficit of £399 million. This year we appear to be on course for a deficit of about £354 million. Most worrying is the forecast commissioned by the industry, which suggests that by 1987 the deficit will have increased to £519 million.

Looking back over the recent period we have to recognise that the number of overseas visitors spending nights here between 1980 and 1983 fell by 2·5 per cent., whereas the number of British visitors who spent nights abroad rose by 51·4 per cent. The trend is very much against us.

The industry's own forecast is that between 1982 and 1987 the number of long holidays taken in Great Britain, whether by overseas tourists or by British holidaymakers, will fall by 2 per cent. The rosy forecasts so often made for employment in the industry will be realised only if real efforts are made to ensure that that growth occurs.

Unfortunately, when we consider the factors which will influence that development we find that, true to form, and in this case quite realistically, the Government take the view that the most important influence on the future of the industry is the general economic climate. I say "unfortunately" because the experience of the past three or four years suggests exactly what impact the general economic climate has on the tourist industry. We have moved into deficit in the industry, because the figures fell in exactly the same way as so many other industries suffered.

It is easier to identify some of the precise causes when we consider tourism. One of the them was the grossly overvalued exchange rate against the American dollar. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan) pointed out, it is true that that has been remedied. We see the benefits of having a more realistic exchange rate. But the pound remains substantially overvalued on any reckonable basis against many of the European currencies, and that must still be hurting our tourist industry.

But it is more than just a question of an overvalued exchange rate. It is the general climate in which investment throughout the economy has been depressed in recent years, and again it is possible to identify the respects in which the tourist industry is peculiarly vulnerable to some of these developments.

The Government have made great efforts over recent years to cut the level of spending on public services and to prevent local and other authorities from maintaining their levels of expenditure. The consequence is that many basic services on which tourism depends, such as public transport, are now less good, less efficient and less good value for money than they were only a few years ago. As a consequence of our impoverishment through high unemployment, we are now a shabbier, scruffier, dirtier country to visit than even a few years ago. Anyone who cares to visit European cities will notice the staggering contrast between the levels of cleanliness and prosperity visible in the streets of our major cities. That is a great deterrent—one which we shall ignore at our peril—to overseas visitors. They find that the promoted tourist attractions are well worth visiting, but the time that they spend scruffing around our increasingly dirty streets because local authorities cannot afford to clean them properly is becoming less and less pleasant for them.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): My hon. Friend should look at Wandsworth.

Mr. Gould: Wandsworth is a case in point.

The Government are in grave danger of making this worse. In the future we know that there will be even less spent on some of these services. The trend of Government policy on taxation will add to indirect taxes and make our country more expensive for tourists as a result. There is a great deal implicit in the Government's economic policies over the past three or four years and what they propose to do in the remainder of their term of office which, inexorably, will move against the interests of a developing tourist industry.

Apart from reversing their overall policies, which is unlikely, the only way that the Government can remedy the situation is by taking some action to promote tourism directly. Many hon. Members have rightly said that the prime responsibility must rest with private enterprise. But it has been noticeable and noteworthy how many of them have managed to slip in a plea for this or that public expenditure project to promote tourism. The hon. Member for Yardley ran up a bill approaching £1 billion by the end of his shopping list. He was looking for very substantial intervention.

Mr. Bevan: Will not the hon. Gentleman agree a figure of £54 million, which is somewhat less than he suggested?

Mr. Gould: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has costed it, but I doubt whether even £54 million will get past his right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary.

The Government also have an obligation to shape the structure of public involvement in the industry. Just over a year ago we had a statement by the Minister of State following the long-awaited results of the review of the tourist industry. What was announced then was a slightly curious mish-mash of a reorganisation. Everyone accepted that something had to be done, but what came forward was what might be described as a half-way house. It was neither a merger nor a clear division of responsibilities. We have the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board operating under the same chairman but still with somewhat different functions. It will be interesting to hear the Minister say how he sees that reorganisation developing. Has it been successful? Is it working well? What further changes does he think may be necessary? Is it still the case, for example, that the Scottish and Welsh tourist boards are in limbo, without a clear relationship established with the more central authorities?

Then there is the role of the regional boards. This is a matter about which I know the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) has been extremely worried. He argues—and I agree with him—that to stimulate tourism in the regions, which has been the theme of so many speeches in the debate, we need more powerful, though possibly fewer, and better resourced regional boards. There is no sign that that is the direction that the Government are taking.

The London tourist board is a good example. Only a year ago the Minister told us that London was the gateway for English tourism and that that was where our effort had to be concentrated. The London board is now issuing cries of distress because it has lost its GLC funding. If the Government have their way there is little prospect of that being restored, yet they have done little by way of response to that loss of resources.

In the last financial year, the general resources available to all the regional boards fell in comparison with the preceding year, though admittedly only by 0·2 per cent. When the industry pleaded for help through capital allowances, the Government, claiming that they were treating the tourist industry in the same way as manufacturing industry, refused it capital allowances and reduced those available to the manufacturing industry.

Several hon. Members have stressed the need for more training in the tourist industry. That is a general problem. We have paid far too little attention to the training of skilled people in industry, and tourism is no exception.

The local authorities have an important role in promoting tourism in the regions. They are able to make proper co-ordinated arrangements with regional tourist boards and other interested parties. Again, the thrust of the Government's policy is to reduce the resources available to local authorities. If the authorities showed any signs of wanting to do something on the lines suggested by the hon. Member for Yardley they would promptly be rate-capped and told that they were acting beyond their competence.

In the tourist industry, as in so many other industries, the prospects and potential are obvious, but the Government offer nothing more than rhetoric. They say that they see a wonderful and glorious future for the tourist industry, but that it has nothing to do with them. They say that the industry must get on by itself and that they will create the economic climate in which its efforts will succeed. Unfortunately, difficulties of a general economic nature will penalise and handicap the tourist industry.

When the Minister replies to today's excellent speeches, I hope that he will make a practical commitment in terms of interest and, most of all, in terms of resources. We do not want the Government to fund the entire enterprise. We want them to provide the seed money, without which the potential for the tourist industry cannot be realised.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) was full of doom and gloom. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan) and others have made clear, tourism into Britain remains buoyant. Tourists from the United States are increasing because of the rise in the value of the dollar and more tourists are arriving from Europe, Japan and the rest of the world.

We should not be gloomy. Tourism is a great growth industry. Britain pulls the crowds. Tourists spend £5 billion a year here. Tourism is a job creator. The hon. Member for Dagenham rightly said that we cannot pick and choose which jobs we create, yet many people are noticeably unenthusiastic about tourism. One wonders why. I have identified three reasons.

The first is a vague feeling that the production of physical objects has a higher value than the production of services. That is sheer nonsense. What matters is that people's demands and requirements are met, so that employment is generated. It does not matter whether one manufactures something which, when dropped, hurts one's toe, or whether one provides a service such as insurance or hotel accommodation. We must get away from the peculiar metaphysical distinction between the production of goods and the production of services, because it makes no sense.

Secondly, some people find tourist annoying. They jostle on pavements; there are many of them; they queue in shops and cause delays for local shoppers. We must get over that because of the economic importance of tourists.

Thirdly, in some people's minds tourism is linked with hotels and restaurants and some think that cooks, waiters and those doing other quasi-domestic work are servile. That traditional British attitude has never been shared on the continent, where the chef at a restaurant or hotel and his staff are honoured and respected as highly valued citizens.

Perhaps that prejudice in Britain has diminished with increased foreign travel. I am not sure how far that process has been hastened or otherwise by the large number of British girls who, in the last 20 or 30 years, have gone on holiday and fallen in love with Italian, Spanish or Greek waiters or others employed in the tourist trade.

Tourism is vital. It has great potential for increasing employment. People come to Britain not only to seek specific enjoyments that generate income and employment, such as the arts, our heritage, our traditions and the beauty of our countryside, to patronise hotels and restaurants or even to shop. Many tourists come here simply to wander around to see what they can see and get the feel of the place.

According to the ETB's digest of tourist statistics for 1983, a survey of people leaving the country revealed that the two most popular tourist spots were Piccadilly circus and Trafalgar square. They were more popular than Buckingham palace, Westminster abbey, the Houses of Parliament and Big Ben, the Tower of London, St. Paul's cathedral, the National gallery, the British museum and other venues in London and the provinces.

Such places are so overcrowded that we should concentrate on dispersing tourists nationally and locally. London has its great art galleries and historic places such as the National gallery, the British museum, the Tate gallery, the Victoria and Albert museum and the science museums. We should try to persuade more tourists to visit other places such as the magnificent Wallace collection, the splendid Dulwich picture gallery and the Imperial war museum in south London.

The same applies to the east midlands. Another table in the digest says that the number of visitors to Burghley house, Stamford, between 1982 and 1983 rose from 46,600 to 61,400—an increase of 32 per cent. in a year. That is a remarkable achievement.

There is much to see all over Britain. We should try to persuade more tourists into the mark 2 places instead of trying to cram them all into the Tower of London, Stonehenge, Stratford-on-Avon and Hampton court in my constituency, which is one of the most popular places in the country.

Much more can be seen in the Twickenham area besides Hampton court. Twickenham Week was started four years ago when the Prince of Wales visited the area on the 900th anniversary of the town. I have the honour to be president of Twickenham Week. The occasion boosts the area, which contains many historic and lovely buildings, including the historic St. Mary's church, Marble Hill house, and Orleans house gallery. Many places in Teddington are also worth seeing. I refer to St. Mary's church, the famous Horace Walpole house and Strawberry Hill, which was the foundation for the new gothic architecture without which the Palace of Westminster would never have been constructed in the 19th century.

[Mr. Toby Jessel]

Near Hampton court there is Bushy park and Garrick's villa, and many other places are to be seen along the Thames.

Hampton court itself remains an important place and its interior was visited last year by about 500,000, in addition to those who visited the gardens. Its success was augmented by the son et lumière programme of its history, which was presented in aid of the Save the Children Fund and sponsored by the Milk Marketing Board, whose headquarters is nearby.

There is a problem with the increase in the number of restaurants in outer London areas, where traditionally residents are not used to so many. There were about a dozen restaurants in my constituency 15 years ago, and now there are well over 30. Given the nature of the area and the size of the main streets, some of the restaurants are close to housing areas.

There is an increasing demand for the services provided by restaurants, both from tourists and local people. However, when a restaurateur wants to open a new restaurant, he encounters planning difficulties. There is often local opposition because of the need to provide car parking space, the noise of doors being slammed late at night and the way in which cooking smells and canned music impinge on the environment of those living nearby. This problem has arisen in several places locally and seems bound to continue.

There is conflict between the demand for restaurants, which stems partly from the growth of tourism, and the protection of the environment of those living nearby. I hope that the Department of the Environment will co-ordinate experience in different parts of the country to ascertain what we can learn from one another in resolving a problem which has given rise to considerable local controversy in many areas.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood for having brought the motion before the House and given us the opportunity to debate it. I fully support it.

12.3 pm

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): I, too, extend my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) for providing us with an opportunity to discuss the important subject of tourism and employment. The House will know of my interest in the subject as a constituency Member and as the parliamentary consultant to the British Hotels, Restaurants and Caterers Association.

It is an unfortunate fact that all Governments spend far too much time attempting to save declining industries and giving insufficient attention positively to support and encourage successful and expanding sectors of the economy. We all know why this unsatisfactory situation exists. It has become a characteristic of our system that Governments, for whatever reason, spend a disproportionate amount of time in responding to events rather than seeking to influence the pattern and sequence of future developments.

There is no doubt in my mind that tourism, and especially the Government's attitude to the industry, is caught up in the unfortunate framework to which I have referred. However, the present Administration have made certain attempts to enable the tourist industry to break out of the dilemma. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry and his immediate predecessor, Mr. Iain Sproat, carried out a thorough investigation of the tourist industry. They deserve much credit for taking that initiative. Their review of tourism has led at least to the establishment of the basis of a fabric for a future strategy for tourism. It is important that we do not lose this initiative.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) observed that in structural terms we need to follow through that initiative on behalf of the regional tourist boards. We must also maintain the impetus in a financial context, especially as there is a good base on which to build.

Tourism is our largest growth industry. It is estimated that 1·4 million are employed in it. Furthermore, it is creating about 50,000 new jobs annually. That figure is in stark contrast to the regrettable job-shedding that is taking place in so many sectors of the economy. Tourism is the greatest single earner of foreign currency. It produces annually about £5,000 million in invisible exports. In addition, it is earning about £6,000 million from the domestic market. It can be justly proud of its record nationally on behalf of those who are involved in it.

I welcome the initiatives that have been taken by Ministers and I welcome also the recent announcement of the CBI to carry out a study into job creation prospects in the tourist industry. Both the Government and the CBI have recognised the important role that tourism can and should play in our economic and social life. Our immediate task is to persuade Ministers of the need for some modest pump priming to increase the momentum. I shall suggest one or two ways in which that should be done.

Section 4 grant aid for approved projects is now available throughout the country. I was all in favour of that development. In addition, my hon. Friend the Minister of State has ensured that greater emphasis is placed on what might be described as the two sharp ends, the need to persuade overseas visitors to come to the United Kingdom and, secondly, the need to ensure that once they are here their requirements and expectations are met. It is in the latter context that section 4 grant aid is important.

In 1983-84 the English tourist board allocated £6·3 million for this purpose. It was able to assist 503 projects. That meant that 116 projects were assisted in the south-west at a cost of £2·76 million. Although 116 projects were assisted, 151 were approved by the West Country tourist board. That means that a significant number of worthwhile projects had to be excluded because of financial constraints. The cost to the taxpayer of the creation of each full-time job in tourism in the south-west is about £5,000. That is money well spent, besides the fact that it is cost effective. In my constituency of Cornwall, South-East unemployment is 16 per cent. We all know that the cost to the nation of each of those unemployed is almost £6,000 a year. I should have thought that that was a worthwhile conversion ratio in respect of the money made available under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969.

Last year, some 3,500 places were made available for training through the provisions of the hotel and catering industry training board. About 90 per cent. obtained jobs at the end of their year's training with the employer with whom they had spent most of their time. I gather that this year more places are available than have been taken up. I should have thought that the Government, and especially the Department of Employment, had a responsibility to make that information more readily available. Increasingly, there are enhanced career structures in employment in the tourist industry.

Excellent work has been undertaken by COSIRA—the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas. That council does an excellent job. I welcome its emphasis in trying to persuade people to diversify their plans and its advocacy of the concept of, for example, multi-purpose land use in conjunction with agriculture, especially in the hill areas.

I emphasise the need for an adequate infrastructure. The issue of roads and signposting is important. I support everything my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) said about the need for a fundamental reform of the licensing system. Such a reform is long overdue.

I emphasise the importance of tourism to regional economies. My county of Cornwall has more than 3 million visitors a year but, sadly, only 10 per cent. of them come from overseas. I certainly share the view of my hon. Friends that we should move away from the London-Stratford-Oxford-Cambridge circuit. Nevertheless, £250 million is spent by visitors in Cornwall of which, it is estimated, £90 million stays within the county. The equivalent of 25,000 full-time jobs are provided by the tourist industry. There is no doubt that the tourist industry has an important part to play not only in the national and regional economy but in providing greater job opportunities. I hope that, as a result of this debate, the Government will at least take on board some modest financial pump priming to ensure that the momentum is sustained.

Mr. Peter Hubbard-Miles (Bridgend): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a brief contribution to this debate as the only Member present representing a Welsh constituency. I recognise the fact that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is not directly responsible for tourism in Wales, but I am sure that my comments will find their way to the right desk.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) painted a scenario similar to the one in which my constituency is set. My constituency is perhaps suffering because it contains a famous coalfield and industrial area. It is not recognised sufficiently as an area of great beauty and historical interest. Travelling through the area, as I do regularly, one crosses the Severn and is then close to the beautiful area of the Wye and Usk valleys. One then goes through the Vale of Glamorgan to the Gower peninsula. If properly presented, this area will become a great centre for tourism.

I was interested to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood romanticise about Robin Hood and Maid Marian. I understand that recent research leads us to suspect that King Arthur was buried within or close to the boundaries of my constituency.

Within my constituency—and perhaps unknown even to those living there—there is tremendous historical interest. Within three or four miles of one another are the castles of Ogmore, Coity and Candlestone. The Roman road leading from Cardiff to the west called at the buried city of Cynffig which is another area of great interest. My constituency on the Bristol channel has nine miles of golden sands from the east to the west and, if the tide is right, I can walk the whole length of my constituency on golden sands.

The Welsh scene includes the Wales tourist board, the Welsh Development Agency, the Welsh water authority and, recently, CADW which has been created to look after the ancient and historic monuments in Wales. Greater co-operation and co-ordination is needed between those bodies. We must recognise that, together with local authorities and central Government, they all have a part to play in bringing about an awareness of the need to develop tourism in this area of high unemployment.

There has been considerable investment by the private sector. New hotels have begun to spring up in various places. Local authorities, together with the Welsh Development Agency, have developed marinas and coastal attractions. I hope that the commercial success of Superted—the Welsh Rupert—will result in a Superted theme park on the south Wales coast.

I have referred to being able to walk along the golden sands that stretch from one end of my constituency to the other. That is where the crunch comes, or perhaps I should say squelch, ouch or yuk. One may find oneself walking not on golden sands but on a deposit from the inadequate and antiquated sewage disposal units which occur on the south Wales beaches and, I imagine, at many other coastal resorts.

The Welsh water authority has a programme for the modernisation of those sewage disposal units. It has a capital programme amounting to about £75 million over the next 10 years. Investment in such schemes is necessary. They will be profitable by improving the prospect of tourist development. I make no apology for urging my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to ensure that no impediment is placed in the way of the development of those sewage disposal units so that the polluted beaches can be cleaned up.

I should not like hon. Members to imagine that all beaches are polluted. Most of those in my area are up to EEC standards. The fact that one or two are not up to those standards but are heavily polluted is bound to detract from the tourist value of the area. It is a matter of great anxiety to many that the developments should not be hindered.

Recently, the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) opened a new plant in his constituency. As a result, the number of complaints about pollution of the beaches east of the Mumbles dropped dramatically last summer. A continuation of that programme is needed in Barry and my home town of Porthcawl where there is desperate need for a new sewage disposal unit.

I should like to pay tribute to those conservation, preservation and historic societies which take care of and protect our places of beauty and historical interest. They do a tremendous job of making people aware of the interesting parts of the environment. There are times, however, when they pay more attention to the means of achieving their objective than to the objective itself. While they argue about where a sewage outfall should be sited, the four-letter word remains on the beaches. It is sometines distressing to think that those who seek to improve and protect the environment are deferring the time when it will be improved.

The parts of south Wales that I represent, and the constituencies along the south Wales coast, suffer seriously from unemployment. We have the infrastructure. The M4 and the 125 inter-city line run through the middle of my constituency. That has enabled the Secretary of State to attract inward investment to the area. Considerable success has been achieved in bringing industry to that part of south Wales. There have been the Ford, Sony, Smith Kendon and Callard and Bowser factories, and now the new science park which has attracted a number of companies from America. Good communications should encourage the Secretary of State to take even greater advantage of the area. He should use them to develop the tourist industry.

It is a matter of great joy to me that, with good communications backed by the Cardiff airport, industry from all over the world is taking its place in the Principality—in the industrial and coal mining areas of south Wales.

We have places of great beauty and historical interest in south Wales. Much can therefore be done to alleviate unemployment by improving the tourist attractions. I hope that the Secretary of State will seek to bring together the agencies involved in tourism, make the south Wales coast another great attraction for tourists and allow the area to make its ever-increasing contribution to solving the unemployment problem.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): The House will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) for choosing this subject for debate today and also for his distinguished speech. It seems to me that he has talents not just as an accomplished parliamentarian but as a future Hollywood screen writer, as he showed with his reference to Robin Hood and Maid Marian.

There have been many good contributions from the Conservative Benches, but it is unfortunate that a depressing feature of the debate is that there has been almost complete silence from and absence of Opposition Members. One is almost tempted to ask, "Do they not care about where the new jobs are coming from?" If nothing else has emerged from the debate, it has become clear that tourism is one of the great growth industries of the future.

We have heard, time and time again, that the industry employs 1·4 million people and that 50,000 new jobs a year are being created. Of which other industry can it be said that over the next five years—before the end of the decade—250,000 new jobs will be created? However, the Opposition do not wish to take part in the deliberations about its future. The industry has been consistently undervalued and underrated. So much so that tourism is the slumbering giant of British industry. If my hon. Friend's debate does nothing else, I hope that it will improve our national and parliamentary perception of the potential of tourism.

A change of attitude is needed by the Government, Parliament, industry and the public. I should like to share my few thoughts on the subject with the House. A change of attitude within Government has, to some extent, already started. My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibilities for tourism has done a fine job of overhauling the tourist boards. But one energetic Minister does not make a Government policy. Improvements are needed in the Government's attitude towards tourism.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) spoke eloquently—I wholeheartedly agreed with him—about the lack of co-ordination in the tourist industry. The problem goes deeper than that. The flow of information, especially statistical information, to Government on tourism is amateurish and inadequate in comparison with other industries. Even the most specialised classification of manufacturing industry is carefully watched by the Government in terms of statistics and the monitoring of figures, but the statistics on tourism are not much better than mere assertions provided by tourist boards.

We do not know where the 50,000 new jobs a year are coming from, nor do we know how the £5 billion a year of foreign currency earnings is spent. There is a whole range of leisure industries, such as gardening, do-it-yourself, health and fitness businesses and sports clothing industries, that are untabulated and unrecognised in job-creating and financial statistics. The entire database of the tourist industry is weak, especially when compared with other industries, such as the heavy and electronics industries, and needs to be overhauled.

Secondly, there needs to be a change in the Government's attitude towards the tourist industry and grants. So far they seem to have been positively parsimonious in their efforts to prime the pump for Britain's fastest-growing industry. The largest source of grants for tourism comes from section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969. These are running at the rate of £35 million for the next four years, that is, at about £9 million a year. That is not much for an industry that is creating 50,000 new jobs a year. Even when the coal industry is working, it employs only 250,000 people, but the taxpayer subsidises that industry to the tune of £1·3 billion a year, even in a good year. In comparison, therefore, tourism seems to be the poor cousin.

The time has come to shift ministerial responsibility for tourism from the Department of Trade and Industry to the Department of Employment. I mean no reflection on any of my hon. Friends who are Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry, especially not on my hon. Friend the Minister of State who has responsibility for tourism, but that responsibility nevertheless needs to be changed for two reasons.

First, our most important fight is for jobs. Tourism is one of the few battlefields on which the nation is winning. We need to continue to win that battle. Employment is the key to the future of tourism and needs to be recognised as such by the Department, which has a large budget to encourage further employment. Until about a year ago the Department of Trade and Industry used to look at tourism almost entirely in terms of statistics for imports and exports. But tourism must be considered primarily in terms of jobs.

Tourism should also be considered in terms of training. Again, the Department of Employment is the spearhead Department in training matters and needs to seize that responsibility. There is a need for a change of attitude towards training in the tourist industry. The industry is crying out for a new training structure. As a nation we are not yet accustomed to the concept of professional service and hospitality, as it is understood and trained for by other tourist nations, such as the Swiss. British tourism is still bedevilled by what may be called the Fawlty Towers dimension of service.

All hon. Members know of the stereotypes, such as the grumpy cab driver, the surly waiter, the scatterbrained telephonist and the cleaner who flicks round with a duster that leaves the room even dustier when he or she has finished. Although the British love to laugh at those archetypal characters from "Manuel" country, visitors to Britain may have a different reaction when they encounter them. Obviously I speak of a minority. For every one Fawlty Towers there are probably 50 good hotels. However, we need a training programme in the tourist industry and a training programme for the marketing side of the tourist industry.

The attitude of the public to tourism needs to be changed, especially the attitude of Opposition Members. British thinking remains rooted in the past when it comes to jobs. There is a great deal of macho union talk about the dignity of labour, as though this phrase refers only to heavy industry labour in smoke-stack Britain. Yet we are living in a era of massive and uncomfortable structural change in British employment.

Tourism has a great part to play in the new structure, but it still has a second-class status, even among the new sunrise industries. The Government rightly place much emphasis on the North sea oil and gas industry. Offshore, it employs only about 21,000 people. The Government's great white hope for jobs—cable television, which I persist in thinking will amount only to a licence to lose money—employs even fewer people. Well established high technology industries such as aerospace and computers are far smaller than the tourist industry. It is important, too, to bear in mind that high technology sunrise industries engineer labour out of the system whereas the tourist industry is labour-intensive and highly resistant to machine replacement.

As professionalism in the tourist industry grows, so I believe will recognition that there is just as much dignity of labour and managerial and technical skill in that industry as in any other. This becomes clear when one considers the specialisations within the industry. I shall refer to one of which I have professional knowledge—the health and exercise sector. I declare an interest as chairman of a health hydro. That sector of the industry did not exist 10 years ago but today there are many health hydros, health farms, exercise centres, fitness classes, body maintenance organisations, spas and gymnasia employing, at a rough guess, between 50,000 and 100,000 people. It is labour-intensive, it has large foreign currency earnings, job satisfaction is high, and it deserves encouragement.

Most tourist enterprises will always be cottage industries to some extent, inspired by individual proprietors and relatively small business men. In terms of creating jobs for the future the Government should seriously consider large tourist projects that create large numbers of jobs. Here I refer to the success of Alton towers and other theme parks, which seem not to have existed a few years ago but are now major employers. Alton towers' latest development is to transform Battersea power station into a huge pleasure park á la Disneyland, directly creating 4,000 jobs in south London and perhaps a further 2,000 indirectly. The Government should study the pump-priming effect of such major tourist magnets as theme parks and sports centres.

My constitueny is in east Kent, which has a very high rate of unemployment—nudging 20 per cent. One job in every 10 is in tourism, which employs a total of about 18,000. The area is well supplied—perhaps even over-supplied—with hotels and boarding houses and we have experience of the magnet effect of a major tourist attraction such as a sporting event. This year, Sandwich is once again proud to be the venue for the open golf championship. This means that for a week or so in the summer 130,000 extra visitors come to east Kent, many flying into Manston airport on charter aircraft from overseas, filling all the restaurants, hotels and boarding houses and bringing an enormous transfusion of economic vitality to the local tourist industry. If only we could have such a magnet all the year round or at least for the peak months.

I would like to see established in east Kent a magnet such as a national exercise and fitness centre; or an all-year-round garden centre; or a major national sports complex; or a coastal national park with nature trails and jogging tracks; or a historical theme park illustrating some of the pageant of English history at the Bulwark shore, from the landing of St. Augustine to the retreat from Dunkirk. A project of this kind in east Kent would be an enormous creator of jobs. The total cost of building such a centre would be perhaps £10 million or £15 million—far less than the £25 million that the Kent coalfield and its 2,400 miners lose annually on their activities in the same region.

I have sought to illustrate from a national as well as a constituency angle that at this time of our country's history, when the Government deserve credit for having to some extent won the battle against inflation but have not yet really begun to fight the battle against unemployment, tourism is a vital part of the battle and more attention and activity by Government and everyone else deserves to be devoted to it.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) on raising this important matter and on his excellent opening speech. As a number of hon. Members have said, tourism can and does play an important part in revitalising inner city areas, especially those suffering economic and social decline. It can provide new jobs where they are most needed. It is worth repeating that British tourists spent some £4 billion in England last year and that overseas tourists in Britain spent over £3 billion. We can conclude from that that Britain is one of the most popular tourist areas in the world.

Tourism benefits local communities by attracting money and providing jobs as well as creating and supporting extra amenities and facilities which are available for the residents to enjoy. That is why it is to be hoped that no local authority will ignore the tourist potential of their own area.

Figures published by British Business—a weekly news magazine published by the Department of Trade and Industry—show an encouraging increase in employment in many tourism-related industries in the second quarter of this year. That is especially welcome in the east Midlands. As has been said, employment in the hotel trade has increased by over 17,000 — 7·5 per cent. — while employment in restaurants and cafés has increased by 3·5 per cent., providing over 6,000 more jobs.

It is the service industries that are currently showing the biggest growth, and that is due in no small measure to tourism. In the east Midlands, in particular, that is an encouraging development.

I believe that tourism will remain one of the great growth industries, and I hope that the east Midlands as a whole will grasp the opportunity that it presents. Some people may say that certain cities are at a disadvantage in that events of historical importance may have happened elsewhere. I do not accept that argument. Cities are often surrounded by beautiful countryside and numerous stately homes, castles and other tourist attractions, and they are ideally placed to be promoted as centres for touring holidays. Tourists today are far more mobile than ever before. The cities themselves can provide entertainment and other attractions for travelling tourists who may be visiting nearby areas. We should not accept the idea that in order to exploit tourism one requires the presence of a castle or stately home. Cities in the east Midlands can increase their tourist potential, even with the absence of crumbling monuments in their midst, by providing entertainment and recreational activities.

It is not always necessary to spend huge sums from public funds. Many firms are becoming aware at last of the benefits to the local economy that can be derived from tourism and from increasing the attractiveness of inner city areas. One of the welcome developments of the past few years has been the increased sponsorship of the arts and live entertainment events by business. That trend should be welcomed.

I congratulate the English tourist board on its plans to publish the first-ever handbook, which, I understand, is aimed at school leavers and careers advisers, on employment opportunities in tourism. As tourism expands it will need to train and employ many people.

Most right hon. and hon. Members have mentioned the areas that they represent, so I do not apologise for referring to mine and surrounding areas. Derbyshire is and deserves to be an excellent and established tourist area. Britain's first national park is in Derbyshire and at Matlock Bath we have the country's first cablecar system. Wirksworth, which used to be the capital of lead mining in the midlands, is now a thriving tourist area. Crich has a tramway museum. At Hartington, former railway lines have been used imaginatively to provide the Tissington trail and the High Peak trail which are ideal for cycling or walking through a beautiful area which is also of historic interest. Nearby Bakewell, which is known for its tarts of a non-human variety, has been known since Saxon times for its iron-rich springs and fine gardens.

I was amazed to learn quite recently that there is a castle at Bolsover. I do not want to be provocative so I shall not suggest a possible use for its dungeon. However, information and publicity is extremely important and perhaps the district of Bolsover should try to get some publicity for the area's more positive features.

In the city that I have the honour to represent, we have the Royal Crown Derby factory, a fine cathedral, the Bridge chapel, the Guildhall and a fine selection of parks. I hope that, in the interests of both tourism and those of the city, Derby might soon have a new hotel in the market place instead of the derelict monstrosity that stands there. I urge the Government to support Derby's urban programme submission. It is a good case and I hope that the application will not fall on deaf ears. As I think Lord Byron said, there are things in Derbyshire as noble as in Greece or Switzerland. I would humbly agree.

What can and should be done to boost tourism? Several of my right hon. and hon. Friends have referred to road signs. The problem is that all signs are, legally speaking, advertisements and therefore covered by the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1984, which require express planning consent from a local authority. The country has an obligation to inform people of its heritage and attractions rather than merely assist those who want to find a garage for petrol or to visit a WC. More flexibility and good will is needed by many district and county authorities. Signs should be regarded not as an eyesore but as information to encourage people to stop and spend money.

We should also examine our attitude to tourists. The common view of the tourist is of some aging gauche American who wants to see a stately home. That is not the case. A tourist is someone who spends money during a visit, whether he be a sportsman, a rock climber, a potholer, a pop music fan, a railway enthusiast or just someone who is taking the family out for the day. Local authorities especially have tended to have a rather blinkered view of their areas in regard to their potential tourism value.

Businesses and local authorities should use imagination to encourage visitors. It is not just a case of, as I thought the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said—I hope that I misunderstood him — putting in more Government money. Planning committees should not be so narrow-minded and licensing justices should remember that we are now in 1984, not 1915. It is interesting that a recent survey of all overseas visitors to Britain showed that more then half of those interviewed had one special complaint, which was the inflexibility of Britain's licensing laws. It must be maddening for foreign tourists to find that if they go north of the border to Scotland the licensing laws are far more flexible than they are in England and Wales, where they may have difficulty in getting a drink. On a recent visit to Stratford-upon-Avon I met a number of American tourists who were bewildered by what they regarded as our archaic licensing laws. They had spent an interesting morning looking around Stratford-upon-Avon and decided at a quarter to three or 3 o'clock to have a meal and a drink. They were amazed to find that many of the town's fine establishments were closed or were about to close and that therefore they were unwilling and unable, if they abided by the law, to serve them. The Home Office must be urged to look at an early opportunity at our licensing laws.

We should not look down upon or discourage what colloquially can be called "popular entertainment." Alton towers was recently described to me by somebody as a hideous, over-blown pleasure park. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) has indicated, Alton towers is also a place that provides entertainment and pleasure for tens of thousands of tourists. Just as important is the fact that it provides jobs for very many people: not just for bar and kitchen staff but for security officers and musicians. On a recent visit to Alton towers I was surprised to find that a number of bands and musicians play there on a full time basis. The employment opportunities in places such as Alton towers cannot be underestimated. There is another spin-off. Money is spent by tourists either on their way to such places or on their way back. Money may be spent in a public house or in a restaurant or even at a garage which benefits from the sale of a couple of gallons of petrol and a Mars bar, or whatever, by customers who would not otherwise be using that route.

The House should be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) for initiating the debate. Tourism in Britain is a growing industry, not an industry that is nearing its peak. It is only in its infancy. Many economic benefits are to be obtained if only we seize the opportunity.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): On behalf of my hon. Friends and colleagues I welcome the debate and am grateful to the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) who introduced it. I apologise for not having heard some of the speeches made earlier in this important debate.

As a nation we have more leisure. Other nations share this predicament. The tourist of tomorrow will be a very different animal from the rich American whom we used to believe was the only kind of tourist who came to this country. I share the opinion of the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken), but we need to change not only the Government's attitude towards tourism but the attitude of the average Briton towards the average tourist. We complain that we cannot get on buses because they are full of tourists or that it is difficult to go Christmas shopping because the shops are full of tourists, without acknowledging the enormous financial advantage that accrues to this country from tourism.

I wish to mention a few aspects of tourism whereby the Government could and, I maintain, should provide help. People who have nice houses find that it is extraordinarily difficult to open their houses as hotels or guest houses and the Government ought to encourage this. They should make it easier for them to erect signs and to employ young people, even if occasionally they have to bring a glass of wine or a glass of beer to a customer. There is no reason why they should not be 16 or 17-years-old. Altogether there is no good reason why local authorities should make life quite so difficult and I am sure that the Minister could find it in his heart to persuade local authorities to look more benignly on such applications.

We should deregularise some of the insane laws that affect entertainment. We should encourage theatres to open on a Sunday. If we signposted motorways more realistically we would make Britain more attractive to tourists. We are the only country whose motorways do not signpost the distance to the next exit or tell travellers where the next exit will take them. When I make such suggestions to the Minister of State, Department of Transport, she says that extra signs always make for extra carelessness and more accidents. I do not believe that. Any hon. Member who has been to America will know that that country has more signs than perhaps any other country, yet its accident rate is no higher. People can drive and look at signs without it harming them.

Training structure must be looked at. I have in my constituency the excellent Isle of Ely college in Wisbech. The catering school there has a restaurant in which people can eat the food prepared by the students. That restaurant has to charge VAT. As a result, the prices are higher than they should be and local people are not encouraged, as they might be, to go and help in the training of young caterers.

A law should be passed outlawing gratuities. At the moment a visitor to any hotel or restaurant in France knows that the gratuity is included in the bill, whether it is for accommodation, food or drink. If good tourism is to make the tourist feel comfortable and at home, to make him worried about whether or not to leave a gratuity is a rotten thing to do to him. It would not be difficult to outlaw gratuities. They should be added to the account. We could even set up yet another small quango, if need be, to which anyone who is discontented about the gratuity that has to be paid, or even members of a hotel staff who are unhappy about the distribution of gratuities, can appeal.

The deregulation of licensing hours has been a success in Scotland, despite all the fears that it would lead to public drunkenness and marauders coming south still filled with drink obtained north of the border outside our licensing hours. That has not happened. It is time, for the sake of tourism, that we looked again at licensing hours and made it easier for people to obtain drinks when they wished to do so.

The difficulties for hotels and guest houses in employing casual labour should be looked at. The Minister might consider legislation to allow any young person working in the tourist industry to earn up to £50 a week without paying tax. That would be an assault not on the Inland Revenue but on Britain's black economy. Perhaps, instead of talking about student loans, students might be encouraged to work in their vacations in the tourist industry. It would cost little money to forgo an element of tax or national insurance which is paid at the moment.

Above all, our attitude to the catering industry must change. The service industry is somehow thought to be un-British. It is perfectly British to eat and drink but it is nasty and foreign to cook, wash up and pour things out of bottles into glasses. Until we are persuaded of the decency of the catering profession, that attitude will pertain. It is up to all of us to say that the catering industry is an honourable calling.

I made my maiden speech on this subject many years ago, and I have not referred to it again until this moment, but the problem has got no better. Socially, someone who goes into catering is still very low on the totem pole and it is not until we begin to show the real dignity that there is in the industry that we shall attract the right people.

We have so much to offer in the way of good food and drink. There is regional excellence, in local baking and cheesemaking, brewing and cider-making. With Government support, and a little more money to the English tourist board so that it could publish abroad the joys of coming to this country, tourism here would make for greater and more permanent employment.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I make no apology for speaking about tourism in Southampton, particularly as today is a sad one in Southampton because P and O has withdrawn its cross-channel ferry services from Southampton. That means that there is no cross-channel ferry service from Southampton to the continent for the first time in 140 years.

Tourism in Southampton is estimated to be worth about £35 million a year. At least 600,000 tourists stay in the city each year, mainly at the 65 hotels and guest houses. Some 1,650 bedrooms, a high proportion of them with their own bathrooms, are registered with the tourist board. The last detailed analysis was taken as long ago as 1976, but then it was thought that some 4,500 people were employed in hotel and catering in Southampton alone. I suspect that the figure is now considerably higher. Southampton has been promoting itself as a centre for tourism with tremendous flair and ability. It is known as the summer time city, not just because it is a lively city in the summer but because it has attractions throughout the year and has a pleasant, genial climate. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) knows the attraction of Southampton well, from his service in that city in the past.

I pay tribute to Mr. Shaw, the tourism and publicity officer, because that small tourist office succeeded in winning the award for the most travel-trade-minded tourist authority in the United Kingdom this year. Tourism is dependent on many other jobs and tourism in Southampton is inextricably involved with the port, the docks, the liners, the cruise ships and ferries. A recent survey showed that 12 per cent. of overseas visitors to Southampton came there by ship. Next year, the figure is likely to be nil unless something happens in the present docks crisis.

Southampton has not only tourists but cruise ships, and it is the leading cruise port in the country. Some 60 per cent. of our cruise business goes out of Southampton. It is the home port for Cunard's Queen Elizabeth 2, and P and O's Canberra. Recently, the city was honoured by the decision of P and O to choose it as the location for the naming, by Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, of the magnificent luxury cruiser, Royal Princess. That ceremony was itself a tourist attraction, and many come to Southampton to see the magnificent cruise ships. On one memorable day early this year—there was even a photograph of this in The Standard—the QE2, the Canberra and the Norway were all in the port at the same time. Sadly, it seems that such a sight will never be seen again by the people of Southampton if the dockers carry on as they have during the past few weeks.

When they are in port, the cruise ships do not generate much work for the dockers, but their passengers provide work for taxi drivers, the hotel and catering trade and even British Rail, and they spend money in the superb shops in the shopping centre. That is why it is so sad that some of the dockers now seem determined to drive the cruise ships out of Southampton for good. Four times already this year, the QE2 has been diverted to Cherbourg because of industrial trouble in Southampton. Each time it has cost Cunard not less than £1 million in transferring passengers by air to the mainland and so on.

The price of docking in Southampton has increased so dramatically over the past few years that it is now more expensive for the QE2 to dock in Southampton than to dock in New York, despite the weakness of the pound against the dollar. Seven years ago it was twice as expensive for the QE2 to dock in New York as in Southampton. That is an indication of the extent to which the port of Southampton has lost out in competition and become uneconomic.

If the QE2 moves from Southampton to a different home port—if it does it will be very much against the desires and interests of Cunard—it will be a disaster in jobs lost to the people of Southampton. At present, about half the QE2's crew of 1,250 are drawn from the Southampton area, so that that ship alone provides substantial local employment.

I appeal to the dockers in Southampton to enter into an agreement for normal working at all times in respect of the cruise ships to ensure that they remain in Southampton.

During the summer, when the second of the unnecessary dock strikes was taking place in Southampton, I was in the port of Miami, the cruise capital of the United States east coast. I had a meeting there with somebody called Arthur Coffey, the local president of the principal union involved in that port. He told me that the other unions in the port of Miami have a no-strike agreement in respect of the cruise ships operating from that port. That is how they keep and build business against competition from other United States ports. As a trade union leader, he found it incomprehensible that dockers' leaders in Southampton were prepared to sacrifice not only their own jobs but the jobs of many others as well in a political strike in support of the miners.

We are now involved not in a political strike but in an equally pointless industrial dispute which has brought the port to the present crisis point. This morning I received many letters from people employed by Solent Container Services Ltd., which has a staff of 170. Since 1971, the company has grown to the point where it has about 80 per cent. of the port's container traffic. Its success depends upon the dockers being prepared to work efficiently and effectively. It looks as though the people who worked so hard to build Solent Container Services Ltd. into a successful firm will be the victims of this latest crisis in Southampton's history.

Constituents have written to me asking what can be done about it. I hope desperately that something can be done, because time is running out. It is estimated that, within the next two weeks, the last of the major container consortia will, if matters are not put right in Southampton, be tempted to use Felixstowe in the long term.

The employment that comes from tourism and from cruise ships is not only in the service industries. When the cruise ships are refitted in Southampton they provide valuable work for the people in the ship repair yard. It is estimated that the shipping coming up the Solent each year would generate about £16 million worth of ship repair work for people in Southampton were they able to get the contracts. There is a knock-on effect in the tourist industry.

I hope that I shall not be criticised for having concentrated so much on one aspect of the tourist industry in Southampton, but it was necessary for me to do so in view of the limited time available. I know that several of my hon. Friends wish to participate in the debate.

There is quite a problem with the cruise ships and the employment on them of British personnel. It was a great disappointment to me and many others who went to the naming ceremony for the Royal Princess to discover that hardly any of those employed on that British ship were British. A few of the officers are British, but almost all those employed in the hotel and catering section are foreign.

I am told that one of the reasons is that the National Union of Seamen has priced its members out of those jobs. If that be true, it is very sad. But the position has not been helped all that much by the decision to withdraw the allowances for overseas earnings that seamen used to enjoy.

Mr. Gould: Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that another way of putting that same sad situation is to say that British shipowners prefer to allow cheap foreign labour to undercut British labour?

Mr. Chope That was a wholly mischievous remark. The truth is that, because of its good will, Cunard is subsidising its other activities to try to give jobs to British people. It is determined to keep a British crew on the QE2, but it is costing the company between £5 million and £6 million a year more than it would to employ a foreign crew. It is not the fault of the shipping companies. They are bending over backwards to try to give jobs to British people. It is the job of our unions to make sure that those companies can offer terms of employment which are attractive and competitive in the world market.

I end with a final plea to the dockers in Southampton: "Settle your differences; think not of yourselves but of all the other people in Southampton whose jobs depend on your actions."

1.13 pm

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): All hon. Members contributing to the debate have referred to tourism as one of our great growth industries. They are right, of course. Perhaps not everyone appreciates how sensitive the industry is to the exchange rate. A study of the development of the industry shows that there have been considerable changes from one year to the next in the numbers of visitors coming here. This has been linked closely to the value of the pound against other international currencies. In the last quarter, about 900,000 people came from the United States. That reflects the value of the pound against the dollar.

There is no doubt that the industry has a great deal further to go in the future. On current predictions it is estimated that by 1988 16 million people will come here from overseas countries and spend £7·5 billion. By the end of the century the figure could be more than 20 million people spending more than £10 billion. There is also a commensurate growth in the numbers of Britons travelling abroad, but perhaps it is fortunate that visitors who come here spend rather more than citizens of the United Kingdom who visit foreign climes.

The British Tourist Authority and the individual tourist boards have done a great job in one of their most important tasks, which is to ensure that the influx of tourists is spread reasonably evenly throughout the year. Between July and September, fewer than 40 per cent. of the total number of visitors arrive on our shores. Similarly, 60 per cent. of all their time here is now spent outside London, and that must be not only to their benefit but also to the benefit of the people who have to assimilate considerable numbers of additional visitors.

It remains true, though, that the target of most tourists at some stage of their visit here is London, and we have seen considerable improvements in many of the facilities available to them. One has only to go round Covent garden and see the thriving community of small businesses with high turnovers there to appreciate what can be achieved. Half the turnover of some shops in central London comes from overseas visitors.

Despite the improvements, there are still too few pedestrian areas in London compared with those in other European cities. The Greater London council has not fulfilled the potential for freeing parts of our great city from the scourge of heavy traffic.

In the environs of the Palace of Westminster little allowance is made for the tourists attracted here. The tourist may well not be able to come in, but I should like him to be able to go to an exhibition centre close to the Palace to fulfil the hope that Barry and Pugin had when the palace was built after the great fire of 1834. I should like to see a parliamentary exhibition centre, as originally planned for Westminster Hall.

The other side of Bridge street adjoining Parliament street is to be developed. The mass of scruffy shops which do not do credit to the Palace could be replaced by a centre to which visitors, attracted to the Palace of Westminster, could go to see artefacts and exhibits which would make the place more real to them.

The unwary visitor to London is likely to fall prey to unlicensed traders, pickpockets and illegal gamers who throng our streets in the summer months. We must ensure that the war on these parasites continues.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) referred to Bradford's tourist attractions. In the past it would have been considered curious for the hon. Member for York to refer to Bradford in that way, but things have changed a great deal. Bradford uses the slogan "A surprising place". Today it would be surprising if any publicity about Bradford did not refer to it being a centre of tourism. The slogan "the mythbreakers" is also used in Bradford. The myth that Bradford is just a city of dingy old mills has been well and truly broken. About 750,000 people a year visit local attractions, some of which are in my constituency. I think of Haworth, the home of the Brontes, and Ilkley.

Bradford has packaged its attractions, and 20,000 package holidaymakers visit Bradford every year. Since 1980 the area's tourism has grown to be worth £2 million a year. Many other areas which are considering expanding their tourist industries get in touch with the Bradford city council to find out how it achieved such success. Other places often base their own publicity and literature on the excellent material produced by Bradford.

The old buildings that have been cleaned and refurbished attract tourists and are also of enormous benefit to the local inhabitants. An attractive city with attractive surrounding countryside and leisure facilities will attract new manufacturing investment.

Keighley is the only part of the Bradford metropolitan district which does not have intermediate area status. We do not whinge about that. We get on with the job of building up our economy.

However, it is notable that the European Community non-quota fund for textile areas is intended to be used for building up new industries to replace the employment that was previously provided in the textile industry. I cannot think of a better industry than tourism, bearing in mind the attractions that are to be found in the area which I represent, for replacing some of the jobs which previously existed in the textile sector.

There is a good deal of duplication in the promotion of tourism in the area which I represent. In addition to the English tourist board, there is the Yorkshire and Humberside tourist board, the West Yorkshire metropolitan county council and the Bradford city council. I do not decry the work of the West Yorkshire metropolitan county council, but when the council is abolished we may be able to ensure that available funds are applied more economically. Bradford has shown that it is well capable of publicising the facilities that exist.

It is important also to draw attention to transport. There is a need to increase the number of routes to Manchester international airport, which has within a short distance from it enormous numbers of attractive tourist areas. There is a need in Bradford district to complete the new Aire valley trunk road, the construction of which is due to commence in the next financial year. The area is badly cut off—I refer specifically to Keighley—and that is a considerable disincentive to tourists who wish to enjoy the moors and dales. At a more basic level, there is a lack of signposting. One has to be a local in parts of west Yorkshire to know which routes to follow. There is considerable scope for improvement.

It is regrettable that many people have a take-it-or-leave-it attitude. That must change in future if we are to attract more tourists. The impression is given that there is a sellers' market, and that must be dispelled. Three examples are the non-availability of teas after half-past five in the afternoon, our antiquated Sunday trading laws and the licensing laws. I need not refer to them further because other hon. Members have already taken up these issues.

Tourism produces invisible earnings. Tourists are often all too visible but the benefits that they produce remain invisible. These benefits percolate subtly into the economy. My hon. Friends the Members for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) and for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) have said that tourism is regarded by many as not having the same significance as manufacturing industry. I hope that that belief is now starting to disappear. I hope also that the debate will have helped more people to appreciate that tourism is a vital industry today and will be even more vital tomorrow. It should merit our support in every possible way.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): By way of introduction, let me start by saying that I regret that my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) is not in his place. It seems that he and I will have to pursue elsewhere an alternative debate. He ascribed to Lord Byron the following words: "There are things in Derbyshire as noble as in Greece or Switzerland." I do not dispute the sentiments but I do dispute that they were uttered by Lord Byron. I may well be mistaken, but I think that they were said by Jane Austen, and had she lived 175 years later she would have resided in the constituency of Basingstoke. There is no evidence that I am aware of that Jane Austen ever went to Derbyshire and, therefore, I feel that these fictional words would be far better attributed to Hampshire.

I listened with greater seriousness and even a degree of sadness to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope). It is clear that matters in Southampton have not changed significantly — indeed, they may arguably have worsened—since the days when the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and I knew Southampton in what might be called our previous political incarnations.

I, along with every other Conservative Member who has spoken in this debate, welcomed the knowledge that my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) had drawn lucky in the ballot for today's proceedings and had selected this topic. I endorse all his comments.

Clearly, tourism has considerable importance. This is true from the point of view of the money it attracts, especially from overseas, and the wealth it thus recycles. Tourism is also important as a potential and real creator of employment. As my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) reminded us, the tourist industry is important for its sheer breadth.

I regret the fact that the hon. Member for Dagenham is not present. His speech must be answered carefully and seriously. There is general common ground between what he said and what I believe. The differences between what he said and what I believe is more of degree than of kind. Of course tourism is important, but it is easy, especially in a Friday morning debate, to overstress its importance. If we look to tourism as the means to revive our national economy, we shall delude ourselves. Tourism is a small, but important industry, and that is that. I would go further, and agree with the hon. Member for Dagenham that unless and until we restore health to our manufacturing industry we shall not see the revival of the national economy for which we long.

During this debate a plethora of statistics have been cited—perhaps none more significant than those given by my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory). My hon. Friend pointed out—I do not believe we can dispute this—that in the last year employment in the hotel trade increased by 17,000—an increase of 7·5 per cent.—and that employment in the cafe and restaurant trade increased by 6,000, or 3·5 per cent. Of course, that is welcome. It shows a significant employment increase, well above the rate of job creation elsewhere in industry.

Somewhat contradictory statistics have been cited by some hon. Members. I was under the impression that, during the first eight months of this year, the tourist industry had earned for us £2·75 billion of foreign currency. Other hon. Members have said that the amount was higher. Be that as it may, clearly it is a significant and valuable contribution to our balance of payments and should be welcomed.

We have learned that last year the industry's national turnover was £9 billion. My hon. Friend the Member for York pointed out that that is higher than the turnover of the United Kingdom aerospace industry and is almost equivalent to the motor industry's turnover.

I acknowledge the fact that my hon. Friends the Members for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells), for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) and for York touched briefly but not in great detail on a different aspect of the tourist industry. It is what I would call the poor relation of the tourist industry, not so much in the financial sense but because it is a relatively unknown newcomer, at least in its present scale. I refer to tourism as the "farmers alternative cash crop". There was an article in the Daily Telegraph earlier in the year written by Evelyn Cox. I quote from it. She stated:

> "Along the country lanes of Britain, to the despair of the highway authorities, signs are going up: Bed and Breakfast; Farm Accommodation; Cottage to Let; Camping; Caravan Site; Fishing; Farm Shop."

Then waxing lyrical she went on:

> "Quite as much as the blackthorn blossom and the dog violets under the hedgerows they are today's sign of spring and of a new aspect of British farming."

Tourism, in some of its various forms, is a major agricultural crop. It is a major support for thousands of family farms.

That development has not, perhaps, received the same attention as other features of tourism and farming. During the past 10 years or so, as a result of the unevenhandedness of the common agricultural policy, our farming has evolved in two different directions, until we have reached the point where we almost have two separate industries operating under contrasting economic systems. On the one hand, subsidies and rising yields have meant that it pays the farmer to grow grain wherever possible. The results are plain. The eastern half of England has become a virtual prairie, and the EEC intervention stores are bursting with surplus grain.

On the other hand, and most significantly in relation to today's debate, for the livestock farmer life has been less of a fairy-tale existence. The level of subsidies, where subsidies have existed, has not been high enough to compensate for the increased price of grain for animal feeds. That has led many livestock farmers to diversify into the leisure industry.

Livestock farmers have set out, not merely to produce food for the market but to meet the growing demand for access to the countryside and to rural activities such as fishing, shooting, horse-riding, and, as I believe my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone said, even fruit-picking. It is a change that the farming community has met with extraordinary vigour, enterprise and enthusiasm. After all, tourism is an entirely different industry from pure farming. For a community which naturally leads a fairly isolated and independent existence, tourism demands a new approach to life. It is one that fits in ideally with farming. On the livestock farms, most of the relentless slog takes place during the winter months when the livestock is in. Nowadays, when the animals go out in spring or early summer, the trippers come in.

The rural tourist industry has a great advantage over the seaside tourist industry because the season lasts for the seven lush months although, as we have heard, country sports — for good or ill — will bring people to the countryside at other times of the year.

It is no overstatement to say that tourism has brought money, life and hope to much of the countryside where vigour was draining away as employment in agriculture declined. Many village shops and pubs have survived because of tourism. Local craftsmen find a demand for their wares. Other farms are diversifying into cheese-making to satisfy a growing demand for produce grown literally on the doorstep.

The benefits have not just been financial. Unlike many industries, tourism in the countryside can, with careful management, enhance the environment. Untidy farms are spruced up, redundant farm buildings are converted into attractive holiday flats and cottages and, dare I say it, tatty market towns are transformed into idyllic backwaters. The appearance of the landscape begins to matter as well as productivity. Features such as hedgerows, dry stone walls, copses and pools become vital assets in attracting visitors to an area rather than mere hindrances to modern farming methods.

Farm tourism has gone some way towards reconciling the enduring conflict between, on the one hand, those who see the countryside as a factory floor for food production and, on the other, those who regard it as an amenity that everyone has a right to enjoy. We must not forget that farms involved in the tourist trade in all its forms—from bed-and-breakfast to pick-your-own—provide not only access to the countryside but a chance to savour the delights of country life. It is, therefore, not surprising that farm tourism has developed significantly recently.

Farms have learned what people want. Marketing is becoming increasingly professional and is moving from the technique of the daubed sign on the roadside. There are now a number of well-publicised booking agencies and voucher schemes to attract holidaymakers from home and abroad.

As in other areas of farm production, group marketing co-operatives are being formed. Last year 10 holiday groups covering 300 farms joined forces with the British Tourist Authority to tempt more foreign visitors to spend a holiday on a farm. No wonder farmers turn to the alternative cash crop. The harvest is good. So much for farm tourism.

In a recent Department of Trade and Industry press release in early November, I noted that the Minister said:

"Tourism is going to remain one of the great growth industries for the rest of this century and beyond. This is an exciting prospect for Britain because of the variety of our attractions and the infinite possibilities for developing new and unexploited ones. The Government clearly recognise the great potential of tourism and are determined to encourage its development."

The most positive features that have emerged from the debate are, I hope, the recommendations from Back-Bench Members to the Government on that theme.

I shall refer briefly to five points. The first is not a Government matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan) spoke of the need for a Select Committee on tourism. I accept and endorse that suggestion.

Secondly, two or three Conservative Members pointed out that 12 Government Departments look after different aspects of tourists and tourism. I underline the point that that disparity cannot be the best way to look after things, that greater cohesion and co-ordination are needed, and that a better flow of information to the Government is needed.

Thirdly, it was pointed out that section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969, which deals with grant aid, channels about £9 million a year in that direction. I do not regard public expenditure as evil; indeed, public expenditure in that direction would be especially profitable. I urge the Government to review that sum.

Fourthly, we heard about the tourist infrastructure of roads and signposts. The present state of affairs is far from acceptable.

Fifthly, we heard about licensing and the need for pubs, shops and theatres to operate under different licensing laws which would be more acceptable to tourists. That is an important suggestion.

My final observation brings me back to my starting point. Obviously, tourism is important, but we must not overstate that importance in our search for other ways to revive the national economy.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): My first point—[HON. MEMBERS: "He is the only Labour Member here."] No, there is one here from Scotland. Scotland is an important part of the tourist industry. My hon. Friend has just reminded me—not that I need reminding after all my travels in relation to the miners' strike — that Scotland is a very beautiful country and one of the areas to which a large number of people go for their holidays, although I am not sure how many of them are Members of Parliament.

We have heard a lot of talk in the Chamber today about what a wonderful place Britain is and how we need to jack up tourist receipts and so on. I have been looking at the all-party "Whip" that hon. Members receive weekly. There are trips all over the world on offer. As I do not get involved in "fact-finding tours" — really just a euphemism for a fortnight's or a month's holiday—I made some inquiries about how many Members of Parliament apply for those trips. In winter, they usually go to places somewhere between the tropic of Cancer and the tropic of Capricorn. There are never any fact-finding tours of Greenland in winter, although I am sure that there must be plenty to find there. I was told by the person concerned that when he tried to open the door at 10 am the other day to see how many letters there were for the Caribbean trip around Christmas time it was jammed up because there were so many letters on the other side.

[Mr. Dennis Skinner]

I do not want to over-egg the pudding, but there is always a certain amount of hypocrisy in all this talk about holidays in Britain. Like many other people, most Members of Parliament get their passports and go off on what I call a MacDonald holiday.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I commend the hon. Gentleman's austerity and seriousness of purpose in confining his travels to this country in support of the miners' dispute, but I put it to him seriously that if he continues to support that tragic and self-destructive strike he will risk turning the mining industry of this country into a museum, with Bolsover as the showpiece and himself as a prime exhibit.

Mr. Skinner: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman intervened. He failed to recognise, however, that the person trying to turn the mining industry into a museum is MacGregor. He was brought over from America, but not because he was interested in Britain, tourism or anything else. He left this country in 1941 when we were fighting the Nazis. He may wrap himself up in the British flag now, but he was not prepared to face Hitler then. He got on a boat and went the other way at the same time as the Prime Minister was deciding not to join the Land Army, the WAAFs or anything else, but to go off to university on public money so as to make a name for herself. Now they are having to shut down libraries and God knows what else.

If the hon. Gentleman wants to discuss those matters, I am happy to go on for ever. MacGregor wants to shut 20 pits in the next 12 months and 70 pits in the next five years and to make 70,000 miners redundant. The net result of that loss of wages will be that not enough money will be spent on tourism, which brings us back to where we started. The reason why so many people cannot trot off abroad, as Members of Parliament do, is that they do not have the cash. There are 5 million people out of work. They are not all included in the official statistics because those figures do not cover women who do not register and all the people on cheap labour schemes like the YTS. That means that a great deal of money is not being spent which would be spent if people had a few bob in their pockets.

It is not just miners who will not be able to go on holiday next year but all the other people whom the Government have thrown on to that pile of human misery known as the dole queue. The Government are hell-bent on seeing to it that there is a large reservoir of manpower on the dole so that they can depress the wages of the rest —except for Members of Parliament, of course, who had two wage increases last year and can have fact-finding holidays on the cheap. The Japanese Government will pay for a trip and I have no doubt that Members wanting to go to impoverished Third world countries can always find the money from somewhere. There is always a gravy train to hop on.

As for the Common Market, we could do a lot more for tourism in this country if we were not saddled with that great debt round our necks. We could use 1 per cent. of VAT for tourism in this country instead of sending it over to Brussels and Luxembourg to pay for all those bureaucrats — that mafia. The Common Market is supposed to be producing wine, but some of those vines only exist on paper. That is a fact. It has been reported in the posh papers.

Where could we spend that 1 per cent.? I have spent one or two of my holidays on the canals and rivers here in Britain, with my family. Very nice—away from it all —but things could be a lot better. If we spent money on improving the canals and waterways, a lot more people might spend their time and money in Britain. The Government think that everything just spins round their little cocoon. They think that they do not have to do anything at all or to spend any money, and it will all happen. They think that they can sit back while the forces of monetarism take us to a sort of utopia where everyone will live happily ever afterwards. It is time that they dropped that antiquated idea.

We know that that is not happening. As each year goes by, there is less and less money to be spent. We need to spend money positively—on refurbishing the canals, for instance. Money has been spent on Blisworth tunnel over the past two years, and the tunnel has just been reopened, but there are countless other problems to be tackled and repairs to be done.

The other year I took a boat down the Stratford canal, and I nearly had to carry that boat down that canal. I pumped away, but the water kept coming in at one end and out of the other. At every lock I had a political discussion with the lock-keepers. I told them about all the people on the dole—all the young people coming out of school with O-levels and A-levels and going straight into Mrs. Thatcher's Yosser-land shouting "Gi' us a job—gi' us a job". That is a real indictment of our society.

Those little locks are about 7 ft wide. I thought that some of the engineers and carpenters who have been thrown out of work could team up with the young men and women who do not have jobs. They could teach them a trade and put money in their pockets. The young people would have a bit more money to spend and — who knows? — they might spend some of it on tourism in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. But the Government have a crazy way of running the economy.

Then there are the roads. Motorways are handy for some people, but we also need to spend money on improving the road infrastructure in the regions and in particular the east midlands, to which the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) referred. His constituency is well known for its tourist attraction and its major roads——

Mr. Andy Stewart: And its miners.

Mr. Skinner: And its miners, some of whom, I am told, helped to put the hon. Gentleman in this place. I am not so sure about that. Anyway, it takes all sorts to make a world.

More money must be spent on the railways too. Up in the north, a railway is to be closed which is supposed to one of the greatest railway attractions in Britain. The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) knows something about that. The railway between Carlisle and Settle is not far from his back door.

The whole thing is crazy, and it is all based on the nonsensical idea that everything has to make a profit. If this place had to make a profit—especially on a Friday—it would be struggling. In fact, it would have been closed down centuries ago. The thing costs a small fortune, and it is not just us—it is that lot up there in the Press Gallery, which I am not supposed to refer to. We keep the place open because it is supposed to be the mother of parliaments. It is supposed to be a tourist attraction.

The Government could make a few more bob if it was on telly. Have the Government thought about that? We could spend a lot more money very usefully on the railways, on the roads and on the canals. The sewer infrastructure wants a lot of money spent on it. All that would improve the attractiveness of Britain. Do not get me wrong, I am not into the national interest or anything like that, but if we want to improve on the amount of money that is spent in Britain we have to do some of the basic things that Governments would normally do rather than say that it is none of our business and that everything will come out right in the end.

I agree about tourism having a marginal effect on the economy. Nobody should give the impression that, if we improve Britain's tourist attractions, the whole economy will be put right. That is the last thing that I would suggest, but we could make quite a considerable change and get more people into employment. One thing is certain—tourism will last longer than North sea oil. I harbour the suspicion that there will be a tourist industry after that lot has gone. People should pay a little more attention to that fact. The Government should do that. Even a Government who object to planning and intervention should realise that tourism will last longer than some of our other assets. It will outlive privatisation. When the Government have sold off all the assets that they can find, we shall still have tourism.

The hon. Member for Sherwood has introduced a theme, perhaps unwittingly—I do not know—that turns the Government's philosophy on economic policy on its head because the moment we start talking about wanting to improve Britain's tourist attractions we talk about intervention. The motion could have been headlined, "Government intervention needed. Crisis signs. Amber warning lights. We need money in the east midlands." Spend a bit on Hardwicke hall or Bolsover castle. We have one or two attractions. We also have Cresswell crags.

Mr. Andy Stewart: I mentioned them.

Mr. Skinner: I am pleased about that. There are wonderful places in my area. We have spent this week abolishing the GLC—well, I have not; I have been voting against abolition. The Government have spent this week trying to abolish the GLC but on Friday morning they want to save tourism. There is a bit of a contradiction there. One of the GLC's main functions is to ensure the provision of necessary finance for the great tourist attraction of London. It is a bit fanciful for all these Tory Members, who went through the Lobby supporting the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Environment to abolish the GLC—no doubt they will do the same on Report and in Committee—to complain today about there not being enough money in the country to attract visitors. London is the centre of tourism in Britain.

I have gone on a bit longer than I wanted. We have covered quite a wide area. Nevertheless, this is an important debate. A delegation from the Peak District national park board came to see the Minster a couple of years ago about getting more money to enable that attractive area, which covers several counties, to attract more visitors. The board had some jobs that it wanted doing. The delegation left that meeting with, to put it in simple terms, a flea in its ear. If the Minister wants to do something useful, he should get in touch with John Beagle, the chairman of that board, and restart negotiations with a view to providing more finance. We should have no more of this talk about there not being enough money in the country. This Government can find money for all sorts of things if they want to.

The Government have spent £12,000 million on Trident and they are spending £20,000 million a year to finance the dole queue. There is plenty of money in the country. Since the Prime Minister came to power £2 billion has been spent on her gallivanting round the world. I do not suppose she would call that tourism, but the British taxpayer has had to fork out 2 million quid for the Prime Minister to go tripping round the world and lie in a gondola in Venice. Somebody in Bolsover said to me that they thought she was selling Walls Cornetto. If the Government can find money for that and for all the other things they are prepared to waste money on, they can find money for tourism, if they have the will and the guts to do so, and make this country a more attractive place for tourists.

One comes back to the basic philosophy of having to intervene to do what all these Tories have been asking for today, sometimes on a major scale, sometimes on a minor scale. It cannot all be done by privatisation or by leaving it to busybody entrepreneurs in this leaner and fitter Britain which the Prime Minister wants to create. They are not doing it. If they were, these issues would not be raised today. So the facts are on our side. The philosophy is also on our side. I hope that as a result of our debate fewer Tory Members of Parliament will consider walking through the Lobby to smash the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties, which have helped to provide money for tourism. I hope that they will think twice before doing so. They would not want to go through the Lobby with me. They could go through five minutes later.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): It is singularly appropriate to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), who laid such stress on the role that Robin Hood played in the history of his area. It seems to be a very contemporary theme, because this is the week of robbing the rich to help the poor. This is a theme which can be continued in our debate. In doing so, I am glad to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood. We on this side of the House agree—I say, regrettably, only this side of the House because so few Members of the Opposition have chosen to come here today to support the theme—that we must look at tourism, and the service sector generally, for the employment prospects of the future.

This theme is not attractive to the Opposition. They are still wedded to the idea that the major employment prospects for our country come from the manufacturing sector. Anybody who takes a realistic view of the trading, commercial and business prospects for this country must admit that this is no longer the case. It will become increasingly difficult for the United Kingdom to compete with the countries of the Third world because of their lower unit labour costs and their lack of shop and workplace regulations. Although we shall always be a manufacturing nation—and proud of it—and although our technology will carry us forward, the combined effects of overseas competition from low-cost countries, of the increasing use of robotics and of technology and mechanisation mean that we cannot look to the manufacturing sector for the future major expansion of employment.

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that in this country, as in most others advanced countries, the long-term trend is towards a decline in the share of employment provided by manufacturing. But surely he accepts that over the past four years we have suddenly dropped, because of this Government's economic policy, well below any pre-existing trend or any conceivable trend established anywhere else. All that we are asking for in terms of employment in manufacturing is that we should replace those jobs that were quite needlessly and wantonly thrown away by mistaken economic policies.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman's point illustrates the difference in attitude towards the problem. In 1979 the accumulated problems of featherbedding, of cosseting and of ignoring the real difficulties facing us finally caught up with us after years of neglect and of pretending that they did not exist. The reason for the sudden change that the hon. Gentleman mentioned is precisely that. It had nothing to do with the deliberate running down of industry by the Government. It was a recognition—we said this before the 1979 election—of the problems of manufacturing industry and that we could no longer artificially maintain unnecessary levels of employment and manning, inefficiency and lack of productivity and profitability.

Those were the accumulated problems with which we have had to deal as a Government and a country. It is because of that that we now look increasingly to the service sector. Included in that is this vital element of tourism which is so rightly raised by the motion before the House today.

In tourism we have a combination of a number of different elements which provide an increased possibility for employment and therefore hope for the future. It combines travel and transport because people have to move around the country in order to enjoy its different tourist facilities.

The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and others have made many pleas for increased expenditure. The hon. Gentleman will not hear that plea from me today and he would not expect to. There are other answers to the problem, apart from throwing money at it, or, to use the trendy expression for throwing money at things, investing in the infrastructure.

The deregulation of Britain's bus industry, both in the past and to come, will provide increased employment prospects, efficiency and effectiveness for those wishing to travel. The catering trade, which has been mentioned, the accommodation trade and the retail trade will also benefit in their different ways from the provision of services related to tourism.

Important elements are built in, such as deregulating the licensing provisions and shop-opening hours — something which I am confident the Government will tackle in the next 12 to 18 months. Those will all make their contribution to the development of tourism. It is in deregulation and in freeing the industry to make better use of its resources that the real future lies, not necessarily in the expenditure of public money on what is and should be essentially a private enterprise.

My constituency of Mid-Worcestershire has a growing tourist centre, mainly centred around the ancient town of Droitwich, where we are now rebuilding, in an excellent partnership between the local authority and private enterprise with private resources, the unique brine bath facility which will draw many more people to that town. Incidentally, to recognise the spa towns—as I do—is another way in which we can in future attract an increasing number of tourists to Britain. It is in such ways, in towns such as Droitwich in Mid-Worcestershire, that we can look to the future with a combination of private investment, partnerships between private business and local authorities and with the Government not necessarily spending public money but looking at ways of reducing and removing the restrictions and regulations which at the moment inhibit the tourist industry.

It is in all those ways that we can look confidently to the future. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood for allowing us to discuss the matter today. I hope that we shall return to it again and again as one of the major future sources of employment.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate on tourism today, representing as I do a constituency which has some 2 million visitors a year. That shows the extraordinary importance of tourism to our local economy.

There are of course problems of accommodating and coping with such a large number of tourists as come to Stratford-on-Avon and the surrounding area. I want to pay tribute to Stratford town council, the Stratford district council tourism sub-committee, and the Stratford-on-Avon district marketing group. Between them they are approaching systematically the need to develop tourism on a sensible pattern for the future in our area. I congratulate all those concerned.

It is not only to Stratford itself that people come. They come to the whole of south Warwickshire. There are 120 villages in my constituency, one more beautiful than the other. There are also the National Trust properties such as Coughton, Charlecote, Upton and other famous houses such as Ragley.

It is not only the most famous landmarks that draw people. For example, there is the Stratford motor museum, and a little way from Stratford there is the Napton Nickelodeon at Napton on the Hill. It is an internationally celebrated museum of mechanical music. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) made his customary humorous reference to the monkey and the organ grinder yesterday, but if he is interested in organ grinding he should join his constituents and take a trip to Napton to see what organ grinding is about.

The importance of tourism for jobs in my constituency is enormous. It is estimated that some 20 per cent. of ratepayers in Stratford-on-Avon district are directly involved in tourism. But there are two threats to tourism in Stratford.

One is a major threat, with which many of my colleagues will be familiar because I had the opportunity to talk about it in an Adjournment debate earlier this year.

The Foreign Office and the BBC are proposing to site a transmitter, which would be one of the largest in Europe, at Bearley, three miles from the centre of Stratford-on-Avon. Some 24 masts, up to 300 ft high, would be an appalling visual intrusion into this historic and beautiful landscape, and, even more seriously, the effects of radio frequency interference on computers and other electronic equipment in the area would be devastating. The Royal Shakespeare theatre has said in plain terms that it would have to close in Stratford if the transmitter were built, and many other businesses, including 10 major hotels, for which conference business is an important trade, are seriously threatened.

I am also very concerned at British Rail's proposal that a section of the north Warwick railway line running into Stratford should be closed. This seems an extraordinarily short-sighted and negative policy. Stratford is one of the major tourist centres in the country, and already it is not easy to get to. There is poor road access and now there is a serious threat that British Rail will diminish rail access as well. I would regret it very much if that were to happen.

These are instances of how, as too often in Government, the left hand does not know what the right hand is doing. I welcome, however, the Government's positive approach to the promotion of tourism, and their recognition that it is one of our growth industries. I welcome the rationalisation of the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board. I hope that the promised economies that that rationalisation was supposed to yield will be forthcoming.

We need a vigorous approach to ensure that there is a devolution of funds, in particlar for marketing, to the regional tourist boards. At the moment, we have some joint schemes for tourist promotion by the English tourist board and the regional tourist boards. That is a good interim policy, but we want to make more funds available on a devolved basis to the regional boards such as the Heart of England tourist board, which could enable them to do an even better job.

A rationale for the integration of the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board was that it would yield economies of perhaps £500,000 a year. If that is split up between 12 tourist boards, there is a useful £40,000 to £45,000 to supplement the funds available to each for marketing. The Heart of England tourist board has about £7,000 of its own to spend on marketing. Impressively, it raises about a further £140,000 from local organisations and local authorities to help its promotional work. It would make an enormous difference to the possibilities of promotion if we could ensure that the fruits of that reorganisation start to flow through reasonably soon.

It would make sense to spend a little more on bringing in, for example, writers from the travel press who could see for themselves at first hand. That is highly cost-effective. We need to prepare better brochures and press features on the area. We need to promote bed-and-breakfast establishments. A large number of these are small businesses which do not have enough resources to achieve publicity on their own. We need to produce a good package which can be available to travel agents all over the world to show the sort of accommodation that is available. We also need a central reservation facility so that a tourist who contemplates coming to the heart of England from, say, Dallas can discover where he can stay and what is available in south Warwickshire. For these reasons I hope that we shall soon see some fruits from the £500,000.

It is important to promote the interests of the regional airports. London has the lion's share of benefit from tourism. We do not begrudge London anything, but it is most important to have a balanced development. I am glad that the future of Birmingham airport was relatively well secured this summer, and that the Civil Aviation Authority's proposals to remove the licences for British Airways to fly out of Birmingham to certain European destinations did not prevail. I am glad that BA is now working with some of the smaller independent airlines. I hope that we shall not only develop business with Europe but that increasingly Birmingham will be made a second stop airport for intercontinental flights, so that, after calling at Shannon or Prestwick, for example, they will call at Birmingham.

I hope that we shall channel more resources towards training. Large numbers of people, particularly in the smaller tourist establishments, lack sufficient training. It is a problem to get them to recognise that that is what they need. As hon. Members have observed, tourism is naturally a labour-intensive business. That is one of its most hopeful and advantageous features for the future. It can make an important contribution to alleviating the unemployment problem. It is most important therefore that those who work in tourism should have training and be enabled to develop their expertise so that we can make the best of our opportunities in tourism.

2.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): As several of my hon. Friends have already remarked, my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) has done the House a great service in choosing the subject of tourism for debate. No doubt many of the matters that he has placed on record on behalf of his constituents with regard to the problem of unemployment and the interests of the east midlands will be appropriately reported in the east midlands area. My hon. Friend has given us great food for thought.

During the debate several hon. Members have, quite appropriately, managed to reconcile the interests of manufacturing industry with those of the service industry, the tourist industry and all the components that make up what we hope will be a growing labour market. I am delighted that at long last in this House we are moving away from the sterile debates of high tech versus low tech, sunrise versus sunset, and service sector versus manufacturing sector. We are surely now agreed that they are all part of one wealth creation process. I am already on record as being one of the hon. Members who believe that manufacturing still has to be the core of wealth creation but that the service sector is certainly the most efficient job creator at the moment, with about 280,000 new jobs in the teeth of the recession. Prominent within service sector activity is the tourist industry, which has made a magnificent contribution to job creation in the United Kingdom.

I think it is important to deal with signposting, which was mentioned specifically by my hon. Friend. He asked about the cost of the experiment in Nottinghamshire, and what cost would fall on the local authority. My understanding is that financial assistance is being considered by the English tourist board.

The expenditure ceilings on local authorities are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, but I welcome Nottinghamshire's participation in this imaginative experiment. I have no doubt that the tourist attractions and local communities concerned will reap the benefit of more effective signposting, as will the many visitors to Nottinghamshire. At a later date I hope that we shall see tourism signposting arrangements on these lines considered for adoption throughout the United Kingdom. This is a matter at which the Department of Transport is already looking. But there seems to be another area of consensus in the debate that we could perhaps make some slightly more imaginative moves in signposting.

I hope that my hon. Friend will not mind if I do not march too far into the subject of the Robin Hood theme park. A number of proposals and possible sites are being considered for this development, and initiatives of this kind are to be welcomed. I am sure that my hon. Friend will watch progress with interest and report back to the House or the appropriate quarter if he feels that we have a sticking point. We shall do whatever we can to help on a multi-departmental basis if need be.

I have taken very much to heart the comments of a number of hon. Members about the need for co-ordination. Someone has to hold the sponsoring responsibility for tourism, but it is precisely because the industry embraces so many disparate economic and commercial activities that it would be difficult to appoint a "supremo" who somehow could have an input into all the various Government Departments, although I shall come to the possibility of a Select Committee — and an even more dramatic move proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan).

Inevitably and understandably, my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) asked for the M54 to be extended, not just for tourists but for the peace of mind of his constituents. He made another interesting proposal, which was echoed by a number of my hon. Friends, that Birmingham and Manchester airports should be considered for expansion as opposed to the consolidation or further building on the Heathrow site. It was interesting that that suggestion came from representatives of nearly all the regions represented in the House today, including the hon. Member whose constituency is almost directly under the flight path of that very busy airport. No doubt my right hon. and hon. Friends will look again at the opinions which emerged from the contributions of my hon. Friends on that issue.

In a strong and ebullient speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Yardley correctly emphasised the important contribution that exhibition and conference tourism makes to our economy. I am sure that he will not be embarrassed if I remind the House that, as a former colleague of his on Birmingham city council, I witnessed his personal contribution in seeing that that imaginative exhibition centre, the NEC, got off the ground. It is to his credit and that of his other colleagues that Birmingham has built itself a major revenue earner for the benefit of its ratepayers and residents.

My hon. Friend mentioned licensing hours and shop hours. This is where I am caught on the hook which has been dangled before a number of Ministers responsible for tourism. I cannot anticipate the outcome of the deliberations on changes in the licensing laws or the thoughts of others on shop hours—no doubt the House will take a view shortly—but it would appear, watching the signs, that there are moves in those directions which will be helpful to the tourist industry.

I say in his absence to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells) that, although I suppose educating young urban dwellers into a rural way of life, which as ever was a typically astute and provocative suggestion from my hon. Friend, may have attractions, it may also have disadvantages. Some people argue that there is no point in decanting people from the cities only to decant them back again when the vogue changes in a couple of decades, in order to move them back yet again in another two decades. We do muck about with our population more than most countries.

I agree that we should not indulge in garden festivalities by planting garden festivals everywhere that is derelict or requires clearance and long-term rehabilitation. But a new approach is developing which people from all parts of the country and all walks of life find of interest and from which they derive great benefit. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone was able to report that he got his money out of Liverpool. The Government sometimes have equal difficulty in resolving cash problems with Liverpool.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) settled once and for all the question whether tourism is a diversion and a candyfloss activity or a real job generator. I was delighted that she was able to make her observations in a forum where major employers are represented. There are misconceptions about this industry; it is an industry, and a wealth creator. Jobs and job opportunities are being generated in the 17,000 hotels and 6,000 restaurants to which my hon. Friend referred.

My hon. Friend reminded Londoners that, although they might have cheered the line "bloody tourists" in a song by a punk rock group, the same tourists are keeping many of our theatres going, helping to reduce overheads and to distribute them more equitably throughout the year. Directly and indirectly, tourists help to continue the rich cultural life of our capital.

Another theme of the debate, highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Drake, was that the best way to promote cities is by self-help. Government and local authority funding, as ever, can help only on the margin. It can be used to good effect only when it is drawn in by local authorities with good, sound and imaginative management. I am sure that Plymouth is promoting itself well.

There was an interesting exchange between my hon. Friend the Member for Drake and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) about the Channel tunnel and freedom of choice. My two hon. Friends were able to agree because of that proposition. The argument will come to the fore as some difficult decisions are made by others and, in due course, the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) raised the vexed question of hotel registration. A number of proposals have received a mixed reception. My Department has received the English tourist board's proposals and is studying them. The board is anxious to obtain the industry's full co-operation and will be glad to receive detailed comments on its proposals until March next year. There is still time. Those with an interest should continue to make their views known, not least to hon. Members.

I refer my hon. Friend to my remarks in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood about signposting. We must start from a suck-it-and-see basis. The evidence of the two experiments will be examined with rigour.

My hon. Friend the Member for York rightly said that we should not consume our environmental seed corn. He also reminded us that liaison between local authorities and tourist boards is a key factor. The people on the ground must get on and be vociferous in championing the interests of their own localities.

In the short time that is available, I shall deal briefly with the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). I congratulate him on being president of Twickenham Week. He is therefore an activist and not merely a commentator. We offer him our sympathy in trying to reconcile the demands of the eaters in the burgeoning restaurants in his constituency with those of the residents in the area who have been subjected to the increased demand. I understand that there are a number of "noises off" which cause a disconcerting set of circumstances in Twickenham.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) is a great expert and seasoned commentator on these matters, as well as an activist. He advised and exhorted us not to lose the initiative, but to maintain the momentum. He stressed that many regional economies gain a great deal from or are dependent upon tourism. I can assure him that his representations will be treated seriously. I shall respond to his remarks in greater detail, especially those directed to training and section 4 grant aid. I cannot report on the section 4 issue now, but I am optimistic that certain moves that are being made with the training boards will bear fruit and that there will be a recognition of and proper status attributed to the professional training that those at technician and management level in the tourist industry have received.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) left us with perhaps the phrase of the debate. He described the tourist industry as the slumbering giant of British industry. That may be, but perhaps he will agree with me that it is a giant which has woken up in the past two or three years. He reminded us that we should obtain better statistics on tourism and observed that theme parks and the approach adopted at Alton towers offers prospects for the future. I congratulate him on being able to witness the open golf championship in his constituency.

I shall combine my response to the observations of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) with my response to the remarks of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) — [Interruption.] Perhaps I had better uncouple that connection. It seems that the view of the House is that confusion could arise if I took that line. I found it easy to agree with parts of the speech of the hon. Member for Dagenham. The majority of hon. Members have extolled the virtues of London as the "major draw" area from which the rest of the country eventually benefits. I recognise that at the very least there is room for improvement in the way in which London presents itself.

Great strides have been made, but it seems rather strange that, while we have a marvellous link between Gatwick airport and Victoria, jet-lagged travellers from various parts of the world are spewed into Victoria station, perhaps with leaks from the roof trickling on them, not a taxi to be found and sheer chaos on the other side of the barrier. That should be considered. Perhaps I am being unfair to choose one of my hobby horses, but the general observation that London could try to tidy up some of its tattier areas is well taken.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) is another great expert in these matters. He would like to see more young people working and training in the tourist industry. His argument that we should do something to reduce or eliminate the on-cost of employment for employers is being considered by many commentators and pundits in the context of making the offering of employment generally more attractive to employers. Although it may not be totally in line with the fervour of today's debate, it would be unwise to pick out catering, rather than other sections of the industry, to try that approach.

Time has pressed on. I agree to write to hon. Members about the specific points on which they may not have received answers today.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House recognises the great importance of tourism as a growing industry in this country and in particular the East Midland Region of England; welcomes the significant part it can play in reducing the number of unemployed; and accepts the Government's commitment to further growth of the industry.

Unemployment (Special Programmes)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Neubert.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): The biggest problem facing this country, the major cause of pain and misery, and a symptom of so much else that is wrong is unemployment. The House has not yet begun to face up to the scope, dimension or nature of current unemployment or how we are to cope with it. On 4 May 1979, in a party political broadcast, when she was the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister said:

"I think it's terrible if a person who wants to work can't find a job. You have no self-respect, you haven't got the respect of your family if, somehow you can't earn yourself a living and them a living too."

On 28 August 1980 when she was Prime Minister, the right hon. Lady said in the Daily Mirror:

"I do hope to goodness that the jobless total never gets to two and a half million".

Later that year, in the Conservative Monthly News, she said:

"There is a real hope that a year from now things will be looking distinctly brighter."

The following year, on 16 June, in a speech to the CBI dinner, the right hon. Lady said:

"We are now beginning to win through."

Later that year in a speech in Glasgow she said:

"I think we are through the worst of the recession."

Later that year, when talking at the Lord Mayor's banquet, the right hon. Lady said:

"I believe we can begin to see the first signs of recovery."

However, the following year on 11 March, in a speech at a meeting for the Young Businessman of the Year award, she said:

"Unemployment is now one of the greatest unsolved mysteries of our time."

It seems that unemployment has been accepted. It has almost become the answer, not the problem. The Government appear to have given up. The Chancellor is budgeting for as much unemployment next year as this year. The alleged economic upturn or recovery will not happen, or not in any way that will end or significantly diminish unemployment.

Monetarist dogma predicted a temporary rise in unemployment as inflation was brought down, and then healthy economic growth, as if by spontaneous combustion, was to provide the necessary jobs. It was an illusion. It was never likely to happen, and it has not happened. The Chancellor told us that unemployment would fall last year. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry told us that it had reached a plateau and would fall; he now admits that he was wrong. All those ministerial hopes of unemployment flattening out and falling are exposed as wishful thinking.

Unemployment is continuing its upward trend. Within that total, the hard heart of the problem—the number of long-term unemployed—is increasing relentlessly and remorselessly. Ten years ago, one person in 250 was long-term unemployed; it is now one in 25. No one has yet come to grips with the magnitude of the problem we face. Government policies are exacerbating and deepening the problem.

The Government's simplistic and completely misguided policies since 1979 have been an attempt to cut public expenditure and, they hoped, taxes. Apparently, they did not understand that most public expenditure ends up being spent on orders for goods and services from the private sector. Recently, we had the annual report of the Property Services Agency, which shows that it spent £1·8 billion in 1983-84 and 80 per cent. of it was spent in the private sector.

As public expenditure is cut and orders diminish, private industry is squeezed and labour is laid off. It is the Exchequer which picks up the tab in unemployment pay. That is the fallacy of monetarism. The growing dole queue now costs some £17 billion per annum which is more than we spend on the National Health Service, education and the whole of the rate support grant, but it is also public expenditure, albeit useless and unproductive, which pushes up the total. As a result, public expenditure is a bigger proportion of GDP now than it was in 1979 as is, incidentally, the burden of taxation. Meanwhile British industry is being destroyed.

That leads to yet further demands for cuts in public expenditure. It is a self-defeating, vicious circle of decline, the worst peacetime disaster in our history, causing a monstrous rise in long-term unemployment—on a scale which is now a moral as well as an economic problem. The only pretence of unemployment policy now is the panacea of lower wages. That is the despairing cry of a bankrupt Government. It is also nonsense.

What are we going to do now? No conventional approach will deal with the problem. No ordinary economic upturn will cure unemployment or contain the problem. The House must face the stark, brutal truth that chronic, long-term, mass unemployment is with us for the foreseeable future and, certainly, for the Government's lifetime. The Chancellor has budgeted for as much and more next year. It is a pipe dream to imagine that it will disappear through any conventional method.

What are we to do? Can we possibly allow the wound to fester? Surely it is myopia of the most appalling and criminal kind to think that we can allow millions of our fellow countrymen and women to be pushed over an abyss without the most fearful consequences for our society. It is not just a betrayal of our people and an act of violence against them; it is economic nonsense.

How can it make sense to pay millions to do nothing? Is it not the most insane lunacy and an appalling waste of human and economic resources? Is it suggested that nothing needs doing? It must make more sense to pay people to do something than to do nothing. Are we saying that we lack the wit and intelligence to arrange things so as to match unmet needs with unused resources?

The last time we had mass unemployment was in the 1930s. We came out of it in four ways by the growth of the construction industry, by a measure of protection afforded by the imperial preference agreed at the Ottawa conference, by a competitive pound, and, fourthly, and decisively, by the war. The drive to produce tanks, guns, planes and ships converted a labour surplus into a labour shortage throughout Europe within months. We did not leave that to the workings of the market or to free enterprise. We organised and mobilised a great national effort.

The challenge is to do the same again now. We should mobilise the nation's resources, but this time to produce the prerequisites of peace and a civilised society, thereby bringing back hope and giving a lift to national morale. Again, it cannot be left to the free markets with a couple of pence of income tax to galvanise the sluggish entrepreneurs, about whom the Secretary of State for Education and Science used to speak. The nation must mobilise its intelligence and step in. It can.

The key matter to understand is that the economics of the state employing a previously unemployed person are different from a private employer doing the same. If, for example, an employer pays someone £100 a week, he pays the full amount and national insurance and so on. It is different for the state. First, unemployment and supplementary benefits are deducted, and then taxation revenues and national insurance contributions are added. As a result the marginal cost of the state employing a person is substantially less.

I advocate that we take advantage of that. We must launch a new national programme, possibly under the Manpower Services Commission, to cope with the epidemic of mass, long-term unemployment. We already have the nucleus, the prototpe, of such a scheme in the community programme. It is popular and oversubscribed. It should immediately be built upon, upgraded and vastly expanded. The Minister may know that the Select Committee recommended that in its report on last year's corporate plan of the MSC. We must be sufficiently bold and radical to take steps commensurate with the scale of the crisis.

We must transform the situation and uplift the spirit of the country. We should announce our intention to remove 1 million long-term unemployed people from the dole queue next year. That is entirely practicable, realistic and feasible. The MSC annual report for 1983-84 showed that 113,000 places on the community programme cost £400 million. Page 30 of the report states that the net costs are one third of the gross costs. At a cost of £130 million net, we have 113,000 places on the community programme. If we get some of our "own money" back from the European Community social fund, it would work out at about £100 billion for 100,000 places. That is 1 million places for £1 billion net. The costings are entirely realistic.

According to the MSC, in 1985-86 the Government propose to spend £580 million gross to secure 130,000 places on the community programme. However, according to figures in the participants survey, which is in the Library, the net cost is only about £190 million. The difference between the gross and net costs is again due to benefit savings and tax flowbacks. If account is taken of the contribution from the EC social fund, the true net cost is reduced further.

The bid for ECSF funding in 1984-85 was £55 million. Assuming that that was successful, it would be possible to buy an additional 930,000 places for £1 billion net, which gives a total of more than 1 million places.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House that he had at least £1·5 billion to give away in next year's Budget. Rather than paying it out in tax handouts, which would create few new jobs, it could be used to finance an imaginative scheme such as the one which I have described. £1 billion is less than one quarter of 1 per cent. of gross domestic product. It is less than the Chancellor's overshoot this year, and less than the cost of the coal strike, not to mention the cost of the Falkland Islands.

That money would not be a net loss because a million workers would create a great deal of added value. There are a host of projects that such a programme could tackle. This would need to be done in such a way as not to compete unfairly with existing businesses or to provide cheap labour. Trade union rates would be paid and participation would be entirely voluntary. The projects would be for work that otherwise would not be done and which is not in any existing programme.

An obvious area of need is our decaying housing stock. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) here. He will confirm that in our borough the already decaying housing stock is deteriorating faster than it is being renovated. There is a crying need for that work. It is labour-intensive and it uses British materials. There is a major role for such a programme there. The recent drought has shown that our water supply and reservoir system is inadequate.

In Newham and throughout the country many of our roads, especially secondary roads, are in a very bad state of repair. About a thousand towns and villages in this country have been identified as needing a bypass to relieve traffic congestion, but we are currently building only about 30 per year. The need for improvement there is obvious. Our sewers, too, are a classic case of essentials that are not provided by market forces. That, too, could be tackled by such a programme.

Looking to the technologies of the future, the whole country needs to be equipped with cable. We could be the first country to do that. Valuable fuel could be saved if buildings were insulated and draught-proofed.

The number of elderly people is increasing rapidly. It is far cheaper to care for the elderly—and, indeed, the disabled and the mentally handicapped — in the community rather than in expensive institutions, but that requires community services. Such services are labour-intensive and make good economic sense.

Large parts of our industrial landscape need to be tidied up and improved. All these things would provide real jobs, but private enterprise and the market are not providing them.

Such a programme would run in parallel with the expansion of the conventional economy and would, indeed, give it a boost and a fillip by supplying new orders to it. For a relatively modest expenditure, which could be recouped in the value of work done, the situation in Britain could be transformed. Parliament could show that it cared and hope would be offered where none now exists. The Government would have to shed arid dogma and show determination, will and imagination. I call upon them to do so. Are they capable, or shall we have to wait for others to do this?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) on raising this subject today. I hope that he will not take it as too much of an insult to his Front Bench colleagues if I say how much more I welcome what he said today than what the economic spokesmen for the Labour party said yesterday. It is becoming difficult to understand with what voices people are speaking. I hope that my response will not be seen as too partisan.

The hon. Gentleman has spelt out, just as Conservative Members and the Government have spelt out, the fact that having so many people out of work is not just a waste of resources for the country but is often devastating for individuals and their families. As the hon. Gentleman said, the greatest and worst effect is felt by the long-term unemployed.

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the community programme. Last week, I was involved in a radio broadcast on "Woman's Hour" in which a sponsor of a programmes scheme said that some of the changes in the rules had prevented the taking on of the people needed for a particular project. I responded by saying that it was often those who had been out of work for the longest period and whose needs for both income and employment were greatest—for economic, social and psychological reasons — about whom the Government were most concerned in the context of the programme.

The numer of places on the community programme has risen from 30,000 to 130,000. Given the amount of time that people spend on the programme, 200,000 people a year could benefit from it. The future size of the programme is not fixed. As year follows year, the Government consider which programmes to expand, which are most effective and which best match the needs both of those who need employment and of those who can contribute to the economy as a whole.

The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that there is a growth in the number of community programme places that are linked with training. He and other hon. Members will welcome the Government's moves, at the other end of the age scale, to make the youth training scheme far more effective for the young people leaving school who are seeking to join the employment market with the skills, attitudes and habits which will enable them to contribute. We are all united in wishing to give people the opportunity to contribute to the society that we all share. When, through unemployment, people feel debarred from contributing, there is a loss both to them and to the country.

The hon. Gentleman will not wish me to indulge too much in swapping quotations. At the beginning of his speech, the hon. Gentleman showed that he had done considerable research. That is what one would expect from the hon. Gentleman. I, too, have done a little research. I discovered an interesting article in the New Statesman, written by Doug Jones, who is the economic adviser to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). Mr. Jones says:

> "To my knowledge there is no economic evidence that there is some high, non-accelerating level of inflation that would provide a permanently high level of output and employment. Indeed, there are doubts about whether even accelerating inflation, apart from being politically unacceptable, would deliver higher output and more jobs."

This is not the time to take up the arguments about the link between pay and jobs. We can all agree that strikes do not help growth or create jobs, and that unrealistic pay settlements—not pay claims—can make the country less competitive. As the hon. Gentleman showed in his analysis of the growth of unemployment in the 1930s, protectionism does not help Britain. We are a trading country, exporting more per head than Japan. We need to work for more free trade both within the European Community and across the world, and to make sure that we are competitive. If our competitiveness continues to decline, the opportunities for both Government-assisted jobs and jobs in the private sector are diminished. I believe that that is common ground. Those who do not say that only the Government have a role in creating the conditions for economic growth and growth in employment are those who realise that their own actions can be consistent with the growth of output and productivity, and greater opportunities to share in a higher standard of living.

The hon. Gentleman referred to some of the employment and training measures. If the community programme is to work effectively, even on the present scale of places, there must be co-operation from local authorities and the unions. I recognise that some trade unions have natural fears about displacement effects. They believe that people might do under the community programme work that would otherwise be done by those in normal public or private employment. However, if possible sponsors or local authorities stand back from the community programme, many of those who might have benefited are not given the chance to do so.

I am glad that the borough of Newham is overcoming its earlier doubts and has approved an agency for 300 places, but the hon. Gentleman will not need me to remind him that one of the local trade unions is not yet co-operating. It would be useful to have the hon. Gentleman's support in trying to make sure that there is co-operation, while we try to maintain reasonable safeguards. Only with broad co-operation can the community programme deliver the goods to the many people who need them.

In regard to the recovery from the 1930s, the hon. Gentleman also talked about the role of the construction industry. He will be as aware as I am, as both of our constituencies were built up more densely during that period, that a great deal of the construction was done by the private sector. People managed, with the imagination that the hon. Gentleman asks of the Government, to build houses, employ people and pay them wages which enabled them to buy the houses. Occasional trips down memory lane on television show advertisements of the £5 down and 17s 6d a week which generated growth, employment and homes. There is no evidence to suggest that such things happen only when the public sector gets involved.

I do not fully accept the hon. Gentleman's idea that costing for publicly financed jobs should be all that different from privately financed jobs. It is not possible to disregard the tax take or just take account of the tax take, national insurance or any other return and say that we should transfer all employment from the private sector to the public sector, which would be the logical consequence of going too far. I accept, however, that the Government should continue to look for the most effective way in which to use public funds where the Government have a role as a direct employer, in financing other work and in employment and training measures. I know that the Government look forward to hearing the views of the Select Committee on Employment, which the hon. Gentleman serves well as Chairman. The views advanced might not always be identical but at least they concentrate on, and attempt to get, the most effective programmes using given resources so that more people can be relieved of the despair and lack of opportunity which unemployment often creates.

During the past two and a half years, there has been a recovery in the economy, but it has not been shared equally. We have the apparent paradox of a growing number of people in employment and, sadly because of demography and participation in the work force, a rise in the number of people out of work. We should continue to consider whether those who are out of work should be kept on the sidelines or whether it is possible, through some of the Government's schemes such as the job release scheme, to let those who want to leave the labour force to do so and have their places taken by others. It is not easy to expand such schemes without incurring a great deal of extra expense, as the hon. Gentleman knows.

The fact remains that people who are in work are getting an increased standard of living. It is perfectly fair and reasonable that they should ask for and negotiate an improved standard of living as that is the nature of free collective bargaining. That view is shared by the Government and the trade unions. However, if the results of those bargains mean that those who remain in work continue to get all the benefits of growth, we are left inexorably with a growing number of people who are out of work. Nobody seriously argues for a fixed incomes policy at the moment, but I should like there to be a sense of solidarity so that those in work take account of the interests of people who are out of work or might be out of work in the future because of decisions that people take freely and which are not within Government control. I hope that we shall build a greater common understanding about what types of decision Government take and what types of decision people outside Government take which are compatible with reduced unemployment, and growing employment and which, within people's ideologies and prejudices, are consistent with the macro and micro-economic policies that we heard about yesterday. No doubt we shall hear about them again in future major debates on economic policy.

I hope that, like the hon. Gentleman, right hon. and hon. Members will continue contributing so that the House is the focus of concern with economic policies that are consistent with rising employment and economic growth. I also hope that, when it is possible for the Government to adapt ideas and move forward, such ideas are discussed in the House. That is far better than standing back and throwing out statistics about what happened until 1979 and what has happened since. We should recognise that we have a common worry, ensure that the unemployed get as much attention as the employed and work out a better future for all of us together.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

1. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in Wales in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how this compares with the figure for 1978-79, at constant prices.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. John Stradling Thomas): At November 1983 prices the figures are £739 and £666 for 1982-83 and 1978-79, respectively.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend agree that those figures make nonsense of claims by the Opposition that there have been severe cuts in education under this Government?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend. When allowance has been made for the effects of pay and price increases, local authorities' current expenditure on education has remained virtually at constant levels for number of years, while the number of pupils in schools has declined markedly—10 per cent. between 1978 and 1984. That is not, of course, consistent with allegations about heavy cuts.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Does the Minister accept the serious criticism of the education service in Wales contained in the HMI report on the effects on the education service of recent local authority expenditure policies? When will the hon. Gentleman respond to that report in the House? When can we have a debate on it, so that the people of Wales can see the real impact on the service of education cuts?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I can give no undertaking about a debate, because that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. What the hon. Gentleman referred to as central Government policies are, of course, local government policies——

Mr. Ron Davies: That is evading the question.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: There is no need for me to evade the question. The facts speak for themselves.

The number of pupils has fallen markedly, but the fall in the number of teachers has not kept pace with that. I must stress that it is a matter of management of resources. I have studied the report carefully and am concerned about certain aspects. However, it is clear that, in the main, there has been consistent support from central Government for local education authorities.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my hon. Friend saying that local education authorities, such as Clwyd, could avoid cuts damaging to education—especially to the size of classes—if they would concentrate their resources on those areas where they could do most good, rather than wasting money on expensive capital projects?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I concur with that in the context of what I said a moment ago. The management of resources by local education authorities is the vital lesson that we must draw from the HMI report.

Mr. Barry Jones: Why does the Minister continue to pump more than £500,000 annually into private schools in Wales when every local education authority in Wales is at its wits' end about how to manage? Will he cancel the £500,000 cash for the private schools in Wales and ensure that that sum goes to the eight LEAs?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: No, Sir. I have no hesitation in saying that we believe in a variety of provision of education and freedom of choice.

Enterprise Zones and Trusts

2. Mr. Hooson asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make a statement on the progress of enterprise zones and trusts in Wales.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: It is estimated that the three enterprise zones have attracted some 1,700 jobs so far and that the trusts have created or saved some 4,000 jobs. I regard this as excellent progress.

Mr. Hooson: I have gained the impression that Powys Self-Help has been one of the most effective trusts. Does my hon. Friend have information to back that impression?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I most certainly do. I understand that Powys Self-Help is making good progress. To date it has helped 80 new businesses to start and 60 existing firms to expand, and it has helped to create or save 300 jobs.

Mr. Anderson: Will the Welsh Office try to learn from the experience of the first enterprise zone in Swansea and, in particular, consistent with current regional policy, could not the benefits be more job-related? How does the Welsh Office see the future of retailing in the enterprise zones, given the effect in adjacent areas, and can we still support the idea in principle of having retailing enterprises within the zones?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, Swansea has been identified as one of the more successful enterprise zones in terms of completed floor space, attraction of firms, employment and provision of service sites. I am aware of the views expressed about the retailing side. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is well aware of this, as he keeps in close touch. We have recently made a modification which, having consulted both sides in the matter, I can say will be welcomed generally.

Mr. Raffan: In view of the recent tragic announcement of redundancies amounting to nearly one third of the work force at Courtaulds green field, will my hon. Friend seriously consider any applications from Delyn borough council for an extension of the land included in the Delyn enterprise zone and treat sympathetically any request for financial aid to meet the problems created by those redundancies?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I am aware of that concern. The Government regret the redundancies that have been announced. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State visited the plant last year and knows of the efforts that have been made to make it profitable. The redundancy decision must be for the company in the light of its assessment of future commercial prospects. However, I have taken note of my hon. Friend's point and will give serious consideration to any proposal that is put forward. For understandable reasons, I can give no guarantee of the outcome of the deliberations, but at the same time I must warn that statutory procedures would have to be gone through.

Mr. Coleman: Is the Minister aware that rumour has it that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has some goodies to announce today? Does he agree that the efforts of trusts, such as the Neath Development Partnership, which on its own has created about 900 jobs in the past five years, have done a great deal to reflect the status of Wales as a place for people to come to?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I pay tribute to the efforts of the Neath partnership, which is a very good example of how well both the private and public sectors can work together. I have visited that partnership, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will visit it later this week to provide encouragement for the good work that it is doing.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Is it not absurd to impose tolls on the Cleddau bridge, in the enterprise zone in the Secretary of State's constituency, which restrict movement from one side to the other, thus defeating the object of the exercise? In view of the astronomical figure of unemployment in the Secretary of State's constituency, does it mean that the right hon. Gentleman has forsaken those people as well?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: My right hon. Friend forsook them to the extent that the Government provided a £4 million interest-free loan. Furthermore, as this matter affects a private Bill, I am sure that it would be out of order to make any further comment.

Nurses

3. Mr. Hubbard-Miles asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many nurses were employed in Wales per 1,000 population on 31 March 1978 and 31 March 1984.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): Monthly data were not collected in 1978. However, according to the annual census at 30 September 1978 the National Health Service in Wales employed 8·1 whole-time equivalent nurses per 1,000 population. The figure at 31 March 1984 was 9·3 whole-time equivalent nurses per 1,000 population.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Can he say how that substantial increase in front-line workers in the NHS has affected the number of inpatients and outpatients being treated?

Mr. Roberts: Certainly. The increase in the number of inpatients being cared for between September 1979 and September 1983 was 10·9 per cent. The number of day cases cared for increased by 11·2 per cent. and outpatients by 12·6 per cent.—a very creditable performance.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that that increase reflects the increase in demand, particularly through the growth of the geriatric population? Does he also accept that the increased pressure on hospitals comes from a cut in resources for local government and a failure to maintain home helps, which means that people who would otherwise be helped in their own homes have to go to hospital?

Mr. Roberts: No, I do not accept that. A certain element of the increase in the number of patients treated is a result of demographic change, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware that there has been a comparable increase in the amount of money spent by local authorities on personal social services.

Sir Raymond Gower: In view of those significant figures, can my hon. Friend explain the extent of the propaganda to the contrary?

Mr. Roberts: It is very difficult. One can only hope that truth will triumph eventually, and I am glad to assure my hon. Friend that it does appear to be triumphing at long last.

Dr. Marek: If the Minister wishes to take credit for those numbers, perhaps he will supply the House with further information. For the dates that he has mentioned, what were the average numbers of hours worked per nurse, and what was the ratio of SENs to SRNs?

Mr. Roberts: On the last point, if the hon. Gentleman will put down a question I shall answer it. I am sure that he will not expect me to carry those figures in my head. During the period about which we are talking there was a reduction in the number of hours worked by nurses, but, even so, there was an increase in the total number of nurses over and above that required to compensate for the decrease in their working hours. There was also an increase in the total number of front-line staff for the Health Service.

Coal Industry Dispute

4. Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs have been lost in Wales as a result of the coal mining dispute; and how much the total cost of the dispute has been to the Welsh economy.

17. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his assessment of the impact on the Welsh economy and on the prospects for employment in Wales of a further prolongation of the coal mining dispute.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): It is not possible to give detailed figures in respect of Wales, but there is no doubt that jobs are being lost, particularly in businesses with direct connections with the coal industry. The longer the dispute continues, the greater will be the threat to those businesses and to economic development.

Mr. Harvey: Does my right hon. Friend accept that this represents a shameful and tragic waste of human resources in Wales? Will he urge Welsh miners to follow the excellent example set by Bersham colliery workers in going back to work?

Mr. Edwards: As I said at the CBI dinner on Friday, I agree that the most tragic aspects of this dispute are the waste of the resources involved, the destruction of coal faces, and the loss of markets and of resources that would be going into new productive industry.

Mr. Terlezki: Have we not lost the order for 600,000 tonnes of coal that were to be exported to France because of this violent and undemocratic strike? At the same time, will not British Rail, the National Bus Company and, in particular, small businesses suffer because Mr. Scargill and his subordinates are denying their members a free and democratic ballot?

Mr. Edwards: Undoubtedly, jobs and exports are being lost, and industries and markets are being affected. For example, I know that the National Bus Company had to lay off about 20 people at its Bridgend depot as a result of the dispute.

Mr. Ray Powell: I do not understand why the Minister did not couple question 14 with these questions. Is the explanation that he is pandering to his Conservative colleagues? Has he read the January edition of Accountancy, which clearly states that the National Coal Board's accounting system needs to be thoroughly investigated? Is he aware that in this magazine five accountancy experts said that it was time the system was changed? Is he further aware that if this system of accountancy had been operated in the Wyndham Western colliery in my constituency, which closed on 7 January, in all probability it would still be open?

Mr. Edwards: I did not couple the hon. Gentleman's question with the other two because it is a different question. The taxpayer knows from the amount of money being paid to loss-making pits that, no matter what form of accountancy is used, substantial losses are being made by several pits and that the cost of producing coal in the best pits is very much less than in the most expensive loss-making pits.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: At the end of the Scargill strike, which surely cannot be far away, will British Rail be able to win back all the coal traffic that it previously carried, particularly between Port Talbot and Llanwern?

Mr. Edwards: That will be a matter for the customers to decide. I understand that the cost of road transport has proved comparable and sometimes competitive with that of rail transport. Thus, some changes may take place, but that will be for the management of the steel industry and others who use coal to decide.

Mr. Ron Davies: Is the Secretary of State aware that there are fewer miners working today in south Wales than last week? Does he not understand that there is no possibility of the striking miners in south Wales going back to work, other than on the basis of a negotiated settlement that suits them and the NUM? Will the right hon. Gentleman at last begin to take his responsibilities seriously? Last Thursday the Leader of the House told the House that he wanted further talks on the basis of the NACODS settlement. Given the Secretary of State's responsibility for the turmoil in south Wales, will he tell Welsh Members what he is doing, at Cabinet level, to bring about the resumption of those talks?

Mr. Edwards: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his clear statement that the leaders of the NUM are apparently interested only in negotiating on their terms, and not in considering the interests of the nation as a whole, of other industries, of the consumer, or of the future of the coal industry.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to repeat in the House the remarks that he made at the CBI dinner in Cardiff on Friday? Those remarks were considered deeply offensive by 100,000 miners and their families in south Wales.

Mr. Edwards: I cannot see how anyone could have found offensive my condemnation of violence, my view that the terrible waste was destroying markets and job prospects, or my appeal that people should be allowed to return to work without the threat of violence and should be able to hold a ballot, as is their natural right.

Mr. Grist: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that record investment of more than £100 million is earmarked for the south Wales pits if they return to work, and that Mr. Sid Moore, the marketing director of the NCB in south Wales, has stated that the threat of massive closures in south Wales is political bunkum?

Mr. Edwards: I noticed that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) threatened that more jobs would be lost in south Wales than now exist in the south Wales coal industry. That would seem to suggest that he has been exaggerating his case, as so often happens. It is known that the NCB is anxious to get on with considering investment in west Wales, at Margam and elsewhere, and that its plans are being held up because of the dispute.

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the Secretary of State confirm that as a result of the Government's incompetence and bigotry the financial cost of the dispute stands at between £2·5 billion and £4·5 billion and that the social cost cannot be calculated? The attempt to bribe miners back to work has failed dismally in south Wales. The right hon. Gentleman should be trying to negotiate a decent settlement instead of confirming losses and attempting to exaggerate the situation.

Mr. Edwards: I would welcome negotiation on the basis of the NACODS settlement, but it is very difficult when the leader of the NUM says that he is not prepared to negotiate on the central issue in dispute.

Mr. Barry Jones: Is not the only way to resolve the dispute for the Government to get the parties to the negotiating table before Christmas? Otherwise, the dispute will last well into 1985. Will the Secretary of State urge his Cabinet colleagues, specifically the Secretary of State for Energy, to involve themselves in negotiations? Does he agree that he should bring more statesmanship and a little less contemptible behaviour to the issue?

Mr. Edwards: There can be little point in proceeding with negotiations if the president of the National Union of Mineworkers says that he is not prepared to negotiate on the central issue of the strike—whether uneconomic pits should be closed, as they always have been under every Government.

Welsh Development Agency

5. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the current activities of the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The agency is vigorously implementing the strategy set out in its published corporate plan. Its activities are aimed at regenerating the Welsh economy and improving the industrial infrastructure and the environment. Particular importance is attached to securing more inward investment and encouraging technological development, and every effort is made to harness private sector funds.

Mr. Best: Is the Welsh Development Agency in a position to help locally by paying particular attention to local needs and problems, such as those in Holyhead?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend has recently met the chief executive of the Welsh Development Agency and discussed local problems with him. He will know that as a result of recent difficulties the agency's regional office is about to launch a series of informal sessions and seminars with WDA tenants and other local business people. Such local consultative activity will be helpful.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State take the opportunity to encourage Welsh local authorities to take advantage of the investment fund set up by the Welsh Development Agency and urge them to examine their own investments, and pension funds investments, in order to gain practical benefit from their capital resources?

Mr. Edwards: I welcome that suggestion. The closest co-operation between the agency, local authorities and the private sector is the key to success if we are to make the best use of resources.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Will not the cuts in regional aid make the WDA's job that much more difficult? Has the Secretary of State forgotten that, following the slimline operation, thousands of steel workers are still unemployed? As a recent survey in Port Talbot shows that one fifth of them are still out of work three years after that exercise, does that mean that the Secretary of State and the Government do not appreciate the desolation over which they are presiding?

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that south Wales will remain competitive as a result of the regional changes. The combination of the regional incentives, the work of the agency, the advantages of the European coal and steel loans and the other packages of assistance will ensure that, as before, the Newport area and the steel closure areas will continue to attract new inward investment and jobs.

Milk

6. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the cutback in milk production in Wales and in the area of the Vale of Glamorgan, respectively, from the date of the introduction of milk quotas up to the latest convenient date; how the proportionate cutback in each case compares with the United Kingdom proportion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The cutback of 10·3 per cent. in Welsh production between April and October 1984 compared with the same period last year is as much a consequence of the long dry summer as it is a response to the imposition of milk quotas. The comparable reduction in England and Wales is 9·3 per cent., and it is at present unlikely that supplementary levy will be payable. The United Kingdom reduction is 8·7 per cent. I regret that figures for the Vale of Glamorgan are not available.

Sir Raymond Gower: I appreciate that it is too soon to make a final judgment, and I accept that the drought might have caused special problems, but will my right hon. Friend take account of the fact that the figures underline the importance of milk production in many parts of the Principality, including the Vale of Glamorgan?

Mr. Edwards: I understand the importance of milk production. In the period up to October the United Kingdom was about 3·9 per cent. below the estimated dairy quota, although I judge that the gap will have closed considerably by the end of the year. The five local panels have completed their examination of special case claims and the main tribunal, which has been substantially enlarged, is considering with all possible urgency appeals against local panel decisions and the exceptional hardship cases.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that he will go to Brussels and make a special plea on behalf of Welsh dairy producers for an extra milk quota for 1985?

Mr. Edwards: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government, in considering their stand in Brussels when they receive the Commission's proposals in the new year, will consider carefully the special circumstances that affect different parts of the United Kingdom, including Wales.

Mr. Best: My right hon. Friend will know that he and I represent many farmers who have been hit hard by the milk quota proposals. Will he have a word with my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and ensure that when he goes to Brussels he makes certain that no European country gets away with undercutting the quotas, so that Britain bears a fair burden of the problem and not a disproportionate one?

Mr. Edwards: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on 20 November:

"My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has made it quite clear to the Commission that, with regard to the super levy, either all of us collect it or none of us do so. We shall not be in a position in which Britain keeps the rules while others do not."—[Official Report, 20 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 143.]

Mr. Roy Hughes: Is it not evident that there is still much dissatisfaction about milk quotas? The Secretary of State should know that from experience, bearing in mind the fact that only a week or two ago local dairy farmers stormed into his office. Why did he not keep faith with his people and at least insist on a deal similar to that obtained by the Irish dairy farmers?

Mr. Edwards: It is hard to believe that the Opposition are arguing, against the background of the CAP and CAP expenditure, that Britain should have had an increase in its milk quota. That is a remarkable revelation of the Opposition's agriculture policy.

Regional Industrial Policy

7. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on Government proposals for regional industrial policy in Wales.

10. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the implications for Wales of the recently announced changes in the Government's regional aid policies.

Mr. Edwards: The Government's new regional policy arrangements are designed to create genuine and lasting jobs cost-effectively. The revised assisted areas map covers nearly 90 per cent. of the working population of Wales and provides support both for needy areas and for key centres of growth. Wales will continue to offer an effective level of support and a comprehensive package of advice and assistance to all qualifying firms looking to invest in the Principality.

Mr. Davies: Will the Secretary of State direct his attention to mid-Glamorgan and confirm that in two constituencies—Caerphilly, and Ogmore—and the area of Taff-tly the grant to large areas will be reduced from 22 to 15 per cent. and that they will no longer qualify for automatic grants? Given the desperate need to attract employment into those areas, how does the Secretary of State expect us to compete on an equal footing with areas in the midlands, such as Birmingham or Coventry?

Mr. Edwards: The entire Heads of the Valley area of industrial south Wales, as a coherent block, receives the most assistance available in the United Kingdom. Therefore, it is in an especially good position to compete with other areas, including the west midlands. In the southern belt, where unemployment is lower and the attractions to incoming industry are already substantial, I am satisfied that the combination of assistance available — the selective financial assistance package, the European coal and steel aids, the Welsh Development Agency package and the assistance for small firms— will ensure that it continues to be a competitive and attractive area, and that it will continue to attract a disproportionate share of inward investment.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the new arrangements command general assent, on the ground that they are likely to be more cost-effective in bringing jobs to the area? However, can he give any reassurance to the areas that have lost assisted status that they will not thereby forgo any call on EEC investment funds or other forms of aid?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend will recall that after the downgrading of mid-Wales we had discussions with the European Commission, and ERDF assistance was later available in that area. I shall be having discussions with the Commission about the other rural areas that have been downgraded, but I can give no undertakings now on the outcome of the discussions.

Mr. Foot: What was the exact calculation of the sum that would be saved by the removal of special development area status from various areas in Wales? What account did the Government take of employment consequences when they embarked upon their policy? Have not the Government, and the right hon. Gentleman in particular, agreed to hitting even harder the areas that have already been hit the hardest? What was the exact calculation of extra unemployment at which he connived with the Government?

Mr. Edwards: I do not agree that the result will be extra unemployment. I believe that the regional package will be extremely effective. When it is combined with other Government measures, including lower interest rates and cuts in the job tax, which the right hon. Gentleman and the previous Labour Government imposed, it will attract investment. The right hon. Gentleman has taken an extraordinary position in the area which he represents, which has the highest level of assistance that is available in the United Kingdom. That assistance has been extended to the Abergavenny area, which will be especially attractive for high-tech industry. He is, apparently selfishly, begruding areas to the west of Blaenau Gwent a level of assistance that is equal to that in his constituency.

Mr. Raffan: Will my right hon. Friend reassure the House that changes in regional policy will not put us at a disadvantage when they are set against aid packages from other European competitors, and will not prevent us from holding on to companies such as Laura Ashley, which has said that it might go to Holland because of the attractive aid packages on offer there?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend's part of Wales remains an area with the highest level of assistance and— [Interruption.] The Opposition always hate good news. I am pleased to tell the House that Laura Ashley Ltd. is today announcing that its major new textile finishing project is to be undertaken in Newtown. Associated with this development will be a new garment-making unit in the north Wales development area. The two projects will together result in several hundred additional jobs, and the investment will consolidate and further develop Laura Ashley's British and Welsh operation. There was strong competition for the project from Holland and I am especially pleased that various authorities in Britain were able to put together a package that was attractive enough to persuade Laura Ashley to undertake the project in Wales.

Mr. Barry Jones: The news on Laura Ashley must be welcome, but I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he put himself into a ministerial flat spin on the issue by recklessly removing assisted status from mid-Wales in 1980. That is why he found himself in a mess, and that is what caused him to go cap in hand around Whitehall to get moneys for Laura Ashley. If the worrying £60 million cut in aid in last week's regional development announcement is not a public expenditure cut, will he tell us where in his budget he proposes to spend another £60 million?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman appears to miss the point that if an area that does not have development area status is able to compete with a development area in Holland and attract major investment of the Laura Ashley sort, it means that in areas that have development area status we shall compete extremely effectively. I am satisfied that we remain competitive in Wales and will continue to obtain a good share of the investment that will be attracted there.

Labour Statistics

8. Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many unemployed people there are in Wales compared with 1979 as a total and as a percentage of the total population; how many are long-term unemployed; and what percentage of the unemployed total is the long-term unemployed total.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 8 November 1984 there were 179,643 unemployed claimants in Wales, compared with a figure of 78,297 in November 1979. As percentages of the employee population they represent 16·8 per cent. and 7·1 per cent. respectively. It is estimated that 73,334 or 40·8 per cent. of the total for November 1984 had been unemployed for over a year.

Mr. Jones: Against the background of those doleful figures, the £60 million cut in regional aid is deplorable. I expect the Secretary of State to tell us today about new jobs from Japan and the United States of America. Having told us of those terrible figures, does the right hon. Gentleman propose to surrender weakly the skillcentres in Llanelli and west Gwent? Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the loss of 230 Courtaulds jobs is a severe blow to the economy of north-east Wales? I remind the Secretary of State that in Clwyd there are 12,810 jobless people in the Flint, Rhyl and Deeside area.

Mr. Edwards: I was glad to see the MSC press notice issued on 4 December, which reported that there had been a sharp upturn in the number of jobs available in the Shotton area and that the number of job opportunities in the area was increasing. The savings of an estimated £60 million in the regional policy announcement will not occur until 1987-88. It is expected that there will be an increase in regional policy expenditure in the two years before that time. I must set those figures against the fact that Welsh industry is benefiting by more than £120 million a year from the abolition of the Labour Government's job tax. As for skillcentres, what is at present a proposal put by officials has not yet been considered by the Commission, nor have the Commission's proposals been considered by Ministers.

PAYMASTER GENERAL

Staff

23. Mr. Greenway asked the Paymaster General how many staff are employed in his Department; what is the nature of their responsibilities; and what is the size of the budget he administers.

The Paymaster-General (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): On 1 November there were 834 staff in post in my Department.

My Department acts as banker for Government Departments; provides the Treasury with up-to-date information on central Government expenditure: and pays public service pensions. Its administrative budget for 1984-85 amounts to £12·3 million, of which about £400,000 is recovered from other Departments.

Mr. Greenway: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware of the appalling suffering and inconvenience caused to pensioners by the DHSS strike at Newcastle? What effect has that strike had on DHSS payments?

Mr. Gummer: The strke has caused considerable distress. I am pleased to say that two of the unions have now agreed that their members should go back to work, and I hope that the third union will encourage its members to return. It is sad when the plight of the least able in our society is used to press home wage demands. There has been a considerable diminution in the number of payments that we have been able to make, amounting to about £500,000. I am sorry that that has happened, because we want to make those payments to the people who deserve them.

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that those figures hardly deserve the appointment of someone of Cabinet rank to overseer them? Will the hon. Gentleman accept that his role in the Cabinet really rests upon his chairmanship of the Conservative party?

Mr. Gummer: As the hon. Gentleman's facts are incorrect, perhaps it would be unsuitable for me to answer his question.

Official Duties

24. Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General what proportion of the working week he spends on his official duties.

Mr. Gummer: I would expect to devote as much time to my duties as Paymaster General as is necessary to do them well.

Mr. Winnick: I must confess that that was an apt reply. Since the hon. Gentleman's main function is to be chairman of the Conservative party, does he not feel that he could have kept the Prime Minister somewhat better informed about the strong feelings of Conservative Back Benchers over student grants and other sensitive issues? When changes are made, will the hon. Gentleman not feel a sense of relief at having given up the job as chairman of the Conservative party, after all the stick that he has received?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has forecast that event so many times over so many months that I hope to continue to disappoint him year after year.

Cheques (Authorisations)

25. Mr. Adley asked the Paymaster General how many cheques he authorised for signature last month in his official capacity; and how much they totalled.

Mr. Gummer: Although my duties as Paymaster General include the oversight of the handling of payable orders drawn on my Office by Government Departments and others, they do not include the authorisation of cheques for signature.

Mr. Adley: In view of the answer that my hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) earlier, may I, on behalf of many of my constituents, express my thanks to my hon. Friend the Paymaster General, and, through him, the appropriate Ministers, for ensuring that pensions keep ahead of the rate of inflation? I assure him that for most of my constituents living on fixed incomes the control of inflation remains the most important priority.

Mr. Gummer: While thanking my hon. Friend for those remarks, may I point out to him—I am sure that he will agree—that it would help a great deal to keep inflation down if people did not push for wage rises above the level of inflation or for wage rises that have not been earned by better productivity?

Ministerial Functions

26. Mr. Murphy asked the Paymaster General if he will list the ministerial functions of his office.

Mr. Gummer: I am responsible for matters affecting the running and administration of the Paymaster General's Office at Crawley. I also hold certain offices connected with the Royal hospital, Chelsea; the Duke of York's school; the Royal Patriotic Fund Corporation; and the Drouly Officers' widows' fund.

Mr. Murphy: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the broad breadth of experience that he will gain from his appointment as Paymaster General. Does he feel that there are areas for privatisation within his remit?

Mr. Gummer: I yield to no one in my enthusiasm for privatisation. On my visit next week to the computer works at Crawley, I shall consider that matter carefully. I believe it unlikely that there is scope for privatisation, because we are an efficient operation that has to be kept under Government control because we are paying out Government money.

WALES

Labour Statistics

9. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current number of men and women employed in Wales between the ages of 16 and 21, 22 and 55, and 65 years, respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information is not available on the basis requested. The most up-to-date information relates to the 1981 census of population. For the age groups nearest to those requested the information was as follows:

16-20 years—104,898; 21-54 years—783,709; 55-64 years—143,726.

Mrs. Clwyd: Those people are fortunate, but what about the 27·3 per cent. of men in my constituency who are unemployed? That is the highest male unemployment rate in Wales. Surely the duty of the Secretary of State for Wales is not to come to the House and wring his hands with counterfeit anxiety, but to put pressure on the Government to change their blitzkrieg policies towards the people of Wales and their industries.

Mr. Edwards: I am glad to see that over the past past two or three months there has been a small fall in the number of unemployed people in the industrial areas of south Wales. We are beginning to see the results of the massive inward and other investment that has been taking place recently. The tragedy is that in the hon. Lady's constituency those prospects are being blighted by the continuation of a strike which she encourages.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the protestations coming from Opposition Members representing Welsh constituencies would be a little more credible this Monday afternoon if one or two of them had been in their seats last Friday morning when an important debate on unemployment and tourism took place in the Chamber?

Mr. Edwards: I am aware that hon. Members often have important engagements on a Friday, and I should not wish to condemn them on that account. My hon. Friend is right to mention tourism. It is an industry that provides an important and growing source of new jobs.

Mr. Abse: As there are 5,500 unemployed people in my constituency, 2,500 of whom have been unemployed for more than a year, will the Secretary of State try to relieve the gloom felt in my constituency by removing the prevalent present speculation, which has arisen as a result of planning applications, so that we may know whether there is hope of early large inward investment at Cwmbran? Is he aware of our concern that the recent changes, and any regional package being considered, should in no way adversely affect the attraction of inward American investment?

Mr. Edwards: I can certainly confirm that the recent changes in regional policy in no way affect the offer to the company concerned. I confirm that negotiations are indeed taking place with an American company with a view to its setting up in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I hope that it will be possible to give news of the conclusion of those negotiations before long. There are still detailed matters to be resolved.

Bus Services (Deregulation)

11. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the local authorities and local authority associations which have protested about the Government's plans for the deregulation of bus services in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Representations have been received on various aspects of the White Paper, "Buses", from more than 40 local authorities and local authority associations in Wales. With permission I shall circulate the full list in the Official Report.

Mr. Hughes: Can the Minister say who was in favour of the proposals? Is it not a serious accusation for experts in the transport section of the Association of District Councils to express doubts about the knowledge of the industry of those responsible for drawing up the White Paper? In view of all the public disquiet and the anxiety of pensioners, the disabled, women's institutes, and so on, not to mention local authorities, does the Minister agree that there must be more consultation before legislation is introduced?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: There is, of course, consultation. Many of the respondents have expressed concern at various aspects of the Government's proposals. Any form of change is always met with a certain amount of concern, but not all authorities oppose deregulation. Powys county council, for example, is in favour, subject to certain safeguards.

Mr. Ray Powell: Why?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman asked that question. It is because the consumer and the customer also come into this, and the Welsh Consumer Council has welcomed our proposals.

Following is the list.

THE ARTS

Private Sponsorship

28. Mr. Proctor asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what encouragement Her Majesty's Government give to private sponsorship of the arts; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts has recently launched an incentive scheme designed to encourage companies to look into the benefits of arts sponsorship. The first 12 winners, who raised more than £500,000, have just been announced.

Mr. Proctor: Is my hon. Friend aware of the growing concern of certain companies and corporations at the activities of the Inland Revenue "hit" squad in its office, which is examining their accounts with specific regard to sponsorship of the arts? Will he make representations to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor about this and also about the general need for tax reform to encourage private sponsorship of the arts?

Mr. Waldegrave: I have not seen those representations, but I shall look into the matter. On the broader point, the Select Committee made some recommendations, which are still under consideration. I remind my hon. Friend that the Government have made some reforms, especially of the covenanting regime, which have given a great deal of help in this matter.

Mr. Pavitt: In discussing this issue, will the hon. Gentleman give special attention to sponsorship by tobacco companies leading to the sale of lethal cigarettes, which cause nearly 100,000 premature deaths per year? Will he discuss with the Chancellor the fact that a further 1p tax per packet of cigarettes would provide enough money to cover not just arts sponsorship, but all sports sponsorship?

Mr. Waldegrave: Unfortunately, the tax regime is not the responsibility of my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts.

Sir David Price: Does my hon. Friend agree that private sponsorship of the arts should be regarded as a welcome addition to support for the arts and not as a substitute for proper public patronage?

Mr. Waldegrave: I thoroughly endorse that view. We know that a range of arts have to rely on continued public sponsorship. Nevertheless, pluralism in funding is vital. That is why we are keen to see more private sponsorship.

Mr. Buchan: In view of the wise words of the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) and of the Minister's reply, is it not disgraceful that public subsidy has fallen so short under the present Government that, after one of the most brilliant years in the history of the British theatre, a desperate crisis faces the English National Opera, the Royal Exchange theatre in Manchester and even the National theatre itself? Is that not an indictment of the disgraceful level of funding provided by the Minister for the Arts?

Mr. Waldegrave: No, it is not. Those three situations are all different. However, it is not the fault of the Minister for the Arts that the English National Opera, for instance, is in difficulties. Arts funding under the Government has kept up with inflation at a difficult time. That has been a considerable achievement.

Eastern Arts

29. Mr. Freud asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what is the per capita Arts Council grant for Eastern Arts; and how this compares with funding for other regional arts associations.

Mr. Waldegrave: The figure is 14·9p, compared with an average of 27·7p for other regions of England.

Mr. Freud: In view of those figures, will the Minister attempt to encourage the Arts Council to place demographic criteria high on its list of priorities when deciding future levels of funding for the eastern region?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is a formidable lobbyist for his region, but I always have to give the same answer. The Arts Council funds projects it considers worthy of funding. It does not try to spread money on a demographic basis. However, I will once again draw to the attention of the Arts Council what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Greater Manchester

30. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if Her Majesty's Government are satisfied that adequate provision will be made for the arts in Greater Manchester if present proposals to abolish the Greater Manchester council are implemented.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Lloyd: Is the Minister aware that the North-West Arts Association does not share his view? The association has written to hon. Members representing north-western constituencies, pointing out that it fears that there will be a shortfall in spending after the abolition of the Greater Manchester council and that over £750,000 of arts subsidy that is currently paid will not be guaranteed. Does the Minister accept that he is relying on the hope that Labour authorities such as Manchester will bail out Conservative authorities such as Trafford, which have no record of spending money on the arts, and no intention of doing so?

Mr. Waldegrave: I hope that both Conservative and Labour metropolitan districts will undertake their responsibilities. I pay tribute to the work done by the Greater Manchester council, some of which has been most useful. The arts budget will have considerable additional funds to help to meet the shortfall, and I am sure that if the districts play their proper role there should be no long-term difficulty.

Works of Art (Export)

32. Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what discussions he has had concerning the export of works of art.

Mr. Waldegrave: The export control system for works of art and antiques is kept under continuous review. My right hon. and noble Friend meets the chairman of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art as appropriate.

Mr. Sheldon: Most of our artistic heritage was acquired in the 18th and 19th century when our prosperity, compared to that of other countries, was much greater than we are ever likely to achieve again. Is it not clear that the net effect of events during the next few decades is likely to be the export of some works of art that are of great importance to us? Should not there be a ban on selling a special category of works of art which we cannot keep in this country by raising the requisite money? We have no objection to people selling their works of art, but there should be a ban on the export of certain works of art.

Mr. Waldegrave: All those matters are kept under consideration. However, I take the point made in the annual report of the National Heritage Memorial Fund that Britain has greatly gained from the free trade in works of art over the years and that it would not be in our long-term interests to do away with it. We have great public collections. What is important is that we should try to ensure that private owners do not have to sell in the first place.

Museums and Galleries (Entrance Charges)

33. Mr. Murphy asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what is the current level of revenue from entrance charges to museums and galleries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Of the national museums and galleries in England, only the National Maritime museum makes a general admission charge for its main collection. Its forecast gross income from charges is £353,000 in the current financial year. Information is not readily available on the national museums' and galleries' revenue from admission charges at special exhibitions and out-stations as distinct from their other non-Exchequer income sources.

Mr. Murphy: Does my hon. Friend agree that such charges could be a valuable additional source of funding for the arts? Will he therefore tell us whether he and his right hon. and noble Friend intend to encourage this movement in the future?

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's policy is that the trustees of the collections themselves should come forward with proposals if they think it right to do so. They know their own markets better than we do.

Mr. Buchan: With respect, that is hardly the Government's policy. The Government are doing everything that they can to encourage museums and other institutions to charge. When opening a library in Ealing in April, the Minister for the Arts said how admirable it was for people to pay, as they would enjoy things all the more as a result. That argument, as I have said before, is the argument of the prostitute, and I wish that the Minister would disclaim it.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman makes that joke every three weeks and it never seems any more apposite. The policy is, I think, as I have stated it. Indeed, it is as I have stated it, so I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is wrong in this matter.

English National Opera

34. Sir David Price asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking in conjunction with the Arts Council to ensure the future of the English National Opera.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and noble Friend is in touch with the Arts Council, which is keeping the situation under review.

Sir David Price: Is my hon. Friend aware that the English National Opera's financial difficulties arise largely because of its recent American tour? Is he further aware that that raises wide issues of whether nationally sponsored companies should tour abroad, bearing in mind the risks involved? What are my hon. Friend's thoughts on this matter?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. The English National Opera's difficulties arise from an American tour and especially because of the failure of some promises in America to find money for the company. It has always been the case that Arts Council money cannot be used for touring abroad. Such tours are undertaken at the risk of the companies concerned. I understand that the tour was a triumphant artistic success, which is why my right hon. and noble Friend is keeping closely in touch.

Mr. Ray Powell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do you have any discretion in regard to a Minister coupling questions? You will have noted that the Secretary of State for Wales today coupled two questions tabled by Conservative Members. That resulted in the exclusion of 11 out of 22 questions, most of which had been tabled by Labour Members. The Secretary of State coupled question No. 4 with question No. 17, the latter of which was tabled by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki), and question No. 10 with question No. 7, which was also tabled by a Conservative Member. At 3.10 pm Welsh Questions were delayed until after questions relating to public accounts had been dealt with. After question No. 11 had been taken we proceeded to questions on the Arts, with the result that questions Nos. 12 to 22 were not asked. Such coupling is not unusual. The Secretary of State has previously coupled five or six questions, especially when they relate to the coal mining dispute. Today, he should have coupled at least my question No. 14 with question No. 4 and he could have taken more questions with question No. 7, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies).

I do not want to delay the House unduly, but there is another important point that arises out of Question Time today. Is it in order for a Conservative Member who rarely attends the House, but when he does so on a Friday complains about other Welsh Members——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's latter point—it is not a matter for me. I note his point on the linking of questions. That is entirely a matter for the Minister concerned. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have noted that I called him immediately after the supplementary questions of the hon. Members who tabled questions Nos. 4 and 17.

Mr. Powell: I am very grateful.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has any grouse, has he? Moreover, all hon. Members who tabled a question that appeared on the Order Paper today were called to ask a supplementary question. We got through the whole list of 22 hon. Members, at least in supplementary questions.

Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament

3.35 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will institute an inquiry into allegations of telephone tapping and interference with the mail of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): No, Sir. I am satisfied that the arrangements set out in the White Paper "The Interception of Communications in Great Britain" are strictly applied by all concerned.

The complaints about the provision of postal and telephone services are matters for the Post Office and British Telecom whose duty it is, in the first instance, to investigate any allegations of improper conduct on the part of their staff.

Mr. Kaufman: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman been in contact with Sir Ronald Dearing following the disclosure that Sir Ronald has established that Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament correspondence has been tampered with substantially? Will he join me in paying tribute to Sir Ronald Dearing for acting so promptly and for taking these inquiries with appropriate seriousness?

The Home Secretary says that he is satisfied that no surveillance or interference has taken place. Will he categorically assure the House that he himself has approved no warrant authorising the telephone tapping of CND members and will he tell us how he is so sure that covert action, unknown to himself, has not been taken? Will he condemn and repudiate any possibility of interference with or surveillance of the CND? Will he state clearly that the CND, whatever he may think of its views, is a legitimate organisation, openly pursuing legitimate objectives, and will he make it utterly clear that the CND is not being pried into or listened into by Big Brother, or, for that matter, by Big Sister either?

Mr. Brittan: I join the right hon. Gentleman in complimenting Sir Ronald Dearing on dealing, as one would have expected, in a responsible way with the complaints made about the Post Office services. With regard to interception, I shall follow exactly the practice followed by the former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), and by previous Governments, irrespective of party, in neither confirming nor denying the existence of authorised interception in a particular case, whatever the circumstances. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House that I would authorise interception only in those cases where the criteria set out in the White Paper were clearly met. I have no evidence or reason to believe that unauthorised interception was carried out. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that that is a matter which would not be said lightly.

So far as the legitimacy or otherwise of CND is concerned, I do not think it is for me to legitimise it or otherwise. There is no doubt that peaceful political campaigning to change the mind of the Government and of people generally about the validity of nuclear disarmament, whether unilateral or otherwise, is an entirely legitimate activity which does not fall within the very strict criteria of the 1980 White Paper.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): In view of the sensitivity of the CND over illegal interference, has my right hon. and learned Friend received any assurance or undertaking from CND that it will not itself indulge in any illegal interference with the rights of the people at the Molesworth cruise missile site which is near to my constituency? If not, is this not another example of double standards by this increasingly hypocritical body?

Mr. Brittan: I have received no such assurance.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Home Secretary aware that there is hardly anyone in the country who believes that what occurred over the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament's mail was due to some kind of administrative mistake? Is it not time for the Home Secretary to become far less complacent over this issue and to recognise his duty to defend and not undermine civil liberties? What has occurred over the mail to CND members and other kinds of operations which have taken place demonstrate how justified is the current inquiry into the special branch by the Select Committee on Home Affairs.

Mr. Brittan: I do not know that the hon. Gentleman is entitled to speak for the overwhelming majority of the country in the way that he purports. I would have reservations about accepting him as a spokesman to quite that extent. The inquiry into the special branch is a matter for the Select Committee and is proceeding in the normal way.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the general secretary of the CND earlier this year, in a speech at Malvern, called upon soldiers to refuse to obey orders which, on the face of it, would appear to be an offence under the Incitement to Disaffection Act 1934? Does my right hon. and learned Friend think that Mr. Kent was meant to be taken seriously on that occasion, or was it more of a publicity exercise? Should we view today's private notice question and demands in the same vein?

Mr. Brittan: I shall not seek to penetrate motives, but I shall try to answer the questions, as I have done.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): As the Secretary of State has said clearly that what has gone on is outside the guidelines, will he confirm also that it is outside any permission given by the European Court? If that is right, will he accept the responsibility of investigating what has clearly gone on because the investigation carried out by the Post Office has not got to the bottom of the matter?

Mr. Brittan: As I understand it, the Post Office inquiries have not been completed. Some test postings have taken place. I have said what I have had to say about the criteria and I cannot usefully add to it in any way.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): As CND appears to pursue policies which, in some respects, are indistinguishable from the objectives of the Kremlin, can my right hon. and learned Friend think of any organisation that could better be kept under surveillance?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his views and comparisons.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): Since it is known that the number of people engaged in the phone-tapping operation is not much smaller than the number of taps authorised by the Home Secretary, are we to conclude that each of those persons carries out only one phone-tap per annum? If they carry out more than that, who is authorising the others? If they are not carrying out more than that, should not the right hon. and learned Gentleman do something about increasing the productivity of the operation?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman has shown his customary ingenuity and speculative qualities in asking that question, but it does not arise from the question asked by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that it is most unwise to leap to conclusions before the Post Office has completed its inquiry? When that inquiry is complete, will my right hon. and learned Friend at least recommend to Sir Ronald Dearing that he should publish its findings so that the full facts, and not the travesties that have been put about, are made clear?

Mr. Brittan: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that the Post Office would wish to make the position clear. It has been entirely candid about it up to now as far as it goes. When its inquiries are completed, I am sure that the same will continue to be the case.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I accept what the Home Secretary has said, but is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that nothing has changed my belief over the years, and certainly nothing said today, that CND is not a subversive organisation? The fact that an organisation says things with which many disagree does not make it a subversive organisation. But something did go wrong and to clear up the matter there is to be a report by the Post Office. That should be presented to the House of Commons. Compensation has been paid. As long as the aura of what went wrong is around, people will not agree with the Home Secretary or with me. Let us clear up the matter.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for confirming that I put accurately the position when he was Home Secretary and under successive Governments. I entirely agree that, plainly, something went wrong. The Post Office would not have paid money if it had not. Therefore, I also agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the inquiries that the Post Office is completing into what went wrong are worthwhile and important. It is clear already that two of the things that went wrong were a Post Office machine and the CND's quality of packing.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Will my right hon. and learned Friend invite Opposition Members to come forward with all the details of times, places, and so on, for the allegations so that a proper inquiry can take place rather than broad-brush smears which are too regularly becoming the tactics of the Opposition parties?

Mr. Brittan: I am sure that the right hon. Member for Gorton will decide in his own inimitable way whether and how to pursue the matter further.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Will the Home Secretary give an assurance, if she can, that no hon. Members who are members of CND have their mail interfered with or their telephone calls intercepted.

Mr. Brittan: I do not think that I can add to what I have already said.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Home Secretary tell the House how many phone taps or mail interceptions he has authorised for supporters or members of CND? What comfort can I offer to the people in the N4 district of London, which contains the head office of CND and where both I and my constituents reside, that their phones are not also being tapped and their mail interfered with because they may or may not be CND supporters? Do any of the authorised phone taps on supporters of CND include Members of this House or any other House?

Mr. Brittan: I do not think that I can take the matter much further forward other than to repeat — which I welcome the opportunity to do — that it is not the practice of Governments — as the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South confirmed, to disclose whether interceptions have taken place, for reasons that are perfectly clear to anyone seriously concerned with these matters.

I also welcome the opportunity to make it perfectly clear that peaceful political campaigning to change the mind of the Government and the people generally about nuclear disarmament is a legitimate activity and does not fall within the strict criteria.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Will the Home Secretary confirm that it is not within the current guidelines that he operates in respect of telephone tapping to authorise the tapping of individuals' telephones merely because of their membership of an organisation?

Mr. Brittan: That would depend on the organisation and its activities.

Later——

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like a ruling on a reply by the Home Secretary to a question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). When asked whether hon. Members' phones were tapped or their mail intercepted because they were supporters of CND or of the peace movement in general, the Home Secretary declined to give a categorical answer one way or the other. Will you, Mr. Speaker, rule on whether it is in order for the Government to interfere with the private correspondence of Members of Parliament and their constituents——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me. The hon. Gentleman put a question to the Home Secretary and received an answer.

Council of Environment Ministers

3.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about the meeting on 6 December of the Council of Environment Ministers, at which I was accompanied by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The Council expressed its sense of shock at the recent disaster in Bhopal and conveyed its deepest sympathy to the Government of India and the people affected. The Council discussed lead in petrol, other vehicle emissions, the limitation of nitrogen dioxide in the atmosphere, the establishment of a Community information system on the environment and draft directives on emissions from large combustion plants, emissions from the titanium dioxide industry, the recycling of beverage containers and environmental assessment.

On lead in petrol, the Council reached agreement on a directive that provides for the introduction of unleaded petrol throughout the Community not later than 1989 or earlier if individual member states wish. The minimum octane levels of premium grade unleaded petrol will be 95 RON, 85 MON, at the pump. The octane number of any additional unleaded regular grade was left for member states to fix. Formal adoption of that directive must now await receipt of the opinion of the European Parliament.

On other polluting emissions from cars, the Council agreed that a high-level working group of officials should report by the end of January on the alternative routes available to secure further reductions in these emissions. That work will provide the Council with an assessment of relevant technologies and examine whether there should be different solutions for cars of different sizes. It will take into account energy and production costs and European traffic conditions.

A directive on air quality standards for nitrogen dioxide was agreed with minor amendments, and subject only to a parliamentary reserve by the United Kingdom. Agreement was reached on the funding and legal basis of the first phase of an information system on environmental data in the Community.

The four other proposed directives — on emissions from large plants, emissions from the titanium dioxide industry, the recycling of beverage containers, and environmental assessments were not agreed. The United Kingdom had objections to the first three, and in no case were we alone in having such objections. Denmark maintained its reservation on the fourth proposed directive.

The Council accepted a proposal by the United Kingdom that the Commission should be invited to consider, and report on, ways of ensuring that environmental concerns are taken into account in the Community's agricultural policies. I also recorded our concern that the Commission's recently proposed directive on motor cycle noise does not go far enough in dealing with the smaller-engined machines or in setting a sufficiently early date for reductions.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I should like to associate myself and my colleagues with the Minister's sentiments about the tragic and devastating accident in Bhopal. I trust that the Government are making all necessary help available to the Indian authorities. That accident serves as a timely reminder of how dangerous modern chemical plants are, and that in our constant efforts to monitor nuclear plants we must be for ever vigilant over conventional plants, too.

The Minister's statement contained many important points, and I should like to ask him specifically about several of them. In a slightly offhand manner—I know that he did not mean it that way — he talked about establishing a Community information system. That is very important. What does it mean? Are the Government and the Community now going along the same road as the Americans in arguing for assessment of environmental impact? There seems to be quite a lot of credit in that proposal.

With regard to the recycling of beverage containers, can the Minister give us an assurance that experiences in research will not be restricted to the EEC and that we shall take into account the experiences in America, where the Americans have had those schemes for many years? Also, outside the Community, there have been such schemes in Denmark and Norway.

I was puzzled by the agreement on nitrogen dioxide. Will the Minister explain why NO_2 was considered separately from other acidic emissions such as sulphur dioxide? How does the Minister justify taking NO_2 separately? Does it mean that we shall have a debate on NO_2? Furthermore, may we expect a debate on acid rain before long, as we have been promised?

I welcome the Minister's decision to ask the Commission to investigate ways of taking the environmental impact of agriculture into account in the common agricultural policy. However, we expect it to be more than a token gesture. It must be more than a cosmetic exercise because it goes to the heart of the CAP. Many people regard it as completely indefensible that we are producing for the sake of producing when we cannot even distribute that production to the Third world countries and while we are destroying our own environment.

We welcome the fact that agreement has been reached and that lead-free petrol will be available by 1989. However, the Minister omitted as much as he told us. For example, is it still the Government's intention to reduce the level of lead in petrol to 0·15g per litre by 1985? Can the Minister give us an assurance on that specific point? The hon. Gentleman also said that lead-free petrol would be available by 1989

"or earlier if individual member states wish."

I understand that the West German Government will introduce it earlier. Have the Government any idea when they will introduce it?

The key point about lead in petrol is related to new cars. There was a key omission from the Minister's statement. Without clarification on that point, I am afraid that the statement is utterly meaningless. Unless we know when new cars will be required to run on lead-free petrol, not when lead-free petrol will be available, we cannot be convinced that the Government are prepared to agree to the introduction of lead-free petrol, thereby protecting the health of a great many young people up and down the country.

Mr. Waldegrave: The reason why I had nothing to say about the type approval and about the time when new cars would be required to run on lead-free petrol is that we were not making that directive. What we debate is not up to individual Ministers; it is up to the Commission. There was no directive before us on that matter. That is in a separate directive, and the Government's position remains what it has always been: we shall try to ensure that there is no slippage from the date of 1989. We can hardly be blamed for not discussing it at the previous Council meeting if it was not on the agenda.

I give the hon. Gentleman an absolute assurance that the Government intend to reduce the level of lead in petrol from 0·4g per litre to 0·15 next year, as we have always said. As to whether lead-free petrol will be available earlier, the Government believe that the oil industry and the motor car industry need the octane number, which we have obtained for them, in order to plan sensibly. If they can introduce lead-free petrol earlier—some companies are likely to do so—the Government will welcome it.

The information scheme is separate from the environmental impact assessment. The latter has been agreed, except for a constitutional reserve by Denmark, and we hope that the Danes can agree it at the next Council meeting. The information scheme, which was discussed at the previous Council meeting, establishes the Commission as the gatherer and holder of environmental information across Europe, which is sensible, and we have provided the legal basis and funding for that.

As to the recycling of beverage containers, I must tell the hon. Gentleman that I met a distinguished group of Labour Members from south Wales, including the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who emphasised to me the difficulties and dangers for the tinplate industry in south Wales. I hope that they will welcome the fact that we heeded their advice and have not agreed to a directive, although we would agree to a recommendation.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about nitrogen dioxide, but the individual countries have no responsibility for the order in which matters are introduced. This directive is about the effects on health of nitrogen dioxide in the atmosphere, not about acidification, and it has separate roots. I welcome what the hon. Gentleman said about the agriculture directive. The principal negotation is for the Agriculture Council, but the Environment Council must do all that it can to emphasise its importance to the Community.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): Although we are gratified that the Government accepted all but one and a half of the nearly 20 recommendations of the report on acid rain by the Select Committee on the Environment, those outstanding leave grave concern in some quarters. May we have an urgent debate on the report and the Government's reply, if not before Christmas at least soon thereafter?

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is in the Chamber and will have heard what my hon. Friend has said. There will be such a debate, but the timing has not been decided.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Does the Minister accept that the dreadful tragedy in India suggests that we should make a much more vigorous and penetrating appraisal of modern chemical industries? That being so, will he assure the House that when the promised pesticides legislation is introduced it will serve a real and modern purpose and will offer more protection than do present arrangements?

Mr. Waldegrave: As the hon. Gentleman knows, that legislation is primarily the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The terrible disaster in Bhopal has reminded us of the good safety record of our chemical industry. [An hon. Member: "What about Flixborough?"] Flixborough was our worst disaster; bad though it was, it was two orders of magnitude fewer than the disaster in India.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): My hon. Friend obviously agrees that the Bhopal incident was an appalling tragedy. Does he also agree that, prima facie, the tragedy could have been avoided if the same standards had been applied in India as were applied in America? Does he agree that Britain should advise its chemical companies that when they trade overseas we expect them to treat overseas lives with the same respect as they treat lives here, and that they should never set up plants overseas with lower safety standards, thus endangering lives, whatever the profits, or business may be?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend's question goes a little wider than the Council meeting, and it would be wrong for me to comment on the responsibility for the disaster. My hon. Friend's latter point was sensible. British Governments of both parties have taken the lead in the EC in considering the external effects of trade in dangerous products, including chemicals, and we shall maintain that lead.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends with the expressions of sympathy for the people and Government of India. However, given that in Britain there is manufactured and stored some materials that are reputedly 10 times as toxic as that which escaped in India, what steps are being taken to inform people living in the vicinity of the factories producing toluene diisocyanate of the fact that these products are being made next door to them? Is the Minister satisfied with the safety measures, and, if not, what will the Government undertake to do to reassure the people of Britain that there will be no such disaster, which would be of a potentially larger scale here than in India last week?

Mr. Waldegrave: As soon as that disaster took place, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State asked for an inventory of all such similar substances in the United Kingdom, and he was right to do so. My advice is that the substances are not manufactured in the United Kingdom, but are stored here. We are checking on all the security arrangements. I repeat that, terrible though the disaster in India was, it reminds us that our chemical industry has a good safety record over the years, and I am sure that we shall be anxious to maintain it.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I welcome the prospect of an early debate on the important subject of acid deposition. Can my hon. Friend tell the House a little more about the environmental data? For example, is it the case that the Government intend to extend the range of air quality monitoring stations and to feed that information to the EEC Commission? Secondly, is it still the Government's intention to proceed with an early and comprehensive Bill to improve the measures against air pollution?

Mr. Waldegrave: On the first question, the answer is yes; we intend to extend the monitoring network both in rural and urban sites. As to the second question, we must in due course have a new Clean Air Act, because the framework directive that we agreed earlier in the year in the European Community will require it. Its timing has not yet been settled.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it true that the Government will be exempting three water authorities from the EEC nitrate pollution rules as a result of pressure from farmers who want to save money on the back of the environment? In the light of the Minister's statement, which effectively ducks the issue of acid rain, is it not fair to say that the attempts of the Conservative party conference to paint that party as green on environmental issues was a disaster, a failure and a misrepresentation of the truth?

Mr. Waldegrave: There was no substantive discussion at the Council meeting of the large plant directive, which is what I imagine the hon. Gentleman is talking about, although it is only part of the story about acid deposition. The representatives of three or four countries spoke briefly on it, and three or four countries were against the directive as presently drafted. The hon. Gentleman should remember the other side of the question. It is not only the Central Electricity Generating Board that is against the additional costs involved. We have had similar representations from the TUC.

On the matter of nitrates in water, every application for a derogation in the Community procedure will be looked at individually on its merits. There will be no question of putting at risk the health of anyone in this country.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): Does my hon. Friend agree that the effect of lead in petrol on children has been causing increasing concern in recent years? Therefore, is not the best thing to come out of this meeting the fact that the Common Market countries have agreed to follow the excellent lead given by this Government and have agreed to phase out lead in petrol in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Waldegrave: I did not expect to be congratulated by the Opposition, but the day was important for those of us in the European Community who have campaigned against lead. The Community has finally agreed a directive, which I know will be welcomed by my hon. Friend and by many people both inside and outside the House.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Is the Minister aware that several well-informed authorities in this country believe that there are no technical problems to prevent lead from being extracted from petrol at a much earlier date than 1989? Will he treat this matter with far more urgency than the Government have shown hitherto in the light of the continuing threat to children's intellectual and mental health?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman forgets that there will be a 60 per cent. improvement next year because the Government are moving to 0·15 instead of 0·4. We have to take into account, as we are often rightly urged to do by Labour Members, the employment prospects of people in the motor car industry and elsewhere. We think that the measured progress which we are agreeing, and which has achieved the unity in Europe that has been a major objective all through, is right. We have nothing to apologise for in this matter.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I generally welcome my hon. Friend's statement. When he refers to nitrogen dioxide, is he referring just to what is colloquially known as NO_2 or to all oxides of nitrogen?

Mr. Waldegrave: The directive refers to NO_2 only, and deals with concentrations at a level that may be considered a risk to health. It has nothing to do with the acidification issue.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): On the recycling of beverage containers, the Minister will be more than well aware, from the representations that we have made to him, of the importance of this matter to south Wales, and therefore of our pleasure at the lack of progress. What are the next steps? Is it proposed that the draft directive be returned in a diluted form, or will it come back in the form of a recommendation?

Mr. Waldegrave: It is up to the Commission and the Presidency to decide what will be on the agenda at the next Council meeting. Our position remains the same—that the recommendation is more suitable for this particular legislation. It is worth remembering that hon. Members say that we must go faster on every environmental issue, but the Labour party is not united on this matter.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): I accept what the Minister said about Bhopal. However, is he aware that the health and safety inspectorate has for some time been operating at one third below its target? Is that not a terrible risk to take just to save money?

Mr. Waldegrave: The Health and Safety Executive is not the responsibility of my Department. I am certain that the inspectorate is working at levels necessary to carry out its statutory duties.

Sunday Trading Laws

4.7 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the deliberate flouting of the Sunday trading laws by major companies yesterday".

Yesterday several major stores opened for trading in deliberate violation of the Shops Act 1950. They did so knowingly and blatantly. This is a matter that the House should debate urgently. These stores took their unlawful action in anticipation of the enactment of a Bill which will be based on a report on which a White Paper has not yet been issued.

Two weeks ago, the Prime Minister told the Carlton club:

"Now that democracy has been won, it is not heroic to flout the law of the land as if we still struggled in a quagmire where civilisation had yet to be built."

Does that apply to Heals as well as to the National Union of Mineworkers? Does it apply to Habitat as well as to the Transport and General Workers Union? That happened yesterday and those who flouted the law have said openly that they intend to do so again on a number of subsequent occasions before Christmas. It is now after 4 o'clock, but the Prime Minister has not yet condemned this breach of the rule of law. The Home Secretary is in the Chamber today. He has not yet condemned this breach of the rule of law. The House needs to establish clearly whether there is one law for the miners and another for merchants.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the deliberate flouting of the Sunday trading laws by major companies yesterday".

The right hon. Gentleman and the House know that the only decision that I have to take is whether to give this matter precedence over the business already set down for today or tomorrow. I have listened with care to the right hon. Gentleman, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Later—

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): I did not realise that my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) would raise the subject of the shops legislation, but I had intended to raise a point of order on the matter anyway. You, Mr. Speaker, and the whole House will recall that the Prime Minister is constantly lecturing everybody on the need to obey the law. May we ask the Leader of the House through you, Mr. Speaker, to advise her to come to the House tomorrow to make a statement condemning Debenhams, Habitat and so on for flagrantly disobeying the law?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me.

Later—

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): On a point of order arising from your decision on the Standing Order No. 10 application, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your decision because you are dealing with the business of the House for today, but may I seek your guidance? When will it be possible for the matter to be debated in the House?

On Thursday 29 November on Question No. 1 to the Prime Minister, I referred to the Employment Act 1980 and the Shops Act 1950. I asked the Prime Minister about double standards. I said that the Government were using their influence to ensure that the Employment Act 1980 was obscenely used by the courts and magistrates, resulting in the sequestration of trade union funds. Is it possible for the Home Secretary and the Leader of the House to consider providing time for the Shops Act 1950 to be considered seriously along with the action by business people who are openly defying the law? What sequestration can be operated against these firms for taking the liberty of flouting the law? The Government are deliberately ensuring that the courts enforce one Act but not the other. We want an explanation and a debate on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman heard what I said about the Standing Order No. 10 application. I cannot advise the hon. Gentleman on tactics, but there are such things as Adjournment debates and I am sure that Question Time will provide opportunities to refer to the subject.

Representation of the People Bill

4.10 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may be for the convenience of the House if I rise on a point of order at this stage.

On Thursday, the Leader of the Opposition inquired about how I proposed to take the Committee stage of the Representation of the People Bill. I then said that the usual channels were reviewing what aspects of the Committee stage would be suitable for discussion on the Floor of the House. However, I was unable to conclude those discussions last Friday and thus a Government motion was tabled committing the majority of the Bill to the Floor, while sending other clauses and schedules upstairs. Since then I have taken account of further expressions of opinion. Thus, I have concluded that it would be appropriate to take the entire Bill on the Floor of the House. The Government will, therefore, be moving a motion after the conclusion of the Second Reading tonight, suggesting that the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to the Leader of the House for his volte face, but might it not have been for the convenience of the House if he had raised the subject not as a point of order but as a business statement? He could then have been questioned on the reasons for the change of mind and on the way in which the business is to be conducted. As the right hon. Gentleman has said, there is a motion on the Order Paper stating that only clauses 1 to 12 and schedule 1 are to be taken on the Floor of the House. We now find that all 27 clauses and all three schedules are to be debated on the Floor of the House. Surely there should have been a business statement rather than a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding any comments one might have about the manner of announcing the decision, perhaps you will allow me to thank the Leader of the House for coming to that decision rather than being the first Leader of the House to send a Representation of the People Bill to a Committee instead of having it taken on the Floor of the House. May I express to the right hon. Gentleman the hope that that desire for all-party agreement on the procedures for the Bill will extend further into its substance, thus making its passage easier?

Later——

Mr. Williams: May I return to the point of order that I raised earlier about the announcement by the Leader of the House? This is a matter not of propriety but of practicality which affects the way in which we are to conduct today's business.

Had the Leader of the House made a business statement, as he should have, we would have been able to ask him whether he intends to introduce a timetable motion for the Committee stage of the Bill. If he had said that his intention was to introduce a timetable motion you, Mr. Speaker, might have been influenced in deciding whether to apply the 10 minute rule today. If debates were to be curtailed in Committee you may not think that debate should be curtailed on Second Reading.

Mr. Speaker: It is not my intention to apply the 10 minute rule today because the number of hon. Members who have so far expressed their wish to take part does not justify it.

Later——

Mr. Williams: Further to my earlier point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to pursue the matter, but, as we discovered during Scottish questions last week, when a Minister does not perform his duties properly you are put in an invidious position. It is important to know whether a timetable motion on the Committee stage of the Representation of the People Bill is to be moved. As the Leader of the House found it necessary, on a point of order, to announce his change of mind, will he come to his feet again and say whether there is to be a timetable motion for the Committee stage?

Mr. Biffen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am always happy to help the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). When I said that the Government would move a motion after the Second Reading tonight that the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House, that is exactly what I meant and no more. Of course it does not refer to a timetable.

Coal Industry Dispute (Supplementary Estimates)

4.13 pm

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In today's Supplementary Estimates 1984-85, the note by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury states:

"The Revised Supplementary reflects token provision which is sought in respect of a contingent liability arising under an indemnity given by the Attorney-General for unrecovered costs and other expenditure incurred by the sequestrators appointed by the High Court as officers of the Court in enforcement of the Court's order in the case of Taylor and Foulstone against National Union of Mineworkers (Yorkshire Area) and National Union of Mineworkers."

In effect, that means that the Government will underwrite any costs that arise in the meantime and that are incurred by the sequestrators. Without any precedent, the Government will interfere directly in a court judgment in which they are not in any way involved.

My point of order is that there is no statutory authority in principle with regard to this issue. Do the Government intend to introduce a Bill and will they make an early statement to the House? It is outrageous that Mr. Bernard Ingham gave a full press briefing at No. 10 this morning, but the Government have not had the guts to come to the House to make a statement. I ask that the maximum pressure be brought to bear on the Government so that they make a statement to the House at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman has made his point. It is not a matter for me, but the Government Front Bench will have heard what he said.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may remember that we raised a point of order about the increasing of the supplementary benefit deemed payment from £15 to £16 and that within a few hours we almost had a statement in the House. How can we get the Government to make a statement on this issue, especially as it looks like nothing more or less than political interference in a court action? It is vital that hon. Members should have the right to hear a statement and to ask questions of the Treasury about how once again it has managed to interefere in this industrial dispute.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot advise the hon. Gentleman, but the House well knows my view that it should always be told first of what is going on.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Does not the use of the words mean that this matter should be debated either during the debate on the Consolidated Fund or on a Supply day dealing with Supplementary Estimates? Is it not within the power of the Leader of the House to find time for a debate on this subject, particularly when he knows that any matters affecting the interests of mineworkers should be brought before the House in the current sensitive situation? Is not it an affront to our procedures for the right hon. Gentleman to fail to respond in the way expected when he knows what our orders require?

"the Revised Supplementary reflects token provision"

Mr. Speaker: Of course this issue is debatable during the debate on the Consolidated Fund. However, it is entirely open to the Opposition to choose the subject for a Supply Day—or Opposition Day as it is now called—if they so wish.

Commonwealth Citizens (Entry Clearance)

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for not giving you prior notice of my point of order, but it concerns something that has arisen this afternoon. You will recall that on 22 November the Government announced their intention to introduce a charge for entry clearance. I made inquiries of the Library as to the procedure that the Government intended to use, and was advised that the provision for the fee for entry clearance for Commonwealth citizens is to be achieved by a new order under the consular Fees Act 1980 to amend the Consular Fees Order 1983. In paragraph 22 of the schedule to the order, it is proposed to add the phrase "for entry certificate". I made further inquiries this afternoon and was told that the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. is to consider a new order this afternoon. However I am specifically advised that the words "for entry certificate" are not included.

Will you initiate inquiries of the Foreign Office, Mr. Speaker, to find out how it intends to proceed? Many of us believe that a statutory instrument that imposes a charge on Commonwealth citizens is ultra vires. We further believe that a statutory instrument cannot diminish a right conferred by statute unless the legislation under which the statutory instrument is made expressly provides for such a diminution. The Consular Fees Act 1980 does not do so. We are advised the Parliament can never have intended the Act to be construed in a way that deprives people of a widely debated right preserved by the Immigration Act 1971, and which was reaffirmed in the House by Lord Whitelaw, as he now is, as recently as 11 November 1982. I am further advised that the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. meets next Tuesday and that it would be in order for that Committee to consider a statutory instrument including the words "for entry certificate". If that were to happen I am further advised that there would be no opportunity for Parliament to express its approval, nor would there be an opportunity for any of us to pray against such an order.

Widespread concern is felt about the matter. Early-day motion 200, signed by mysef and 29 other hon. Members, expresses concern and "requests reconsideration of the proposal made on 22 November to introduce, for the first time, a charge for entry certificates for Commonwealth citizens, and points out that refusal of an entry certificate, simply because the fee cannot be paid, would not be lawful under the Immigration Act 1971."

I should be grateful, Mr. Speaker, if you would make inquiries about which procedure the Foreign Office intends to pursue so that Parliament and others concerned about such matters have the opportunity to make representations against the introduction of a charge which we believe to be illegal and a diminution of rights conferred by statute on Commonwealth citizens and their families.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman did not give me notice of that point of order. It is a complicated subject. From what I heard the hon. Gentleman say, surely this is a matter for the Statutory Instruments Joint Committee. The Government Front Bench will have heard what has been said. The content of a statutory instrument is not a matter for me. I cannot make a decision what is in a statutory instrument.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the four Questions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Fishing Vessels (Aquisition and Improvement) (Grants) (Amendment) Scheme 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1879) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Unfair Dismissal (Increase of Limits of Basic and Special Awards) Order 1984 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Unfair Dismissal (Increase of Compensation Limit) Order 1984 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Employment Protection (Variation of Limits) Order 1984 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Biffen.]

Orders of the Day

Representation of the People Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The main purpose of the Bill is to implement the proposals for changes in electoral law set out in the White Paper on the Representation of the People Acts, published last January. The White Paper took the form of a reply to the report by the Home Affairs Select Committee, the great majority of whose recommendations we accept. The House had an opportunity to debate the White Paper in June. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and I then announced some modifications of the original proposals. In addition, the Bill includes a substantial number of lesser changes in electoral law. Wherever possible these changes have been the subject of consultations with the political parties and local authority associations.

The Bill has three main themes. The first is an extension of democracy. The Bill establishes the principle that British citizens may have the right to vote even if they are not resident here on the qualifying date. We are one of the few democracies which make no provision at all for our citizens to vote while resident abroad.

Secondly, the Bill seeks to ensure that, so far as circumstances permit, every person who is given the right to vote is able to exercise it in person at the polling station, or, if he cannot reasonably be expected to do so, by post or by proxy. Every hon. Member knows the frustration of the elector who is at present disfranchised because he is away on holiday on polling day. I have long thought it a scandal that the penalty for going on holiday should be to lose one's basic democratic right.

Thirdly, our aim has been to modernise our electoral machinery. Many of the features of our electoral system were introduced in the 19th century and have scarcely been changed since then. The Bill deals with a variety of detailed defects and problems which have come to light over the years and which there has not been opportunity to resolve before.

The Bill applies to parliamentary elections throughout the United Kingdom and to local government elections in England, Wales and Scotland. It does not affect local government or Assembly elections in Northern Ireland; these elections are governed by separate legislation. Nor, in general, does it affect elections to the European Parliament. There is an exception in clause 3 of the Bill, to which I shall turn in a moment. The European Assembly Elections Act 1978 gives me power to apply the provisions of the Bill to European Parliament elections through regulations. We propose to exercise this power in due course so as, for example, to give holidaymakers the right to a postal or proxy vote at a European Parliament election.

Clauses 1 to 3 extend the franchise at parliamentary and European Parliament elections to British citizens resident abroad. I believe that this change will be warmly welcomed. Many British citizens working overseas are making a major contribution to this country. It is quite wrong that they should be disfranchised for doing so.

That said, problems immediately arise in how to limit the extension proposed. Attempts to separate British citizens into groups according to their occupation, tax status or country of residence pose considerable problems. Moreover, we wish to preserve the crucial link between electors and individual constituencies. Consequently, while we are proposing to extend voting rights by proxy or post to British citizens abroad, wherever they are, we propose a seven-year cut-off point after the elector leaves the United Kingdom. That is bound to be an arbitrary period. I know that some of my hon. Friends would like to see it longer or to remove it entirely. The Government believe, however, that this first—though not necessarily last—major step represents a sensible compromise, and I commend it to the House. It would enfranchise over half a million new electors.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does that not facilitate the right to vote to those whose clear long-term intention is to leave the United Kingdom? Why should they retain the right to vote when they are leaving indefinitely?

Mr. Brittan: As I have explained, I do not think that the basis of deciding which of our citizens living overseas should be allowed to vote would be workable if it were determined on long-term intentions. That would be an idle and useless distinction to seek to make. For that reason, we have proceeded in the way that I have described.

Clause 1 allows a British citizen to qualify as an overseas elector if he fulfils various conditions.

First, he must have been resident in the United Kingdom. I think there will be general agreement that it would be wrong to give someone the vote who has never lived in this country.

Secondly, the person must have been registered as an elector. The reason for this is to provide a simple test of whether the person really was resident here at the material time. But, as we suggested in the White Paper, a person who was too young to be registered while resident here may still qualify.

Thirdly, the right to vote lasts for a period of seven years after the elector leaves the United Kingdom—or, to put it more precisely, for the duration of seven electoral registers after the register in which the elector is last included on the basis of his residence here.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): The Home Secretary has said that the inclusion of a name on an electoral register is proof of residence. Will he reconsider that? The inclusion of a name merely indicates that an individual was resident at an address on one day and completed a form to that effect. Surely he cannot accept that as proof of residence?

Mr. Brittan: I do not think that that is quite right. One can never be sure that the law has not been broken. The test for registration is residence. I do not think that we are saying that the law might not be broken. The assumption has to be that the register has that effect.

Clause 2 deals with the practical arrangements. It allows a person who qualifies as an overseas elector to make a declaration, modelled on the service declaration made by Crown servants and members of the armed forces. The declaration has to be attested in a manner to be prescribed in regulations. As we said in the White Paper, this job would be undertaken by consular staff in the overseas elector's country of residence. If—and only if — the consular staff are satisfied that the person making the declaration is a British citizen who is resident outside the United Kingdom, they will attest the declaration. When the registration officer receives a declaration which has been properly attested at the consulate, he will check that the declarant's number was in the appropriate electoral register and, if so, enter the name in the draft register or electors' lists. Once registered as an overseas elector, the person has the right to vote either in person at the polling station or, under clause 6, by post or by proxy.

Clause 3 extends the new arrangements to European Parliament elections. Both the Select Committee's report and the White Paper were mainly concerned with parliamentary elections—elections to this House. So far as European Parliament elections are concerned, the Council of Ministers is discussing proposals for a Community-wide franchise, and we and the other member states have formally resolved to renew our efforts to reach agreement in time for the 1989 elections. But it is not yet clear what form the agreement will take. It would clearly be indefensible to extend the franchise at parliamentary elections while leaving the European arrangements as they stand. That is why clause 3 gives overseas electors the right to vote at European as well as parliamentary elections. However, further primary legislation on European elections only will probably be needed if agreement is reached in the Council.

Clauses 5 to 10 deal with our proposals on absent voting. We propose to simplify and rationalise existing provisions. We propose also to deal with an injustice which provokes a storm of protest at each election—the denial of the right to vote to holidaymakers. With holidays more and more spread throughout the year, and more people taking them, it is high time for the position to be changed. We therefore propose an extension of absent voting to all those who cannot get to the poll in person, and we also propose some strengthening of the safeguards to prevent abuse. We envisage that this could enfranchise some 600,000 more electors.

Since the House debated the White Paper in June, we have received a wide range of comments on our proposal that applications for absent votes in respect of a particular election should be countersigned by someone registered as an elector, though not a member of the applicant's immediate family. Some have suggested that this safeguard is not adequate. Others have suggested that it should be removed altogether. It remains the Government's view that the principle whereby the normal way of casting a vote is to cast it in person is a sound and necessary one. But we shall certainly consider seriously comments made by hon. Members in the course of the passage of the Bill. I stress that provisions on countersignature would be in regulations made after the Bill receives Royal Assent.

As at present, two basic categories of absent voter are proposed; those who may apply for an absent vote for an indefinite period; and those who may apply only in respect of a particular election. The indefinite period category is dealt with in clause 6. It includes most of those who are in it under the present arrangements, including those who may apply because of the general nature of their occupation, service or employment. To this category are added those who qualify as overseas electors under the Bill. Clause 7 deals with the right to apply in respect of a particular election and clauses 8 and 9 deal with proxies. As at present, the Bill entitles them to vote by post in some circumstances.

The main change is brought about by clause 7(1), which extends the right to apply for an absent vote at a particular parliamentary or local election in Great Britain to all those who, whatever the grounds, cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person at the polling station. I shall say something about Northern Ireland in a minute. This provision is intended to benefit not only holidaymakers, but other voters who find themselves disfranchised under the present arrangements. As at present, there is a requirement that the applicant must satisfy the registration officer that he is entitled to an absent vote, and the registration officer has a discretion to reject the application if he is not so satisfied. The Bill also confers a power for further requirements to be spelt out in regulations.

These clauses make a number of further changes in the present provisions. First, the Bill gives all absent voters the right to chose between postal and proxy voting. The present position is that absent voters must in general vote by post; certain categories, including those who might be expected to be outside the United Kingdom during the election period, have a right to vote by proxy. Most voters prefer postal to proxy voting, but there are circumstances in which someone might want to appoint a proxy even if he or she is in the United Kingdom at election time. The Bill gives the voter a choice.

Secondly, we have not sought to re-enact — except for Northern Ireland — the provision which at present stops a postal ballot paper from being sent outside the United Kingdom. Obviously, there are many parts of the world where proxy voting is the only realistic option. That would be the case, for example, in most countries outside Europe. But for many places in western Europe and on the east coast of America, the election timetable already allows the week or 10 days needed for the issue and receipt of postal ballot papers, provided there is not undue delay in sending them out.

We live in an adult world and it seems right that the voter should again be given the choice. Of course, there can never be a guarantee that a postal ballot paper will get back in time, whether posted from somewhere in this country or abroad. It must be up to the elector to make his own decision in the light of his own knowledge of the postal services. To allow a little more time, paragraph 73 of schedule 3 extends the parliamentary election timetable by one day. This means that at a general election the dissolution of Parliament will in general be the Tuesday rather than the Wednesday just over three weeks before the poll. Paragraph 78 of the same schedule confers a power to prescribe in regulations a last day for the issue of postal ballot papers.

The third major change is that the Bill allows absent voters to vote by post or proxy at all local government elections in Great Britain, including parish and community council elections in England and Wales. This deals with a point raised during the debate on the White Paper by both the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). I think that there is a widespread feeling that absent voting should be allowed at parish and community council elections, and I hope that this provision will be generally welcomed.

As it stands, the Bill does not make any major changes in the right to apply for an absent vote at a particular parliamentary election in Northern Ireland. The view we took in preparing the White Paper was that particular difficulties in Northern Ireland, including the systematic abuse of postal voting on a large scale, made it unrealistic to think in terms of making postal votes available to any new categories of elector there.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I understood him to say that no existing right of absent voting in Northern Ireland was withdrawn. One interpretation of the Bill is that it withdraws the right to an absent vote on a change of residence.

Mr. Brittan: No doubt we shall have the opportunity to examine that specific point as the deliberations continue. I should correct the right hon. Gentleman. I said that the Bill does not make any major changes in the right to apply for an absent vote at a particular parliamentary election in Northern Ireland.

There are already various differences in the law of parliamentary elections as it applies in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Most importantly, the franchise at parliamentary elections in Northern Ireland is considerably more restrictive than it is in Great Britain. In Great Britain, an elector needs to be resident in a constituency on the qualifying date, but in Northern Ireland an elector must also have been resident in the Province for the whole of the preceding three months. Not all people who qualify as parliamentary electors in Great Britain—in particular, those who move into a constituency shortly before the qualifying date—would therefore qualify in Northern Ireland.

It gives the Government no pleasure to increase the scope and number of those differences, but it is right to point them out. I do not think it would be right to hold up a reform simply on the basis that it cannot at present be applied throughout the United Kingdom if that reform, for example, in relation to holiday voters, is otherwise justifiable and necessary.

Clause 12 increases the deposit to be made by candidates at a parliamentary election to £1,000 and reduces the threshold for its forfeiture to one twentieth of the total number of votes cast in the constituency.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor)—and I listened with great care to the various arguments put forward on this issue in the debate last June. Many hon. Members have raised points on it since.

Not many would argue that anyone should be able to stand at a parliamentary election without risk of penalty, even if they clearly have no prospect of support within a constituency. The cost of running elections has increased over the years, and parliamentary candidates have important and valuable rights which are properly conferred on them. They are entitled, on average, to £8,000 of free postage. They gain the opportunity of publicising their views and interests, and some candidates have abused that right for clearly commercial purposes. They have the right to exercise a veto on radio and television programmes relating to the election in which candidates take part. The activities of freak candidates have not just provided innocent entertainment; on occasions, they have been seriously disruptive.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that this will be one of the most contentious parts of the Bill? Is he further aware that it would appear to cut across established convention because substantial changes of that kind were made by all-party consensus? Does he appreciate the fact that, having set this precedent, in future other parties might make similar changes?

Mr. Brittan: This aspect may not necessarily be the most significant in terms of the changes that it makes compared with those measures giving the vote to substantial numbers of people who do not at present have it. None the less, I readily accept that this has been one of the most controversial and debated sections of the Bill. I do not believe that it is right in today's circumstances to suggest that, after a careful process of consultation, there must be unanimity before we can take any steps forward. To do so would provide an opportunity for anyone to impose a veto on all change. I believe that, on reflection, the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) would not think that that was justified.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham) rose—

Mr. Brittan: I must make further progress. I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) in a few moments.

The Government have no wish to be killjoys. If people want to stand at Speaker's corner or hold peaceful meetings to put across their views, that is their right. But the purpose of parliamentary elections is to give people a chance not just to air their views—however interesting or worthy—but to choose Members of Parliament. Serious candidates are people who not only have serious views, but have some serious prospect of representing the electors. That is why, in spite of all that has been said in its favour, we are not attracted by the option of increasing the number of signatures required as a substitute for the deposit.

The signatures option has serious drawbacks. It creates even more work for agents and returning officers, whose work is also being increased by other provisions in this Bill. Several hundred signatures would be necessary if they were to be even a possible substitute for the deposit as a test of potential support. The greater the number of signatures, the greater the amount of checking required and the greater the opportunity for forgery and other malpractice.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that a serious candidate is a person who not only puts forward serious views but has a serious prospect of being elected. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman therefore confirm that the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) was not a serious candidate when, on behalf of the Conservative party, she stood as a candidate in the Glasgow, Central by-election?

Mr. Brittan: That is not a worthy interjection. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that I am talking not about any restriction on people standing for Parliament, but about the level of the penalty that should be forfeited, which has been agreed and accepted by Parliament for a long time. That is the aspect about which I am talking—no more than that.

Sir Philip Goodhart: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that a number of small parties, such as the Communist party, the Ecology party and the National Front, are unlikely to get one twentieth but may get one fortieth of the vote in some constituencies? Will my right hon. and learned Friend look sympathetically at the suggestion that half the deposit should be returned when a candidate obtains one fortieth of the vote?

Mr. Brittan: We shall have to deal with that matter when we come to consider the Bill in detail because, necessarily, any numerical provision has in a sense to be arbitrary. The Select Committee unanimously took the view that the deposit should be forfeit if less than 7·5 per cent. of the votes were secured, compared with 12·5 per cent. at the moment. In the Bill, the Government have put forward a figure of 5 per cent., which involves a considerable liberalisation of the present arrangements.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Brittan: I must make progress, and the hon. Gentleman has already intervened once.

Even hundreds of signatures would be an imperfect test. Many signatories—all experience with petitions suggests this—would sign out of general interest or often even just in order to get rid of those who ask them for their support. Moreover, it would still be possible for extreme candidates, who would obtain minimal support at the polls, to find enough highly committed supporters, supplemented by a number of simply curious people, to reach the number of signatures required.

The test for standing at elections has always been a financial one, for reasons which still hold good today and which have nothing to do with squeezing out legitimate minor parties. A number of hon. Members, I know, would agree that we need a deposit and that we need it at a sensible level, but feel that £1,000 is too much. The Government have listened carefully to their views. We accept that there is no figure that is clearly and absolutely right and that can be defended against all other figures, but the sum of £1,000 was that recommended unanimously by the Select Committee. It already represents a significant reduction from one which would fully reflect the decline in the value of money since the sum of £150 was established in 1918. That figure would be over £2,000. I do not find it surprising, therefore, that the Select Committee should have come to a unanimous view in favour of £1,000.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East) rose——

Mr. Brittan: The reason why the increase seems so large is that successive Governments have failed to take action for such a long time—perhaps, in truth, for too long.

Mr. Wilson: Does the Home Secretary realise that it comes as no surprise to those on the Opposition Benches that the Home Affairs Select Committee came to a unanimous conclusion? The reason is that it did not have any representatives from smaller parties which might have had a vested interest in the matter.

Mr. Brittan: Evidence was taken from people who were not represented on the Select Committee, but I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I welcome the opportunity to make it clear—if it were unclear to anyone—that there is no question of his party having supported the Select Committee's recommendation at any stage. I am not suggesting that it did.

The figure should be studied as part of a package with the threshold. As such, I believe that it is a fair proposition, because, as I have said, we are proposing a reduction of the present 12·5 per cent. threshold not to the 7·5 per cent. recommended by the Select Committee but to a mere 5 per cent.

Some have argued that the smaller political parties could not raise £1,000, even if they subsequently obtained the votes needed to avoid losing the deposit. I do not find that argument convincing. The interest payable to a bank on a sum borrowed for two weeks between the close of nominations and the day after the result is declared would be £6. We are also proposing—I think that this is a help—that returning officers should have a statutory duty to return deposits to those who have saved them the day after the result is declared.

Having said that, I fully acknowledge, as I did during the debate in June, that there will be different opinions on this matter which will need to be considered further. I certainly do not claim that £1,000 is a magic figure—only that, all things considered, it seems the the right one; but we shall listen with care to what is said as the Bill proceeds through the House.

Our proposal for the very substantial reduction in the threshold from 12·5 per cent. to 5 per cent. has often been overlooked by some critics. The 5 per cent. threshold, which in most seats is still 2,000 to 3,000 votes, means that smaller parties will in future have a much more realistic target to aim for. I do not think anyone can argue that it is unreasonable to expect a candidate for election to aspire to poll one vote in 20 in order to justify the considerable benefits that accrue from candidature.

I shall deal more briefly with the remaining clauses.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Home Secretary go back to the clause that he seemed conveniently to be missing when he was running through the clauses—clause 11? It creates offences in respect of overseas electors' declarations and absent voting applications. It provides a maximum fine for offences at level five—currently £2,000—on the standard scale. How does the Secretary of State intend to enforce the penalty of a fine on a person who is resident abroad and whose intention is to stay abroad?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point, but we are talking about people who retain a connection with this country. If there is a conviction by a court, a penalty could arise. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to raise that point during our deliberations, I am sure that we shall have the opportunity to consider it.

Clause 13 raises various minor expenses limits to the levels which already apply to European Parliament elections.

Clauses 14 to 16 introduce a general system for the combination of elections which are held on the same day. The problem here is that if two elections coincide—as happened with the European Parliament general election and the parliamentary by-election in Portsmouth, South last June—different polling stations, ballot boxes, and so on, ought strictly speaking to be used. The Bill allows the returning officer to combine the two elections and to use the same facilities for both. We have also taken the opportunity to give permanent statutory effect to the special provisions introduced in 1979 to combine parliamentary general elections with ordinary local government elections.

Clause 17 postpones ordinary local government elections in 1986 from the first to the second Thursday in May, to avoid the last day of the Passover.

Clause 19 repeals the provisions of the Meeting of Parliament Act 1797 which require the old Parliament to reconvene in the unhappy event of a demise of the Crown after the Dissolution of Parliament at a general election. Under the Bill, polling day is postponed for two weeks if the demise occurs before it; otherwise the new Parliament meets in the usual way.

Clause 22 and schedule 2 rationalise and, where appropriate, increase the penalties available for offences under the Representation of the People Act 1983.

Clause 23 and schedule 3 make a large number of relatively minor amendments to existing law. I shall not detain the House with all of these, but just point out the ones that I think will be of the greatest interest. Paragraph 2 of the schedule allows the name of an elector who has wrongly been omitted from the register to be added nearer the time of an election. Paragraph 34 gives candidates at parliamentary elections the right to have their election communications sent post-free without having to address the envelopes. Paragraph 73 provides for the polls at a parliamentary election to close at 9 pm rather than at 10 pm. That was recommended by the Select Committee. The extra hour was added in 1969, but it is not used a great deal. According to one of the Select Committee's witnesses, it is used by fewer than 5 per cent. of the voters, most of whom would no doubt vote earlier in the day; if they could not, the Bill would allow them to vote by post or proxy. That was the Select Committee's unanimous recommendation.

Mr. Kaufman: What is the relevance of that?

Mr. Brittan: We shall come back to these matters, so the right hon. Gentleman might perhaps contain himself. The relevance is that, whatever other parties may have to say, there were Labour party representatives on the Select Committee, and that was what they voted for. The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to change his mind. We shall consider these matters as the Bill proceeds, but I should now like to bring my remarks to a close.

Mr. Kaufman: On a different but related matter, the Government said in the White Paper that they planned to arrange for polling stations to open at 7 am in local government elections. As the Bill does not include such a provision, do I take it that it will be covered by rules to be issued after the Bill becomes law, and, if so, when?

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. This will be done in new local government election rules, which I shall make after the Bill receives Royal Assent. I hope that that will be to the satisfaction of the House.

Paragraph 82 allows the returning officer to begin counting the votes before all the ballot boxes have been received. That could produce a significantly earlier result in many constituencies. Finally, paragraph 87 gives me the power to make regulations giving the political parties the right to obtain electoral registration data in computer compatible form.

The proposals in the Bill, represent an important extension of democracy. They extend the right to vote at parliamentary and European Parliament elections to British citizens overseas and to holidaymakers. We are also—at last—dealing with the question of the deposit, and a wide range of desirable, if sometimes unexciting, changes are being made to improve our electoral arrangements. Against the background of the Select Committee's valuable recommendations, we have taken a critical look at the whole of election law, amending provisions which in many cases have not been reviewed for a century or more. This Bill strengthens our democracy. As such, I commend it to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong) I should inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the reasoned amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. To avoid narrowing the debate, the Chair will call the amendment to be moved formally at the end of the debate.

5.2 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): That this is a constitutional measure can be in no doubt and we have a motion on the Order Paper calling for it to be handled as such. We are pleased that, however belatedly, the Govenment have changed their mind and agreed to move a similar motion of their own. I hope that before the end of the debate the very much sotto voce response of the Leader of the House to the point of order raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) will be reinforced with absolute clarity to the effect that the Governmet have absolutely no intention of moving a timetable motion on the consideration of the Bill. For that to be done on a measure of this kind would be an outrage.

One of the reasons why we question the Government's plans and motives in that regard is that right up to this Second Reading debate the Government have not handled this measure in a manner appropriate to a constitutional measure. As a result, it contains proposals that will have a profound and dangerous effect on the electoral process. That is the reason for our motion and that is why, if that motion is not carried, we shall vote against Second Reading.

There is no more important or precious legislation than that affecting the franchise. From the result of the exercise of that franchise all other parliamentary measures flow. I do not suggest that to proceed with a Bill of this nature the Government must in all circumstances obtain the agreement of every other party in the House. That would be to impose a veto on legislation which no Government could be expected to accept. The Government must, however, be especially careful to seek to obtain as wide a measure of agreement as possible, but in this instance they have not exercised such care. The Home Secretary referred to consultations with Opposition parties since the White Paper appeared. In fact, Her Majesty's Opposition were consulted on one matter affecting a small aspect of the Bill and on no other matter since the debate on the White Paper six months ago.

The Government ought to exercise such care, because Ministers themselves acknowledged the need for it in the debate on the White Paper from which the Bill stems. On several items they undertook to reconsider their proposals in the light of the debate. In winding up that debate, the Under-Secretary of State specifically and categorically stated:

"We are not saying that we have reached the end of the line; these are our proposals, and we shall expect to force them through Parliament."—[Official Report, 27 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 1083.]

The Government have gone ruthlessly ahead with the proposals that they promised to reconsider and they are now, to use the words of the Under-Secretary of State, forcing through the House a package of which many of the most important ingredients are to some extent opposed by significant elements in the House and one deeply controversial change which is opposed by almost all the Opposition parties as well as by Members of the Government's own party. Even when a proposal has wide support, as in the case of absentee voting for holidaymakers, which the Labour party certainly supports, the Government are proceeding in a manner that shows minimal regard for the electors of one part of the Kingdom.

In legislating on the franchise, Parliament must have regard to three fundamental criteria. First, does the Bill protect the right of any citizen to be a candidate in an election? Secondly, does it protect the secrecy and incorruptibility of the ballot while making it as simple and convenient as possible for electors to use the ballot? Thirdly, does it treat with scrupulous equality and impartiality all those eligible to use the ballot? Judged on those standards, the Bill fails miserably and ominously.

The Bill provides absentee votes for holidaymakers and there is no doubt that that provision satisfies a justified demand from voters which most of us have repeatedly encountered in election campaigns. At the same time, however, it does nothing to rebut the allegation that providing such a right means introducing postal or proxy voting on demand. The Government have solved the problem by ignoring it — except for residents of Northern Ireland.

In the debate on the White Paper, the Home Secretary gave an undertaking about absentee votes for electors in Northern Ireland. He said:

"I have given an undertaking to reconsider the proposals for Northern Ireland to see whether we can find a way of meeting the concerns that have been put to us. That undertaking remains."—[Official Report, 27 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 1024.]

Those concerns have simply not been met. Nor, so far as I can see, has much genuine effort been made to meet them. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) has shown me the dossier of what passed for consultation between the Home Secretary and himself, beginning with an insulting approach from a junior Minister at the Northern Ireland Office—a characteristic example of the Government's celebrated insensitivity.

A new right is being introduced for electors in Great Britain but it is not available on equal terms to electors in Northern Ireland. Speaking of absentee votes, the Home Secretary has said today that we are living in an adult world. Apparently, that does not apply to Northern Ireland. The phrase "second-class citizens" is often fairly loosely used. The basic exercise of citizenship is the franchise. That right is now to be denied to voters in Northern Ireland on the terms available in the rest of the United Kingdom. They literally become second-class citizens.

Such prejudicial treatment of electors in one part of the United Kingdom is unacceptable to Her Majesty's Opposition. It is grotesque that a Northern Ireland elector on holiday for two weeks in Spain during an election campaign will be denied a vote, while lying next to him or her on the beach there may be a Northern Ireland citizen who has left Northern Ireland permanently and who will be able to cast a vote. Indeed, if one part of the Bill demonstrates more clearly than any other the fatuity of legislating without forethought to fulfil a dogmatic aspiration, it is the provision in clause 1 that those who have left this country, perhaps for good, should be given the right to vote for more than eight years after they have left Britain. That is what the alleged seven-year provision for expatriate voting entails.

The whole notion of expatriate voting was conceived in muddle. During the debate on the White Paper, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), with his customary acuity, asked the Home Secretary when the seven-year qualifying period would start. The Home Secretary replied:

"the seven years would start from Royal Assent."—[Official Report, Wednesday 27 June; Vol. 62, c. 1021.]

It now turns out that the Home Secretary misled the House, either deliberately, or through sheer ignorance. With the present Home Secretary one can never be sure which it is—although one can always be sure that it will be one or the other.

No part of the Bill comes into operation on Royal Assent. It will be triggered by commencement orders. That fact, which is apparent to anyone who reads the Bill, was made clear to me in a parliamentary answer last Friday in which the Under-Secretary of State was forced to repudiate the Home Secretary—no doubt to his secret relish.

Again, there is the question whether the electoral registers of previous years will be available so that applications for expatriate votes can be properly checked. The Home Secretary admitted to my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr that there is no legal obligation to keep out-of-date electoral registers. Furthermore, the Bill imposes no such obligation. I have made inquiries today of a number of returning officers and have found that the practice differs from area to area. Some officers keep registers for many years. One officer in Epsom believes that he has the registers for the past five or six years. However, the Bill imposes no obligation. Especially after the massive redistribution of parliamentary boundaries last year, there must be doubt whether old registers will be available in some parts of the country where completely new constituencies have been formed.

Those, however, are only the first of numerous absurdities consequent upon the decision to introduce expatriate voting. Under the Government's dotty proposals, not only former electors get the vote but former non-electors too. Children who left Britain at the age of 11 and have had no contact with this country since then will have the right to vote and to help to decide this country's future, which they may never return to share.

Indeed, the provisions for expatriate votes for children reach an apotheosis of idiocy of clause 3(5)(b), which relates to elections to the European Assembly. The Bill does not refer to the European Parliament. There is no statutory basis for the European Parliament, and the Bill refers to that body as the European Assembly. The provision in subsection 5*(b)* caters to the potential whims of precisely four lads — if I may be forgiven for describing so crudely the scions of noble families. The Government are meticulously providing for the contingency that under-age peers at present resident in Britain may leave the country and yet still want to vote in European Assembly elections. They have a subsection all to themselves. There are only four of them — Baron Fermoy, aged 17, Baron Wrottesley, aged 16, the Earl of Hardwicke, aged 13, and Viscount Dillon, aged 13.

zIt is touching to know that the potential absentee voting rights of those noble striplings are to be protected by their own personal legislative subsection. On the other hand, hundreds of thousands of Northern Ireland electors who are deprived of holiday ballots may take the view that the Government are taking too far the doctrine of kind hearts and coronets.

However, teenage peers are not the only beneficiaries of the Government's largesse. Fugitives from justice will benefit too. We have read with fascination of the unsuccessful efforts of the police to get their hands on five British citizens wanted in connection with robberies worth £32 million, who are now sunning themselves in Spain on what has become known as the Costa del Crime. All those gentlemen will be able to claim an absentee vote, and will accordingly be able to exercise their influence on the provisions of the next police and criminal evidence Bill. Among them is Mr. Clifford Saxe, who modestly disclaims the description "Mr. Big". Speaking a few days ago from one of his two villas on the La Capellania estate at Benalmadena, he said:

"Life goes on as normal here."

The normality of life for Mr. Saxe—whether he is Mr. Big or only Mr. Average Size—will soon be enhanced by the right to vote.

So, together with the teenage peers benefit clause, we have the escaped fugitives benefit clause. Who says that the Government do not reward enterprise—especially free enterprise? Those provisions make altogether ridiculous the nonsense of the penalties laid down in the Bill for expatriate voters who make false declarations. Clause 11(1) solemnly states:

"A person who makes an overseas elector's declaration or a declaration purporting to be an overseas elector's declaration —

(a) when he knows that he is subject to a legal incapacity to vote at parliamentary elections (age apart), or

(b) when he knows that it contains a statement which is false, is guilty of an offence."

Subsection (4) states:

"A person guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale."

How on earth are the authorities to get their hands on such people in order to fine them up to or any other level on the standard scale or on any other scale?

"level 5 on the standard scale"

The Home Secretary shows no signs of taking action against the traders who yesterday blatantly broke the Shops Act in London. That demonstrates the truth of the statement that there is one law for the miner and another for the merchant. How will the Home Secretary punish those who violate the legislation from the safety of Spain or South America? This is one of the silliest innovations brought in by any Government, yet it is also one of the most obnoxious. The Home Affairs Select Committee was unanimous in rejecting it. It rightly warned that it "might have the effect of altering the whole character of British elections."

The proposal breaches three fundamental tenets of electoral law. First, it breaches the universality of the franchise. For citizens who live in the United Kingdom, registration for the franchise is obligatory and failure to register is an offence. For expatriates, registration is optional. Secondly, it breaches the doctrine of no representation without taxation. Thirdly, it breaches the residential qualification, which forms the very basis of the franchise in Britain. However, these optional votes by expatriates might decide what Government we have.

In the 1964 general election, 84 such votes — the Home Secretary said that there might be 500,000 — located in three constituencies could have deprived the properly elected Government of their majority. It is quite unacceptable that the votes of tax exiles should decide the taxes of people working in Britain. It is quite unacceptable that the votes of people who are sunning themselves in tropical climes should decide the heating allowances of pensioners shivering in Britain in the cold of winter. That is not the only proposal in the Bill that could unfairly change the result of a general election.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Did I hear the right hon. Gentleman refer to the doctrine of no representation without taxation? I am not sure where he gets that notion from. Would he argue that nobody should be able to take part in local government elections unless they were ratepayers?

Mr. Kaufman: Not at all. They all pay taxes. Under this Government, if people buy a newspaper or a book they will soon be paying value added tax, unless Back Benchers force the Government to change their mind once again.

The proposal that I have described is not the only one which could unfairly change the result of a general election. The same is true of paragraph 73 of schedule 3, which provides that polling in general elections should end at 9 pm instead of at 10 pm, as at present. The Government, who are so lacking in compassion for the sick, pensioners and the unemployed, are distressed at the plight of polling staff. The White Paper on which the Bill is based says that the final hour of polling

"adds to an already long day for returning officers and their staff."

My heart bleeds. In a Parliament of normal length there are more than 43,000 hours. Are the Government really saying that one hour out of 43,000 is too much to spare for the supreme exercise of democracy—the choice of a Government in a general election?

Mr. Brittan: As the right hon. Gentleman is so exercised by this proposal, could he explain whether there is any problem for anyone in not being able to vote between 9 pm and 10 pm and why they cannot get a postal vote? Moreover, in view of the extreme terms in which he puts is case, why did the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), who sits with him on the Opposition Front Bench, vote in favour of that change in the Select Committee?

Mr. Kaufman: My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) has a perfect right to state his view in a Select Committee. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to impose some form of guilt on my hon.

Friend for stating his mind in a Select Committee, I regard that as offensive. I am saying on behalf of the Opposition that we oppose this provision.

Mr. Brittan rose——

Mr. Kaufman: I shall give way when I have finished my answer. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might be able to arrange his day on polling day to his own convenience, as candidates do, but people who go to work in my constituency—when they have jobs to go to—do not know precisely when they will go home. There are traffic jams, people get caught in buses and they are expected to work late — long after the possibility of applying for and receiving a postal vote. As I shall demonstrate, that final hour is extremely important for many people.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman completely misunderstands me. I was not criticising the hon. Member for Battersea—he was perfectly entitled to register his view. If the hon. Member for Battersea took that view, I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman agrees that it is unlikely that he put his name to a proposal which is as monstrous a restriction of the franchise as the right hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Kaufman: I fear that, in this case, my hon. Friend and I disagree on that point.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford): The right hon. Gentleman has not consulted his Back Benchers.

Mr. Kaufman: Well, we have here a Home Secretary who told the House something false in June and who had to be repudiated by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department in December. We have here a Cabinet Minister who has been repudiated by his junior Minister, yet he tries to open a division between me and my hon. Friend.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the junior Minister did not agree with his right hon. and learned Friend about the need for intimate body searches when the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 was going through the House, according to something that I read during the weekend?

Mr. Kaufman: We all know that there is a terrible split in the Home Office. We shall have to live with that. The only problem is that the right hon. and learned Gentleman seeks to open a rift between me and my hon. Friend when there is a chasm between him and the Under-Secretary of State.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Get on with it.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): He talks, that one.

Mr. Kaufman: I knew that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) had learned to crawl but I did not know that he had learned to speak.

Are the Government really saying that one hour out of 43,000 is too much to spare for voting in a general election? Evidence given to the Select Committee showed that, in the 1979 general election, 4 per cent. of the votes were cast between 9 pm and 10 pm. That might not sound much until it is remembered that one hour represents 6·7 per cent. of the 15-hour polling day. Therefore, 4 per cent. of the votes being cast in 6·7 per cent. of the time available is perfectly creditable. That 4 per cent. might not sound much until it is remembered that 4 per cent. of the votes cast in 1979 totals 1,250,000. A great many people find that final hour useful. The 4 per cent. might not sound much until it is remembered that, in the 1979 election, 70 hon. Members were elected to the House by majorities of less than 4 per cent. Removal of that final hour could affect the results in enough constituencies to change the national result. Perhaps that is what the Government want. I must tell the Home Secretary that we find this provision utterly unacceptable. I advise him that the Bill cannot expect an easy passage through the House if he insists on retaining it.

If the Bill makes it more difficult for electors to vote, it makes it more difficult for citizens to seek votes as candidates, through the increase in the deposit to £1,000. The Government's attitude on this matter utterly violates the assurance given to the House last year by Lord Whitelaw when he was Home Secretary. On 31 March 1983 he said:

> "Many people think that the deposit is unsatisfactory at its present level but the changes should, as they have in the past, be made on the basis of all-party agreement in the House. I think that that is important." — [Official Report, 31 March 1983; Vol. 40, c. 458.]

I believe that if Lord Whitelaw had stayed, that is what he would have done. In the debate on the White Paper, it appeared that the Government intended to adhere to the principle laid down last year by Lord Whitelaw.

The Under-Secretary of State assured the House:

> "That is why I say in all sincerity that we shall consider, in the light of what has been said today, the proposals that we have brought forward for the level of the deposit. I give that assurance to those hon. Gentlemen who have spoken". — [Official Report, 27 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 1089.]

In that debate, out of 13 Back Benchers who took part, eight opposed the £1,000 deposit proposal. Only two supported it. Of the Conservative Back Benchers who took part in this debate, two supported the £1,000 deposit and two opposed it. Yet ignoring the parliamentary opinions to which they had promised to listen, the Government insist upon driving through this increase in the cost of candidature.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): My right hon. Friend earlier told us about the characters residing on the Costa del Crime. Assuming that they would have the right to vote, as my right hon. Friend said they would, and assuming also that they have £1,000, am I right in thinking that they would also be able to stand as parliamentary candidates in any election under the Bill?

Mr. Kaufman: One assumes that they would be able to do so, if they were on the electoral register. A candidate does not have to present himself in a constituency in order to contest it. Very happily, my Fascist opponent at the last general election did not turn up at the election, although my Conservative opponent voiced many of the opinions which he would have voiced had he been present. It is true that a Government cannot accept a veto by Opposition parties, even on constitutional matters, yet on an issue upon which the Government are opposed by almost every Opposition party, as well as by some of their own Back Benchers, it is quite intolerable that they should insist on proceeding in this way. Let me make it clear——

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No. I shall proceed for the moment.

[Mr. Kaufman]

The Labour party does not oppose this proposal out of self-interest. Indeed, self-interest would impel us to support it. On the basis of the proposed 5 per cent. threshold, the Labour party would have lost only six deposits at the last general election. But democracy does not consist of making it comfortable and convenient for Labour or Conservative candidates to stand and making it impossible for others with less support or organisation to offer themselves as candidates.

The Government say that they wish to discourage frivolous candidates. This afternoon we had a somewhat idiosyncratic interpretation and definition of "frivolous" from the Home Secretary, yet many of the candidates who are nominated, even though they may get very few votes indeed, are putting forward far from frivolous views. In this week's Southgate by-election there is a candidate who is advocating shifting freight from road to rail. Is that a frivolous point of view? Another candidate is campaigning for the withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus. Is that a frivolous point of view? It may be that neither of these candidates will poll many votes. Indeed, I hope they do not poll many votes and that every sensible person in Southgate will vote for the excellent Labour candidate, Peter Hemming — [Interruption.] We may have forgotten the Conservative party's candidate before the end of the week. Nevertheless, it would be completely wrong to price minority or even eccentric candidates out of contesting elections, for it is the price which will decide.

A rich eccentric will be able to stand and will be able to afford to use all the appurtenances of candidature, including free postal delivery. A candidate without ample means will be prevented from standing by a provision that is literally a tax on democracy. These limitations on the right to vote at elections and the right to contest elections are baneful manifestations of this Government's repressive approach to the right to dissent in a society which grows less and less democratic day by day. As the symbolic year of 1984 draws to a close, what we have in Britain is a Government who mouth the clichés of democracy while suppressing the free exercise of democracy.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No, I said not now. I did not say that I would not give way later—[Interruption.] All right.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. As he is aware, I have a great deal of sympathy for the remarks he is making about the deposit, but before he concludes his remarks I should like him to explain to us why, if the Bill is so constitutionally important that the Committee stage should take place on the Floor of the House, there are so few of his hon. Friends sitting behind him. There are only 10 by my count at the moment.

Mr. Kaufman: I knew that I was wrong to give way. The electorate have already had one go at throwing out the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that they will take another as soon as they can.

Two weeks ago the Prime Minister made a speech at the Carlton club. Her lecture demonstrated an intellectual impoverishment and a pinched, petty spitefulness which were not only entirely appropriate to the venue, but demonstrated conclusively that the Prime Minister wrote the lecture herself. In that lecture the Prime Minister made this statement:

> "If there is a national debate and a constitutional vote about some matter, and if a recalcitrant minority says, 'The vote be damned, we are going to do our level best to stop the majority having its way', then it's no good saying 'We must seek consensus, we must negotiate'. Such a group will never consent, whatever the majority thinks, until it gets what it wants."

Only the Prime Minister's almost sublime insensitivity can have blinded her to the realisation that here, above all, she was talking about herself. For who is it, if not the Prime Minister, who shrilly proclaims, "The vote be damned, we are going to do our level best to stop the majority having its way"? Who is it, if not the Prime Minister, who will never consent, whatever the majority thinks, until she gets what she wants?

It is the Prime Minister who bans trade unionism at GCHQ in violation of the wishes of the majority of the people. It is the Prime Minister who continues to force confrontation in the coalfields, in violation of the wishes of the majority. It is the Prime Minister who insists on trampling underfoot the elected majorities in our local authorities who seek honourably to carry out the policies on which they were elected. It is the Prime Minister who this very week is steamrollering through this House legislation to abolish seven elected majorities in the metropolitan counties and the GLC because they insist on doing what their electors want rather than what the Prime Minister wants. It was the Prime Minister who, on the issue of student grants, even tried to thrust aside the wishes of the majority of her own parliamentary party.

It is the Prime Minister who, unchastened by this experience, intends, according to today's Daily Telegraph, at Thursday's meeting of the 1922 Committee to warn her Back Benchers not to use their own minds again. It is reported that she will tell them that they must revert to behaving like Lobby fodder instead of freely elected Members of Parliament. In this procession of repression she is now——

Mrs. Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is not the right hon. Gentleman straying very far indeed from the subject matter that we are discussing?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a Second Reading debate.

Mr. Kaufman: As I was saying, in this procession of repression, the Prime Minister has now, with her faithful lapdog the Home Secretary, turned her attention to the electoral system itself. Now she asks Parliament to make it more difficult for more than 1 million voters to vote. Now she asks Parliament to make it almost impossible for candidates with minority views even to seek votes. The Prime Minister, who once gloried in the title "The Iron Lady", has now become the lady with the iron heel. It is in the assertion of the rights of a free democracy that we shall be voting against this Bill tonight.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): In a sense, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in calling me as the first Back Bencher in this Second Reading debate the natural order of things has been reversed, because the last has been made the first. I am the tail-end Charlie of this Parliament. My majority is seven votes. On 9 and 10 June 1983, I had good cause to see the workings of our electoral system at first hand and over many hours, beginning at about midnight and going on to 6.20 am.

The first time the votes were counted, I had lost by two votes. They were recounted a number of times. The perforations were examined on about 52,000 votes on one occasion. The result was declared at 6.20 am. I was firmly of the opinion then that our electoral system was firmly rooted in the horse and buggy age. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on giving the old nag a smack on the backside and propelling it into the second half of the 20th century.

I want to draw the attention of the House to the way in which some parts of the Bill are likely to operate if it becomes law. I always go past one house in my constituency with a wistful smile, because during the election campaign the owner told me that he would not be able to vote for me on polling day, although he would be in this country, because he had an important business engagement and would not be able to get back to Leicester until after 10 pm. Much has been said about the desirability of having absent votes for holidaymakers, and that point has been taken on board, but little has been said about the disfranchisement of those who are kept out of the constituency for other reasons. I am pleased that the principle that has been enshrined in the Bill will go much further than giving votes to absent holidaymakers and will enfranchise those who, through no fault of their own, have to leave the constituency during voting hours on polling day.

I listened to the extravaganza of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), which soon left behind any pretence at keeping in touch with reality and ascended heights of fantasy which, even by the standards that he sets himself, must almost be a record. Voting hours can profitably be reduced by one hour at night. My electors were as anxious to vote as anybody else. No doubt some of them did set out at breakfast time. Although I have heard stories about many misfortunes that befell electors on the way to the polling station—one broke his leg and had to go to hospital to have a plaster applied before being taken to the polling station in a wheelchair—I have not yet heard it suggested that anybody who set off at breakfast time was still struggling to get there at 9 pm. The suggestion that we cannot profitably cut down the hours by one at night totally lacks any merit whatever.

The official mark on the ballot paper does not usually concern most people. However, during the count in my constituency at the election, my opponent asked for each ballot paper to be scrutinised in order that it might be seen that each had an official mark. That mark is put on by a machine before the ballot paper is handed by the polling clerk to the elector. When that scrutiny was carried out and about 50,000 pieces of paper were held up to the light at about 4.30 am, it was found that some 27 votes cast for me and 17 of those cast for my opponent did not have the official mark upon them. Under rule 43 of the polling rules, which every candidate in Leicester must keep in his hip pocket when he goes to the count, they were properly disqualified. If they had been added to the count, I should have more than doubled my majority.

Therefore, I read with interest paragraph 86 of schedule 3, in which it is proposed that is to be simplified. If one compares what is there written with what appears in the existing rules, one sees that the former rigmarole has been replaced by something which is much simpler and much more intelligible, and which the vast majority of electors, when they see it in the polling booth, will be able to read.

The directions say that the elector should make sure that the ballot paper is stamped with the official mark. It also places upon the presiding officer the duty of checking the official mark and its presence on the ballot paper before the ballot paper is put into the box. Therefore, provided that that is carried out, at the next general election in Leicester, South, we can look forward to fewer ballot papers being disqualified because they lack the official mark.

While that worthwhile reform is being implemented, it might be useful to do something about the machines which make the perforation marks in the ballot paper. Some of them are antique contraptions. On polling day, not in Leicester, South but in Leicester, East, some of those machines were taken out of commission because they were not putting the perforation mark into the ballot papers correctly. No such decision on the machines was taken in Leicester, South, although, with the benefit of hindsight, it is obvious that they were just as defective as the machines in Leicester, East.

It is completely unsatisfactory that the enfranchisement of members of the public should depend on whether the polling clerk is so tired that he or she does not lean hard enough on the machine to put the perforation mark in the paper. Will my right hon. and learned Friend try to ensure that some more visible mark is put into the ballot paper rather than those fine perforations, which look rather like a teabag on occasions, so that they can been seen both by the elector and by the presiding officer? In that way, we shall not have a repetition in Leicester, South, or elsewhere, at the next general election of the sort of experience that we had at the last election.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): The hon. Gentleman may be aware that in the 1974 election in Carmarthen the successful candidate had a majority of three. Some 70 ballot papers were disqualified because they did not have a mark on them and they came predominantly from one or two booths. The overwhelming majority of those ballot papers were in favour of the unsuccessful candidate. The question that was raised was whether there is room for fraud in the system in small communities where people recognise which way people vote.

Mr. Spencer: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying.

I suggested to the Home Office that, rather than have a machine, some sort of franking mark should be put down the side of the ballot paper. To give full faith and credit to the principle that ballot papers should be seen to be genuine and inviolate, it is necessary to have some contraption that puts on a mark. The machines are kept in operation for a number of years. As hon. Members may know, the official mark put on for postal votes is different from that for voters voting in person. I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to consider my point about machines and to ensure that they, like some of his other proposals, are brought up-to-date.

Much has been said about the proposal to increase the deposit to £1,000. If self-interest were the only criteria, like the right hon. Member for Gorton, my view might be to the contrary. Three fringe parties stood in Leicester, South during the last election, each of which polled less than 1 per cent. The Ecology party polled 495 votes, the Workers' Party for a Workers' State polled 161 and something that was pleased to call itself the British National party polled just over 100.

Mr. Kaufman: Two hundred and eighty.

Mr. Spencer: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. As he would no doubt be quick to point out, those figures are many, many times my majority. Merely because two of those parties could be classed as parties of the Left is no reason why they should be kept in the political ring so that persons casting their votes for them are not tempted to cast them for my opponent. All I ask is that the political system should be fair.

It is right in principle that there should be a penalty for a failure to obtain a significant share of the vote. The only argument up for grabs is the meaning of a significant share of the vote. No one is suggesting that persons or parties should be disqualified from standing. We are merely asking for answers to the questions: what are the criteria for deciding the point at which a penalty should be exacted and what level should be set for votes not being achieved? I do not regard the argument as being about an article of faith. I take my right hon. and learned Friend's point that if we grossed up the amount to take account of the fall in the value of money over the years, we would be discussing a much larger sum. I take on board his remark about the amount of money spent in providing facilities for those who put themselves forward as candidates during a general election. However, it is all about electing someone to Parliament — it is not about a circus. If certain individuals want to take advantage of the facilities that are provided at public expense, there is nothing wrong in exacting a penalty for a failure to obtain a significant share of the vote.

It must be noted that that significant share of the vote has been considerably reduced. Naturally, I have thought long and hard about the proposals that fix the deposit at £1,000. It may be a little on the high side, but if we view it together with the other proposals, overall they are beneficial improvements which I—even if it should cost me my seat at the next general election—feel it to be my duty to support.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I believe that very much larger principles are involved in the Bill than those stated by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer). It would be a disservice to the House if we reduced the matter of dispute between us—and there are great disputes about the Bill—to the level stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman. I have no doubt that he was concerned about the matters that he raised, but he distracted the House from the major questions that we should be debating.

There was a sharp and comprehensive contrast between the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and that of the Home Secretary. The sooner that my right hon. Friend is transferred to the Home Secretary's office the better for the freedoms and liberties of this country. That must be the view of anyone judging the two speeches — not only because of the sheer merit in my right hon. Friend's speech, which is customary and normal, but because of the degradation of the Home Secretary's speech, which is also customary and normal.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman did a grave disservice to the House in not attempting to justify the way in which he has brought the measure, which involves many major questions, before us. Indeed, objections are being made to all parts of the Bill, as can be seen from the Order Paper. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has a great obligation to attempt to justify what he is doing.

We must all remember that representation of the people Bills are of great importance to the House. Indeed, over the centuries they have been more important than almost any other Bill. The way in which people are elected to the House is of paramount importance, not only to the House but to the survival of democracy. After elections in the 18th century, the House of Commons would spend many hours, days and even years trying to clear up the mess of the last election or trying to stash advantages for themselves for a later election. We escaped from that over a period, but the Government now seem to be returning to some of the old traditions. Almost every week, and certainly every Session, we are presented with a Bill that helps the electoral position of the Conservative party and injures that of the Labour and other opposition parties. Not a single Session passes during which we do not have to discuss these matters. During the last Session the Government introduced a Bill that injured the finances of the Labour party. It was one of the obvious purposes of the Bill. I am not suggesting that every major proposition in this Bill is designed to assist the Conservative party and injure the other parties, but that might be the result. One of my main grievances is the procedure that the Government have followed.

The major question is how the Government have approached this important measure. Representation of the people Bills should always be regarded as of paramount importance. This Government, even before they proposed to take part of the Bill in Committee, said in their White Paper that they would bring forward a major representation of the people Bill. Even the Government admit that it is a major Bill. It was outrageous that the Government should even contemplate the idea of a major representation of the people Bill being presented to the House without all the details being examined on the Floor of the House.

I shall elaborate on the way in which the Government have gone about presenting a major representation of the people Bill to the House of Commons. The details add up to very important questions. There is the question of giving the vote to expatriates or people living in other parts of the world. It is an important principle. My right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton ridiculed that idea, and it will be interesting to see how the Government reply. What would have happened if that had been applied in years gone by? I am not sure whether the Home Secretary was here when one of the major matters that the House was discussing was what was to happen to the country then known as Rhodesia. If the Bill had been in operation, many people in Rhodesia would have exercised their right to decide what would happen in this country. A famous rhyme went as follows:

"True patriots we; for be it understood,
We left our country for our country's good."

Quite a lot of so-called patriots of that nature left their country, and under the Bill they would have taken their votes with them. Therefore, that part of the Bill opens up new principles, which should be examined with great care. If they are to be introduced at all, they should be introduced with some agreement with the Opposition parties, but in the case of the expatriate vote, that has not been done or even attempted.

I entirely agree with what was said today and on previous occasions by my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton about the £1,000 deposit. It is a powerful case against the way in which the Government have been proceeding on the matter, which is wrong. I know that figures can be quoted and comparisons can be made with 1918. We have been able to accommodate these matters since then. It is wrong that a figure of £1,000 should now be imposed, particularly when it is imposed through a Government decision and not by agreement between all the parties concerned on how we should proceed.

There is also a proposal for cutting off the hour of voting at 9 o'clock instead of 10 o'clock. The ridicule poured on the present system by the Home Secretary does not bear any relation to the facts——

Mr. Brittan: But that is what the Select Committee proposed.

Mr. Foot: I shall come to the Select Committee in a moment. All these matters lead to the Select Committee and the right hon. and learned Gentleman, like others, might have been misled by it.

I remember the 1945 election, when voting finished at 8 o'clock. At that time, we still had a comfortable majority, but even so, at 8 o'clock there were people standing in queues outside the polling stations. Many were unable to get in, and many votes up and down the country were lost. That was remedied by agreement between the parties — by discussion. We altered the time to 10 o'clock. I should have thought that the figure of 1·5 million people voting between 9 o'clock and 10 o'clock by itself was a conclusive reason why the time of 10 o'clock should be retained. Therefore, I hope that that proposal will be altered in Committee.

There is also the issue of principle of how people in Northern Ireland are to vote on a different basis from that which will apply to people in other parts of the country. That is intolerable. There must be a uniform system throughout the United Kingdom. I do not mean to say that the people in Northern Ireland treasure the vote more than we do, but they treasure it very much, as something that protects them against violence and all the thuggery of the IRA. Their whole future depends upon the ballot box. Great honour is paid to the ballot box in Northern Ireland, perhaps even more than anywhere else, although all our lives depend upon upholding the authority of the ballot box. For the right hon. and learned Gentleman, on his own whim and without discussion with the parties affected, to say that there will be a different principle in Northern Ireland from the one that operates in other parts of the country, is insulting. It will not work. I hope that that proposal will be destroyed in Committee. At the end of tonight's debate, the Government should accept that.

With regard to the holiday provisions, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton rightly said, it is just and proper that there should be workable arrangements in that respect. However, the other measures amount to a major change in the way in which representation in the House is carried through. It is outrageous that the Government seek to introduce a measure of this character — what they themselves call a major representation of the people Bill —without the normal processes of consultation.

The Home Secretary referred to the Select Committee. However, Select Committees are not a substitute for the normal procedure. Many of us had discussions about the establishment of the Select Committees and said that one of the dangers was that some unwise Ministers who did not pay proper attention to the genuine and well-established traditions of the House would say, "We can take account of what a Select Committee says on the matter." That is the trouble with Select Committees. Governments can pick and choose. This Government pick and choose. They do not agree with every Select Committee. If they think that a Select Committee such as the Select Committee on Home Affairs agrees with them, they say that it has made the recommendation. But they did not accept all the recommendations of even the Select Committee on Home Affairs. They pick and choose. They say that they will take half a dozen of the Committee's proposals and perhaps they will be able to get them through the House.

I dare say that the old-fashioned habit of discussing representation of the people Bills in Cabinet is still preserved, but perhaps that is carrying things a bit far. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman had to persuade the Cabinet—if he had to—I dare say that he said, "We have the Select Committee on our side." Why did not the right hon. and learned Gentleman look at the normal traditions? They are even in his own White Paper. He could have read the paragraph before the one that mentions the major representation of the people Bill, which says that on all such previous occasions when there have been major changes there was a Speaker's Conference. That was not so in the old days. In the 18th century, parties would try to wrest their own advantage from their majority in the House, which might be a temporary majority. It took years to establish incorruptible processes of election in the House. It was one of the major fights for democracy. However, we are returning to those old corrupt days, when Ministers used their majority for their own purposes. Why did not the Minister stop to ask himself, "Why should there be this tradition of having a Speaker's Conference on the matter?" The reason is that he did not discharge his responsibilities properly.

Mr. Brittan: If the right hon. Gentleman hastens to import motives to people, which I would not do in this case, I should tell him that the position is clear. He must be aware that the way of handling these matters by a Speaker's Conference has been subject to an enormous amount of criticism, most cogently by Mr. Speaker Selwyn Lloyd, who, after he was involved in such an operation, came to a firm view as to its unsuitability as a means of handling these matters today.

Mr. Foot: That is a new principle that has been enunciated. Mr. Speaker Selwyn Lloyd may have said that in an off-beat comment, but is it Government policy that we have no more Speaker's Conferences? If that is the Government's view, they should have said so in a proper declaration. We should have been told when they introduced the Bill that the reason why the Government would not have a Speaker's Conference was that they mistrusted Speaker's Conferences. That should have been stated clearly if it was the Government's view. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will have his opportunity to say that he believes that Speaker's Conferences are not the proper way to deal with these matters and that that was the Government's decision although, carelessly, they have not announced it until this moment.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. I have said publicly that I do not believe that a Speaker's Conference is the most appropriate way. As the right hon. Gentleman is so enthusiastic about Speaker's Conferences, will he explain why, when he was Leader of the House in 1969, the extra hour's polling time was introduced, contrary to the recommendation of the Speaker's Conference and against the wishes of the Conservative Opposition at the time?

Mr. Foot: The Secretary of State had better take a little more time to check his facts. So far from it being the case that the Labour Government believed it wrong to have a Speaker's Conference to deal with such matters, and so far from us having adopted what the right hon. and learned Gentleman now calls the "Selwyn Lloyd" principle—that one pushes Speaker's Conferences to one side because they are not fit to deal with such matters—the Labour Government insisted on a Speaker's Conference to deal with the most critical representation of the people Bill that we have had to deal with, which related to Northern Ireland. We said that it must go to a Speaker's Conference because we believed that it would then command much more support in the House and throughout the country, as events proved.

The Opposition have never accepted the doctrine that Speaker's Conferences are not fit to deal with such matters. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, in a document presented to the House, explained how Speaker's Conferences were used to do so previously. Even if some believe that a Speaker's Conference would not be the best way to do it, what has happened on this occasion proves the case. Instead of introducing a measure that could have commanded universal support because it had been examined properly, the Government have made the grave mistake of saying that they will not have a Speaker's Conference, but that they will take instead portions of a Select Committee's recommendations. That is why not only the right hon. and learned Gentleman but the House of Commons is in such a mess.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman talks about a mess. Does he believe that the 1969 Government were wrong to reject the recommendation of the Speaker's Conference, which had decided against extending polling hours? The 1969 Government insisted on that change, against the wishes of the Conservative Opposition. If the right hon. Gentleman is so keen on Speaker's Conferences, he has some explaining to do now.

Mr. Foot: I did not notice that the right hon. and learned Gentleman apologised to me at the beginning of his remarks. I was not Leader of the House in 1969. I was performing the functions, which I am now performing, of contributing to debates from the Back Benches. I should be happy, for the right hon. and learned Gentleman's benefit, to look up everything I said then, and treat him to a full survey of it on a proper occasion.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman is the Minister and should be responsible for such matters. He made the wholly unjustified charge that I was opposed to dealing with such matters by a Speaker's Conference, but I have already given him a clear example that in the Parliament when I was responsible for those matters I said that the House could deal with them properly only by having a Speaker's Conference and letting everyone from different sides give evidence. Such a procedure now would have provided a real chance of getting the Bill through the House of Commons.

The Secretary of State has failed in his duty to the House. He has produced a squalid little measure that may have advantages for the Conservative party, but which has not been thought out properly. He may discover that, as with the trade union legislation introduced by the Government—which is designed to injure the finances of the Labour party—some of the measures in the Bill, which are designed to assist the electoral processes of the Conservative party, will not succeed. The debate on the Representation of the People Bill, which includes major changes, should have been introduced in an entirely different way. If the House of Commons becomes bogged down in constitutional procedures, the responsibility will rest with the right hon. and learned Gentleman and with the Cabinet who were foolish enough to listen to his advice.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Contrary to what we have heard in the debate from Opposition Members, most people will welcome the Bill. Its proposals show that the Government are sensitive to public opinion, and I am glad that they have been introduced. In a democracy it is desirable that electoral arrangements should have consensus support from the parties generally, and I am sorry that the Opposition parties have not seen fit wholeheartedly to welcome the proposals. The amendments on the Order Paper show that they are very much out of touch with public opinion.

I was a member of the Joint Committee that considered the consolidation of the several Acts relating to electoral law which became the Representation of the People Act 1983. We were responsible for consolidating the law, not for making new law. Our biggest problem was deciding how the requirement for urgent messages to be conveyed to the returning officer by telegram should be dealt with following the abolition of Post Office telegrams. However, it was apparent during our consideration of that consolidation that the existing electoral law was badly out of date and that changes were necessary. I am glad that the Government delayed for no longer than was necessary following the publication of the report from the Select Committee on Home Affairs and the Government's answer in the form of a White Paper.

Although I welcome the Bill generally, I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will forgive me if I devote some of my time to concentrating on ways in which the Bill can be improved in Committee.

It is right that those who, by their decision or that of others, live and work overseas for a time should not be deprived of their votes. It is unfortunate that the Opposition attach disreputable motives to those United Kingdom citizens who spend time abroad, when many of them do so in the service of the country.

As my right hon. and learned Friend said, some believe that the right to vote in such circumstances should not be qualified by a time limit. It is argued that, as United Kingdom citizens, such people still have close contact with this country even after many years. But those who argue that have forgotten that votes are given not for Governments but for candidates. Due to the processes of electoral registration, the limit of seven years could sometimes be extended to more than eight years from the time when the individual went overseas. We must ask ourselves whether, after such a long period, it would be likely that someone would still have a close connection with his previous constituency and whether he or she would be likely to return to that place. For that reason, I believe that there should be a time limit, and the limit specified in the Bill of seven years is by no means unreasonable.

If an election takes place during the summer — my right hon. and learned Friend said that the period during which people take holidays has spread — many people are likely to be prevented by their holiday arrangements from voting. Justice demands that they should not be deprived of their vote through no fault of theirs. The greatest difficulty lies in the definition of those circumstances in which a postal vote should be allowed, and this is obviously a problem with which the Home Office has had to grapple. I am concerned about the wide latitude written into the Bill, which seems almost to provide for a postal vote on demand. The numbers seeking to take advantage of the new provision may be considerable, and the extension of the postal vote provision can be, if we are not careful, an invitation to abuse. It should be noted that the absent vote has been extended to local government and to parish council elections, where the majority of people tend not to use their vote. It is not difficult to imagine that this will encourage abuse when combined with the widening of the absent voting provision.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be so critical of the extension of the postal vote to parish councils, where the polls are generally much higher than they are for district and county council elections, and where the total exclusion of postal voting has been unreasonable.

Mr. Waller: The hon. Gentleman may have misunderstood me. I am by no means opposing the extension of the postal voting provisions to parish council elections, but the turnout varies considerably, and in many parish council elections the vote is extremely small. I know of parish council elections where it has been well under 20 per cent.

Penalties are available, and the Bill provides for those penalties to be increased where such abuse is detected, but detection and enforcement, although they may exist, may in reality become almost imposible. The requirement that anyone applying for a postal vote should have to obtain the counter-signature of another elector provides effectively no protection at all. I hope that, at the very least, the Bill will be amended so that the declaration needs to be made in front of a Justice of the Peace. This should be considered in Committee.

It has already been argued in the debate that the candidate's deposit should be replaced by an increase in the number of signatures required on a candidate's nomination paper. The figure of 500 signatures has been suggested, but it is interesting to note that the Ecology party, which has been in touch with hon. Members has suggested that the figure of 100 might be more suitable. This may reflect the difficulty with which that party might be faced in obtaining 500 signatures.

However, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has said, in many instances people are prepared to sign nomination papers without giving any commitment to candidates. Therefore, the need to obtain 100, or even 500, signatures will not provide any great obstacle. A financial deposit has been traditional in this country, and there are good reasons for continuing with it, although the exact figure is open to question, and again this is an appropriate issue to be considered in Committee.

Schedule 1, part III, concerns municipal elections in the City of London, and I am surprised that it has not been mentioned already in the debate. I shall refer briefly to certain aspects of the procedures there. I strongly believe in the importance of tradition and I support the City's right to retain its ancient traditions. However, tradition ceases to be a virtue and becomes a threat when it becomes incompatible with democracy. One of the great strengths of Parliament arises out of the fact that it has combined a respect for tradition with a willingness to change its procedures when it has been obvious that that has been demanded. Unfortunately, this has not always been such an obvious feature of the City of London.

The danger of electoral abuse is greater in the City because the wards have remained unaltered since medieval times. For example, there is one ward with only just over 30 electors, while another has over 2,500. To be an elector in the City, one needs to be neither a resident nor someone who works there, because partners may vote in those wards where their firm has its offices. Despite the Bill's intentions, a partner may vote more than once in a local government election in the City because each ward is a separate electoral area. Just as one of the partners in a large stockbroking or accountancy firm can vote more than once, so he can appoint a proxy to vote in each of those wards where his firm has an office, regardless of whether or not he works in the City.

Although I understand that the Home Office undertook to look at the question of applications for personal votes by power of attorney, no provision relating to the power of attorney has been included in the Bill. At present, there is the unsatisfactory position that all the partners of a professional firm in the City of London can appoint one of their members as attorney to apply for postal votes on behalf of each of them.

There are several reasons why this matter is important at this time. The abolition of the Greater London council will mean that the City will be a unitary authority and the only local government authority that those living in the City can look to for the provision of services. Many changes are taking place in the City at the moment, involving the takeover of firms, which I feel are tantamount to the opening of a Pandora's box for future elections. I wonder how many people are aware that elections to the Court of Common Council in the City can, in the case of some wards, be controlled by a very small number of individual firms.

Years ago, changes in the City's electoral practices would have been easier to implement than they are today.

[Mr. Waller]

Today they will be easier to implement than they will become in the future, and I hope that, during the passage of the Bill, some essential reforms will be introduced.

It is right that electors should not be deprived of a vote because they are living abroad or are on holiday. It is obvious to me and, I think, to most people in the country that a deposit of £150 is completely out of date and more suited to the last century than to this. I look forward to the early passage of this legislation, and to its improving our form of democracy.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I agree with a number of the anxieties that have been expressed by the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) about the Bill in its present form. I think it a thousand pities that the Government, whatever may be our view as to the absolute validity of a Speaker's Conference, did not have the benefit of such a conference before the Bill was introduced. There is no substitute for it in the form of a Select Committee. A Select Committee is not capable of delivering to the House or the Government the agreement of the several parties represented here. That is so for one reason that is worth stressing: individual hon. Members do not sit on Select Committees as delegates or representatives of their respective parties, and it will be an ill day when we hold them, in the deliberations of a Select Committee, to be committing their respective parties.

The Bill, in its major provisions, undermines some of the most fundamental characteristics and principles of parliamentary representation, and notably three. The first is the significance of place or locality. The second is the importance of uniformity throughout the country. The third is the importance of simultaneity of voting. I shall take those points briefly and then consider how they relate to the Bill.

The House is a geographical representation of the kingdom. We come here sent from our respective places. We do not have a mass poll of the citizenry to elect a Government or a Prime Minister: instead the electorate of the several places send one person to Parliament, to use his discretion on their behalf. That is one of the profound characteristics of the House of Commons. It is at variance with the principles on which other deliberative assemblies are founded; but it is certainly something that goes to the roots of our parliamentary democracy. Indeed, it is the reason why the House of Commons has its name. It is the House of the "communities" Indeed at times in the middle ages it was called the communitas communitatum—the place where all the communities, through their representatives, gathered together.

As for the principle of simultaneity, that does not perhaps have so long a history. Indeed, in the days before the ballot Act it was not uncommon for elections to last not merely for several days but for several weeks. Yet I do not think it can be controverted that since the prevalence of the ballot, and certainly since universal franchise has prevailed, simultaneity is one of the essential characteristics of our elections and is the principle that gives validity to the composition of the House of Commons as determined at a general election.

It requires only a moment's thought to see the importance of the simultaneous vote by the whole electorate in person—in principle—and upon the same day. Events happen, things are said, promises are made and broken during the course of an election campaign, that influence and sway large bodies of the electorate. If a substantial proportion of that electorate can be shown to have voted before such and such an event occurred, doubt is inevitably cast on the outcome of an election in which not all electors have been voting in the same circumstances, in the same position and upon the same proposition. Therefore, simultaneity is an essential validating character and quality of the principle of election, whereby on one polling day the whole nation goes to the polls—in principle—in person.

I accept that to some extent we have modified that principle in the provisions hitherto made for absent voting. We have made provision for absent voting, notably in two important areas. The first is where a person, by removing from one place to another, is unable to exercise his vote in the only place where, by reason of our emphasis upon locality, he can do so. That is a very important aspect of the absent vote hitherto. The second involves what I might almost call the compassionate consideration—that those persons physically disabled from going to the poll should nevertheless not thereby be prevented from voting.

Although those modifications to the principle have been made, the principle remains important, and we should be exceedingly jealous and careful of any extension of that proportion of the electorate that votes at a different time, in different circumstances and faces different facts, indeed what one might almost call a different world, from the rest of the electorate.

The third principle has already been mentioned, and it is that of uniformity. All Members of Parliament, who are equals one with another, should be elected by an electorate constituted and qualified in the same way, and having the same rights, the same opportunities to cast their votes. Indeed, the unity of the realm, which is expressed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, ultimately depends on the unity of the electorate.

All those fundamental characteristics of a valid electoral system are undermined by the Bill.

The principle of locality as well as of simultaneity is undermined by the provision for overseas voting, whereby a person who had a connection seven or eight years ago with a locality is held to be on an equal footing with those who still reside there, who hear the candidate's speeches, who know the circumstances of the area and who have, during the past seven or eight years, lived through the experiences of that locality. That is a serious breach in the integrity of our electoral process, and we should seriously qualify it or reconsider it before we allow the Bill to reach the statute book.

Even more serious, certainly quantitatively, is the principle of absent voting by choice which is now introduced for the first time. One has only to read the staggering wording of clause 7(1) (a) to understand that that is no exaggeration. It states that the registration officer shall grant an application for an absent vote if "he is satisfied that the applicant's circumstances on the date of the poll will be or are likely to be such that he cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person at the polling station allotted".

I do not know whether to call that arbitrary or ad lib. From the elector's point of view, there is virtually no limit to the grounds upon which he can argue that it would be inconvenient to the degree of impossibility for him to turn up at that place on that day. We have already had the example of a business man who was unable to return to his home before the poll closed at 10 pm. Does a business man say to the registration officer 10 or 20 days, or even more than that, before the date of the poll, "Look, I'm a business man and I occasionally make trips to London. For all I know, I might have to make a business trip on the day" —[Interruption.] Does the Under-Secretary of State wish to intervene?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am sorry that I appeared surprised. I would happily have left my rebuttal of what the right hon. Gentleman has said—so far as I am capable of rebutting it—until later. But he might recall that it has been possible since the 1940s for those who think that they might be away on business to obtain a postal vote.

Mr. Powell: I do not quite think so. That is the case where the nature of a calling or occupation is such that the contingency has to be reckoned with; but we are dealing here with something different. After all, even the limited opportunities still to be left for the electors in Northern Ireland will allow them to consider the character of the occupation of the peron concerned. But there is an immense range of other circumstances in which anyone can legitimately claim that he might well find it inconvenient or impossible to get to the polling station on a given day. There is always an invalid aunt in Halifax —as all who have been candidates will know, our key workers tend to have invalid aunts in Halifax who take it into their heads to die during the last stages of an election campaign. That is surely a ground upon which the applicant's "circumstances are such that he will be, or may be likely to be," unable to go to the poll. His aunt is a close relative and ill, and he argues that, in case of bad luck, he had better have a right to vote—an absent vote "just in case". So on the one hand there is an open invitation and a menu card for absent voting, on the other there is an extraordinary responsibility placed on a registration officer when the definition is so wide.

The Home Secretary may say, "Don't you worry about that, because I am going to put a much closer definition into the regulations." I hope that he will not say that, because it would not do. It would not do for the House of Commons to pass something such as clause 7(1)(a) on the understanding that after the Bill is passed the words will be narrowed and defined in some unforeseeable way, perhaps by regulations subject to affirmative or—who knows?—negative resolution.

Therefore, we are confronted with an inadmissible and indefinite extension of the potentialities of absent voting. In many a constituency that scope is sufficient to cast grave doubt on the validity of a particular outcome that might be crucial to the composition of the House and so to the nature of the Government.

I come to uniformity. The Home Secretary says that there are respects in which the electoral law in Northern Ireland is not identical with that in the rest of the United Kingdom. So there are and when a Bill that has just gone to the other place receives the Royal Assent, a further extension will have been given to that variation, over the —parliamentarily speaking—dead bodies of my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself. The Home Secretary quoted part of the Representation of the People Act—section 1(2)—which creates in Northern Ireland a residence qualification different from the residence qualification in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Incidentally, it is a United Kingdom Act passed by this House: let there be no question of it being a relic of the Stormont Administration in Northern Ireland; it is something that the House thought it right and appropriate to enact and apparently thinks it right and appropriate still to keep on the statute book, though that perhaps should now be debated again in view of the great importance that I am at this moment stressing of uniformity of qualification and of electoral process in all parts of the United Kingdom.

Two things are happening in the Bill. First, a new opportunity to vote is being created in the rest of the kingdom but that opportunity to vote is being withheld from my constituents and those of my right hon. and hon. Friends. That is one thing that is happening. But something more atrocious, which I cannot believe that the House will suffer, is also happening. A right to vote which is already possessed is being withdrawn silently by means of omission from a list in clause 7(2). Without any paraphernalia or publicity, the right for a person removing from one place to another to cast his vote during the validity of that register in the place where he is registered is being silently withdrawn in Northern Ireland.

I cannot believe that there can be any justification for that in the circumstances of Northern Ireland, or on any other grounds. Indeed, I have reason to suppose that this is a conclusion which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary has come to with considerable hesitation. I rely much on expressions that have fallen from him at various stages, both in correspondence and on the Floor of the House.

We are told that in Northern Ireland there is abuse of the electoral process, that there are many electoral offences committed there, and that we must not open a wider field for the commission of those offences. Well, we are talking about absent voting either by post or by proxy. Now, I have not heard it seriously stated that widespread serious abuse can occur in voting by proxy. In effect, therefore, it comes down to voting by post.

I concede that postal voting for the disabled or for the sick is open to abuse—not only in Northern Ireland. Not only in Northern Ireland are certificates given lightly, collected and filled up batchwise to confer votes upon people who might, on a strict interpretation, not be entitled to vote by post by reason of physical disability.

Still, I concede that it is possible for evilly minded and militarily organised people, as in some areas of Northern Ireland those persons are, to abuse the availability of ballots in the homes of those who have been certified to be physically disabled.

I do not deny that. However, in what circumstances could the most fantastic organisation—evil no doubt, determined no doubt—abuse ballot papers sent to the new addresses to which persons removing have gone either in a distant part of the same constituency—that is possible under our Ulster election rules—or in another constituency 50 miles, 100 miles, 200 miles away? It is unthinkable that the facility which is being taken away from Northern Ireland is one which could seriously be the subject of abuse. That simply cannot be argued.

As for the absent voter, if an address has to be specified —the address will be specified in the list of postal voters that has to be published by the registration officer —the degree of organisation necessary to commandeer the ballot papers from the various addresses to which they have been posted in the crucial period so as to ensure that intimidation is brought to bear in filling them up is beyond all imagination.

So, what the right hon. and learned Gentleman finds himself doing — I have chosen my phrase carefully because I cannot bring myself to believe that he would regard what I have described as just or justifiable — is refusing to confer a new right and withdrawing an existing right, both of which, whatever might be said of other voting rights, cannot imaginably be the subject of widespread abuse.

As in all matters, the ultimate guarantee, the ultimate safety net, for the people in the Province where I represent a constituency lies with this House. This House is the ultimate safeguard of all minorities, of whatever kind they may be, in whatever part of the country they may be. It is to this House, before the Bill passes, that we confidently look to see that an injustice is not imposed upon a part of the United Kingdom which has all too much reason, real or imagined, to consider itself the victim of injustice. It is to this House that we appeal.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): It is always challenging to follow the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I was interested in his remarks about the need for uniformity throughout the kingdom. I remember a debate some years ago about the extension of the laws governing homosexual behaviour between consenting adults in Northern Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman spoke fervently in favour of differences in practice across the United Kingdom. I think that he used the phrase "rich diversity" and said that the differences should be cherished.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. Not only did I vote, first, in Scotland and then in England for the repeal of those laws, but I never concealed in Northern Ireland that that was my view.

Mr. Parris: I must have misunderstood the tenor of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks in that debate, which I attended throughout.

It is encouraging to be told by the right hon. Gentleman that my constituents voted for me rather than for the Conservative party. I should like to believe that. It might be true for some. At least I shall encourage my constituents to believe that there might be some difference between voting for me and voting for the Conservative party if I vote against Second Reading tonight.

I was determined to do that before I heard the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). To say that he overstated the case would be an understatement. The right hon. Gentleman so overstated the case that I was all but convinced to change my mind.

It is not fair to suggest, as the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) suggested, that the increase in the deposit to £1,000 is part of the Conservative party's plan to improve its own voting figures. I disagree with the increase and I shall say why later. I do not think that there is any sectarian party purpose in it. The Labour party would probably stand to gain most from the disappearance of the small fringe parties. I do not think that the Conservative party would gain anything. It is more likely that we would lose something, because sometimes fringe parties enable our candidates to squeeze through.

When the parliamentary deposit was set at £150, it was a large sum. It was an enormous sum. It was intended to prevent people who were not of substantial means and could not be confident of achieving a substantial vote from standing for Parliament. That was not right then, and the fact that a custom is old does not necessarily make it a custom that we should want to follow.

The deposit was set in an age when money talked in politics even more than it does now. Money talked in the running of a politial party, in the securing of a candidature and sometimes in securing a seat in Parliament. That was an age when poor men did not stand nearly so often for Parliament. It was much more difficult for them to do so and there was no prevailing belief that they should. Society took a robust view of the political advantages that money could buy. It is no accident that no attempt has been made over the intervening years to maintain the deposit at that high level. It is not due to inattention that we have allowed the financial penalty for electoral defeat to diminish. The diminution has come with increased sensitivity about links between wealth and political power. I am sorry that in some senses the Bill goes back on that increased sensitivity.

The passage of time has eroded the financial value of the penalty and my right hon. and learned Friend is right to remind us of that. However, I think that it is a good thing that the value of the penalty has been reduced. The Bill undoes and reverses that and at one stroke restores all the inequity which was inherent in the theory on which the penalty was based. As I have said, not everything that is old is right. That there should be a heavy financial penalty for failing to secure many votes is offensive in principle. Whether "many" is defined as 20 per cent., one eighth or one twentieth of the votes cast does not alter the principle, which remains offensive. To reduce the requirement from one eighth to one twentieth lessens the extent of the damage, and it would be wrong not to acknowledge that. I am grateful for the reduction, but it does not alter the bad principle and much damage will be done by its application.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): My hon. Friend, like many others, has in mind the way in which the deposit will have an effect on candidates of legitimate fringe parties and on those who wish to put across minority points of view. Is he aware that one of my Nottingham colleagues experienced something quite different? He found that there was a deliberate plan to deceive by candidates standing as the "official" something, the "local" something or the "genuine" something. That is a growing practice. The "official" candidate seeks to take the title of the Conservative, Labour or Liberal candidate by putting an adjective in front of the party's title. He is seeking to deceive and to split the vote. That cannot be right. I believe that an increased deposit will help to stop that practice.

Mr. Parris: If there is a good chance of securing the defeat of a Conservative candidate by such means, those who engage in the practice will be capable in many instances of raising the £1,000 to enable them to do so. There have been attempts to deceive and, on the whole, they have not been successful. Indeed, they have been remarkably unsuccessful. Against remedying that practice must be balanced the damage that my hon. Friend rightly concedes will be done to many genuine fringe and smaller parties.

With respect to my right hon. and learned Friend, I do not think that it was right for him to go through his speech, which was not short, without mentioning the general principles or the practical consequences of this measure for many of the smaller fringe parties. Damage will be done especially to those individuals and parties to whom and to which our constitution is arguably rather unkind. There are stirrings in the electoral undergrowth. There are movements among those who form the political equivalent of the small business enterprise to which my party is rightly wedded. I have in mind political ideas and parties that have only recently started. Imagine the fuss if the Government proposed penalties in the form of forfeiture of bonds to be imposed upon new and small businesses which failed to secure a given number of customers within a prescribed time. If Tesco, for example, were to call for such an imposition on every small corner shop which entered the market, would we be on Tesco's side? In political terms we are, perhaps, the equivalent of Tesco.

It is inherently likely that a political movement will start from a base of less than one eighth or one twentieth of electoral support. By punishing a political party for risking that test, the Bill may prevent many movements from even starting. Would the Labour party have started and risen to supplant the Liberal party without the resources of organised labour on which to draw? The Labour party had to run the risk of lost deposits. Was its dependence on organised labour a healthy one? Should we encourage dependence of that sort?

Mr. Mellor: When the £150 deposit was introduced in 1918, it was the equivalent of about nine months income for someone on the national average wage. If it was intended to stifle the Labour party, it was not very successful.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Many hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate and some, inevitably, will be disappointed. It would be helpful if those seeking to catch my eye, including the Minister, reserved their interventions and incorporated them in their speeches.

Mr. Parris: The Labour party succeeded despite that level of deposit. It succeeded because it had the resources of organised labour on which to draw. Small minority parties are not in that position. I do not see how a small party can possibly field a credible number of candidates if it must risk a penalty of £1,000 in each constituency. We all know that it is necessary to fly the flag, even in constituencies where there is not a chance of succeeding. That is accepted in a great political party such as the Conservative party. It is even more important for small political parties to fly the flag than it is for large ones. One of the criticisms that is most likely to be levelled against small parties is that they are not even fielding enough candidates to form a Government if they should succeed in every constituency in which they have placed one of their candidates.

Contesting seats when there is not a ghost of a chance of winning them is one of the ways in which a small party shows that it is serious. The Bill will stop small parties from doing just that. If the Bill is enacted, small parties will be able to say with some justice that they are not fielding a credible spread of candidates because we passed a law that prevented them from doing so. That argument and that sense of grievance, which I believe will sustain the argument, will prove a moral weapon in the hands of minority parties that my right hon. and learned Friend will be unwise to ignore. He is giving fringe movements a better case for extra-parliamentary action than they have ever been able to make for themselves.

I do not know whether my right hon. and hon. Friends see this as I do, but I have always felt it a cause for satisfaction that in this country the Communist party, the National Front or the Socialist Workers party can and do field candidates. A cause for even greater satisfaction is that they regularly and visibly fail to attract much support. No longer will we be able to say that. Their spokesmen will be able to say that their parties are not rich enough to test the electorate's support or to get their message across. I fail to see that this will be adding strength or authority to our constitution.

I have not spoken to any representative of the National Front, because I cannot find that organisation listed in the telephone directory. I do not know how much the Bill, if enacted, will cost it. However, I know that we shall never again be able to challenge it to explain the derisory number of votes that it attracts at elections. It will have a good answer once the Bill is enacted.

The Ecology party, which wrote to a number of us, fielded 109 candidates at the 1983 general election. It hopes to field 300 at the next general election. It will lose a fortune. I ask my right hon. and learned Friend whether we need to do this to small parties. I cannot speak for organisations such as the Ecology party, but I imagine that they hope to move from being single-issue organisations, which attract a small but respectable following because of public feeling on those single issues, to becoming broader parties with fuller manifestos. It is not uncommon or wrong to enter politics on the back of one central issue and to mature and evolve from that. The first stage is inevitably a minority one. My right hon. and learned Friend will, perhaps unwittingly, kill such movements at birth.

It is neither wrong nor unhelpful to field candidates on one issue as an end in itself, as a way of testing and demonstrating public feeling on that issue, and not so much as a launching pad. It is a way of showing the mainstream parties that they should take an issue more seriously, and they do so in the hope that they will. The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament has failed to persuade any of the major parties unequivocally to follow its line so it would not be surprising if it decided to contest a few seats.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): The Labour party unequivocally follows its line.

Mr. Parris: My hon. Friend suggests that the Labour party unequivocally follows its line. I believe that it equivocally follows CND's line.

CND candidates might attract 5 or 10 per cent. support, and that would be a success for them. However, they might attract less than 5 per cent. support, and that would be a failure for them. This measure would prevent them from testing the water in that way, and that would be a pity.

I wish to say a word on behalf of Bill Boakes and Screaming Lord Sutch. This aspect has been hugely exaggereated by some of the killjoys among us. Joke candidates—we should be honest; some of them are joke candidates—rarely stand at general elections and, when they do, they regularly fail to affect the result. They often stand in by-elections and receive much publicity. Doubtless, they irritate some people; but I can assure my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary that they give some of us a certain amount of pleasure and light relief. They are not nearly so costly to the taxpayer as is sometimes imagined. In fact, they rarely make use of the free postal facilities. Those candidates who make use of the free postal facilities are rarely those who are most costly to the taxpayer. Any candidate who can get his party together to the extent of printing between 30,000 and 50,000 leaflets and putting them in envelopes has already demonstrated his seriousness in a way that I should have thought was satisfactory to my right hon. and learned Friend.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary mentioned abuses. I question how widespread those abuses are. I agree that the candidate should be serious, but I question whether a £1,000 deposit is the right way of testing a candidate's seriousness. Bill Boakes and Screaming Lord Sutch do us little harm on the whole and may sometimes do us some good. By-elections can be very dull, and voting for one of the joke candidates is perhaps a courteous and elegant alternative to spoiling the ballot paper or abstaining. Those institutions—such gentlemen have become institutions — provide a safety valve. Voting and standing against the mainstream parties are useful facilities, especially where the success or validity of a democratic institution is popularly questioned. The fact that so few British people vote or stand against the mainstream parties is a helpful sign, giving us cause for self-confidence and providing us with a way of testing the acceptability of our democratic institutions. We should not lightly abandon that. Joke candidates rarely succeed in picking up more than derisory, facetious or protest votes, and that provides us with some comfort. Why take away the opportunity to test the water occasionally?

I support the first-past-the-post system. On balance, I believe that it is the best system, but we must admit that the first-past-the-post system bears harshly on minority parties. Already, under our system, a small party takes root and achieves electoral breakthrough against all the odds. Why stack the odds even further against small parties and add to the sense of injustice they undoubtedly already feel? We discount the votes achieved by losing candidates. Why fine them as well? The smaller the party, the larger the sum of deposits it stands to forfeit in a general election.

By this measure, my right hon. and learned Friend adds significantly to the arguments already circulating in favour of state funding for political parties. That—it is another debate—would be a bad move. Unwittingly, my right hon. and learned Friend adds to their grievances and brings forward the day when changes to the electoral system or the means of funding parties will be more powerfully canvassed. The fact that tiny parties and eccentric individuals are able to stand for election under our system is a safety valve. It is a seed-bed for new movements and ideologies, and sometimes a source of light relief. There is no great abuse to be remedied. The fact that such candidates regularly fail is a signal and ground for comfort, not for disquiet, among the rest of us. Why change all that? Why make any change at all? Sometimes, I think we seem to have lost our sense of fair play, political self-confidence and, occasionally, humour.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) is right about many aspects — for example, the arguments for reforming the electoral system will be more powerfully canvassed. I point out to him that it is not that the electoral system discriminates against minorities but that it chooses arbitrarily between minorities. The electoral system takes that minority which is the Conservative party, enjoying only minority support, and gives to it the power of the majority — just as it took previous minority Labour parties and made them into majority Governments. That is the crucial failing of the electoral system.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West was right in what he said about deposits. He demonstrated that the Home Secretary not only had failed to bring about the degree of all-party agreement which his predecessor clearly envisaged but had failed to secure agreement within his party on the desirability of proceeding with this step. There was a vivid demonstration of that failure not only in this debate but in the earlier debates on the White Paper. The Home Secretary would have to admit that there is genuine misgiving among Conservative Back Benchers and a number of other hon. Members who are seriously putting the arguments against this large increase in the deposit.

The Bill has many good features and some bad features, of which the deposit and the exclusion of multiple registration are two. In some ways, the Bill involves the curtailment of the freedom of individuals to stand for Parliament. Today's Order Paper, with its reasoned amendments from several parties, clearly demonstrates the lack of consensus between the parties which is desirable if we are to get a major Representation of the People Bill through Parliament. When the Government canvassed the prospect of sending the Bill upstairs to Committee, I was appalled to think that, for the first time in our history, we were to consider such a Bill upstairs. I am glad that the Government backed down from that proposition in their announcement this afternoon. I hope that that is a sign that the Government will embark again on the road which Lord Whitelaw set out for them—to achieve the maximum possible all-party agreement when considering representation of the people measures.

I shall consider some of the specific issues in the Bill, going roughly in order through the Bill. I agree broadly with the Government and not the Labour party on the issue of overseas voting. I disagree with the Labour Party's reasoned amendment on this issue. The Labour party seems to suggest in the way it advances its arguments that there is something faintly disreputable about working abroad while a British citizen and still seeking to take some part in this country's affairs. Dealing with an earlier piece of legislation, Lord Glenamara, when he was Leader of the House, used the phrase "the lotus eaters" to describe those who lived abroad, yet sought to have some part in our country's affairs.

The people who live abroad may include the inhabitants of the "Costa del Crime" and those who stay abroad for tax reasons. Why should guilt by association be brought into this matter?

The category of those who live abroad includes people who work overseas for commercial, voluntary, charitable and international organisations. In many cases, they are serving the best interests of this country or the country to which they have gone. They may work for the United Nations, the Council of Europe or the EEC. They may work in trade or for world development organisations. They may be missionaries or church workers in overseas countries who have a genuine interest in this country and intend to return to it when their work is done.

Mr. Corbett: Are not those people in the category of workers overseas on relatively short-term contracts entitled to proxy votes?

Mr. Beith: They are, on this condition: if they can afford to maintain a residence in this country, they can have a vote. What a paradox that makes of the Labour party's argument. The Labour party is saying that those people who, while working abroad—either because their contract is short or because they have a great deal of money—can afford to keep a residence in Britain shall have a vote, but those who cannot afford to maintain a residence in Britain but still intend to return to Britain shall not have a vote. The case of a missionary or church worker is a classic example. Such a person finds himself in a different economic position from that of an employee of a Government organisation or a diplomat who has a right to vote under existing legislation. That missionary or church worker has every intention of returning to this country in due course. His work overseas is not particularly remunerative—he does not want it to be so; there is a great deal of self-sacrifice in his choice—but he retains an interest in this country's affairs. Indeed, the affairs of this country may have a considerable bearing on the work he does in the country to which he has gone.

One cannot travel abroad at the moment to developing countries without being made aware of the interests of British citizens overseas. We had a debate on overseas aid a couple of weeks ago on a Liberal motion. Threats to the British Council and the BBC overseas service, the British citizenship laws and how they will affect the children of people working abroad and many other issues came up in the House. I therefore believe that it is reasonable that people working overseas but who intend to return should be able to vote. It is difficult to arrive at a satisfactory definition, but I do not believe that the Government have done a bad job on this issue.

The Liberal party would like to see EEC citizens given the right to vote in whichever EEC country they reside in. We see it as part of the nature and character of the EEC. The proposals contained in the Bill are a way of ensuring that they retain some civil and political rights while working elsewhere in the EEC and those rights should be given to people who work in the rest of the world.

I broadly agree with the Government's proposals for absent voters. It is wrong that people should be unable to exercise their franchise because they are on holiday. The timing of a general election is often not known in advance. It is no fault of people who find themselves on holiday when the election is called. There is an anomaly and unfairness in the present position, which we shall remove if we extend postal votes to holiday voters. At present, if a person works in one of the occupations where he can claim that the general character of his work is such that he may not be able to be present on polling day he can claim a postal vote and ensure that he is regularly on the list for a postal vote.

The effect of that, in my experience, is that many business men, farmers or people in that type of work can register postal votes and have a postal vote even if they are on holiday. They claim that they have to travel to other parts of the country, go to markets or see customers, but an ordinary working man who is paid a wage at the end of the week after working in a factory may go to the same place on holiday as the business man—if he can afford it—but find that he has no basis upon which to claim a postal vote. Those in generally better-paid occupations have that right. I again believe it right that the Government should move in that direction.

The definition may not yet be strict enough. We must consider the definition at a later stage to see whether we can make it tighter and clearer to avoid having postal votes on demand in all circumstances. In principle, I believe that the Government are right.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): Without derogating from my hon. Friend's argument in favour of postal voting, may I ask him whether he agrees that it is more difficult to ensure the secrecy of a postal vote than a vote in the polling booth? Does he agree that the instructions to postal voters should go further than at present to make it clear to people that they need not reveal their vote?

Mr. Beith: That is so. My hon. Friend gives sound advice. Elderly voters may feel that they have to fill in the ballot paper in the presence or sight of the person who brings it to them. The Government should be made aware that such difficulties arise. There is a case for tightening the definition and improving instructions to postal voters. I know that my hon. Friend agrees that the anomaly of the holidaymaker being denied his vote should be dealt with despite the difficulties.

I also welcome the fact that the Government have accepted the pleas that many of us have made in the House for a long time to extend postal voting to parish council elections. Those of us who have seen the extraordinary phenomenon of an invalid being carried into a polling station to vote in a parish council election protesting that he has already voted by post in a district council election for the same candidate will realise how absurd the present law is. We are determined that we will not lose a single vote, so we force Liberals to carry elderly ladies into polling stations to ensure that they can cast their votes in parish council elections even though the returning officer has rightly deemed that they should not be required to do so for the district council elections in the same place on the same day. Thank goodness we can end that anomaly.

The National Association of Local Councils, of which I am the vice-president, welcomes the response and help that the Government have given on that matter. The association believes that other matters relating to parish councils should be considered. It welcomes some clauses, but it wholly opposes clause 15, which provides for the postponement of parish and community council elections, but no other local authority elections, if the ordinary day for the parish elections coincides with the general election or a European Assembly election. Why should parish council elections alone be postponed when they land on that day when the Government are making express and more permanent provisions for local and parliamentary elections to take place on the same day in other parts of the Bill? We must consider that again, because it is an unreasonable limitation.

I have mentioned a number of matters where I believe the Government have done the right thing, and I come now to where they have made a deliberate omission—the issue of multiple registration. People have the right to be registered in a number of places and thereby to choose where they will cast their votes on polling day. At present, one can be registered in respect of a number of residences. It is one of the points where the essential qualification is money. Money talks at several points in the Bill, and this is one of them.

A person with two, three or four homes can be registered in all of them and can choose on election day where to vote. That has an impact in coastal constituencies, Wales, Cornwall and other parts of the country which are sought after for holiday homes. Many people will choose to transfer their vote according to what they see as the political position and they are people from whom the Conservative party solicits support. It sends election literature to a holiday home which says, "Do not use your vote in London; use it where you have your holiday home."

There is a further anomaly. Were there to be by-elections on the same day in all the places in which a person was lucky enough to own a second, third or fourth residence, he could vote in every one. People could cast five votes for elections to the same Parliament on the same day. Conservative Members are shaking their heads, but that is the law.

A person, however, cannot vote twice in the same general election. Even that presents difficulties, because the policing of dual voting is difficult. There are a large number of multiple registrations which makes it that much more difficult. If the parties want to police the dual voting in a general election, they have to take the numbers of persons voting in several places, know in which other places a person is qualified to vote and is registered and during polling day check between constituencies whether that person has cast his votes in both constituencies. That is difficult to do. It is only the political parties that are likely to go to the trouble of doing that. Returning officers concentrate on whether any offence has been committed within their jurisdiction and constituency.

The policing of the existing legal restriction against voting twice in a general election is made more difficult by the proliferation of multiple registration. All the parties are aware of that. The Conservative party, the Labour party and my party all gave evidence to the Select Committee and said that multiple registration for parliamentary elections should be abolished.

The Select Committee members were unanimously in favour of making a change. The Committee specifically recommended in its report that multiple registration for parliamentary elections should be ended and that it should be a criminal offence knowingly to seek registration in more than one constituency for parliamentary elections.

What pressure, what reconsideration and what backstairs influence have led to the recommendation not being implemented? It is a glaring omission from the Bill. If some of the comments I have heard made sotto voce from the Conservative Benches are anything to go by, it may be that, unlike Conservative Central Office, there are still some influences in the Conservative party who believe that multiple registration is worth hanging on to because it confers an advantage on those people who have several homes and who are more likely to be Conservatives than to belong to other parties because of the financial position which is required to enable a person to own a second home. I feel that consideration has entered into this decision.

I am not in the least convinced—I had days of argument and pages of correspondence with the Minister on this—by the standard obstacles that have been trotted out by the Home Office. If the Government had had the political will to carry out the Select Committee's recommendation, which was supported by all the parties that went before it, it would have been done. It has not been done, and for the wrong reasons.

The subject of deposits has been a major feature of the debate. What is the purpose of the proposal to increase the deposit to £1,000? It cannot be a standing instruction on the part of the Home Office Ministers that all licence fees and charges should be regularly updated, given what has happened to dog licences over the years. There must be a wider purpose. We are told that eccentric or fringe candidates and parties should be discouraged. That reminds me of the comments of Bernard Levin in The Times in February this year:

> "Next, it is contended that the proliferation of eccentric candidates tends to bring the election process into disrepute, a charge which, when I first read it, had the unprecedented effect of rendering me incapable of speech for nearly half an hour; beside the Hattersleys and Healeys, the Proctors and Dickenses, Screaming Lord Sutch was a model of dignity and political uprightness, and a . . . sight funnier into the bargain."

In quoting that passage, I have omitted an unparliamentary adjective. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West also seemed to suggest that the Government had lost their sense of proportion and their sense of humour if they regarded some fringe candidates as so much more reprehensible than some of those who come within the mantle of respectable politics.

The Home Secretary referred to people who were "not serious" about their candidature. That is most worrying. If the definition of seriousness is based on the possession of £1,000, in addition to whatever funds are required to mount a serious campaign, the Government are saying, yet again, that money talks and that their definitions are based on how much money people have. That is no definition of political seriousness. A deposit of £1,000 could not possibly distinguish between those who are serious and those who are not. It merely distinguishes between those who can produce £1,000 and those who cannot. That is the beginning and end of the effect of an increase in the deposit. In any case, why should we seek to deter individuals or groups from putting their ideas to the voters?

Two reasons have been seriously advanced. One is that the postal facilities cost money, but the record shows that fringe candidates have not used that facility. A very large number of fringe candidates stood in the Chesterfield by-election. I am tempted to say that one of them was elected, but he had the benefit of being the Labour party candidate at the time. Virtually all the candidates outside the three main parties, including all the commercial ones, made no use of the postal facilities and that has been the tendency in all elections with large numbers of fringe candidates.

The other argument has been the ability of a candidate to prevent others from appearing on television. If that is a problem, it can be addressed in other ways by reference to rules governing the appearance of candidates on television. If it is widely felt that the ability of one candidate to prevent others from appearing is improper, that power can be removed without removing the individual's chance to stand as a candidate.

I believe that it is wrong to allow any group to say that it has been denied, on financial grounds, the right to put its views to the voters. I am pleased that the Communist party, the National Front, the Socialist Workers party and other groups can submit their views to the voters and thus reveal that they do not enjoy widespread support and that they are on the fringe of the British political system and the views of the British electorate. I want that to continue. I do not want them to be able to say that they have been denied the opportunity to put their views to the electorate. That is why I object to the increase in the deposit, which will affect all those groups and others such as the Ecology party, Mebyon Kernow, Plaid Cymru and so on.

The impact on my party is minimal. In the last general election we lost only half a dozen deposits. The Labour party lost 119, so it is bound to be concerned about any increase in the deposit. The problem for a party such as mine is rather different. It is a matter not of losing deposits but simply of putting up such a large sum for the course of the election campaign at a time when one needs the resources to mount the campaign. Across the country, that means a total of £650,000 locked up in the returning officers' coffers for the duration of the campaign. It is as though the sequestrators have been sent in to take the funds of the Government's principal opponents — that is, Liberal candidates—for the duration of the campaign.

The Home Secretary said rather grandly earlier in the debate that anyone wishing to stand in an election could easily borrow £1,000. Clearly he has no trouble with his bank manager. He looks like a man who has no trouble with his bank manager and he stands for a party which looks as though it has no trouble with its bank managers. I represent a party which occasionally has such trouble. That is understandable, as my party does not enjoy the heavy financial backing provided for the Conservative party by companies and individuals and for the Labour party by the trade union levy. That is a serious limitation which would affect the party at precisely the time when its resources were most stretched. If there are two elections in one year, as there were in 1951 and 1974, one enters the second campaign while still paying off the costs of the first. We do not intend to let that stand in our way, but it is an additional limitation and it is hard to avoid concluding that the Government wish to place such limitations on their political opponents.

I believe that the collection of signatures is a perfectly viable alternative. When these matters were discussed in 1969 that suggestion was made by the very person who has just been elected chairman of the 1922 Committee. I hope that he will stick to that line in the debate on this measure. We are not talking about a "bus stop petition" when one gets people in the town centre to sign their names, or indeed any names that come into their heads. The electoral roll number would have to be written beside the signature and that information would be checked. A certain amount of organisation is required to assemble 100 or 500 signatures of registered voters in a constituency who assent to the nomination of the candidate. Indeed, the procedure could be strengthened. It could provide that the signatory must support the nomination of the candidate. That is a significant test of organisation, whereas a deposit is merely a test of financial resources.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is no procedure to check that the signatories are the people they are supposed to be? The checking procedure merely establishes that the signatures correspond to names appearing on the electoral roll, which is not necessarily the same thing.

Mr. Beith: The same applies to the limited number of assentors currently required. Nevertheless, those names are published in the public notice setting out the names of the candidates and their supporters. If that practice were known to be followed, anyone whose name had been used without consent in support of a candidate could challenge it, so there is a means of checking. I believe that the signatures alternative is perfectly viable and I do not see why the Government should reject it.

If the Government reject the signatures alternative, they must draw back from their £1,000 proposal and look for a figure commanding wider support among the parties. It is clear that there is opposition to the £1,000 proposal not only from every Opposition party but from many Conservative Members. The Government will have to move on this aspect if they wish the Bill to have a relatively smooth passage.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to the Carlton club lecture in which the Prime Minister spoke of a minority defying the result of the vote and persisting in their own wishes. She was, of course, describing herself. That is exactly her position. She is a representative of the minority defying the wishes of the majority of the electorate who voted against her. When I heard the right hon. Member for Gorton put that point so vividly and effectively, I thought that he had seen the light and that conversion had come at last, but he did not allow me to intervene to clarify the position. He left an ambiguity which led me to suppose that, like some of his hon. Friends, he had begun to accept the absurdity of the system which allows the Prime Minister to pretend that she represents the majority when it is clear from the election results that she does nothing of the kind. She represents a minority that, if put to the test of any poll, would be shown to be getting smaller by the hour. The reason why the right hon. Lady is able to make that claim is the ultimate absurdity—the absurdity about which the Government have done nothing in this so-called Representation of the People Bill. I return to the words of Bernard Levin in The Times:

> "Such is the proposed Representation of the People Bill, of which it can be safely said that the matter of improving the people's representation never so much as entered the heads of the Conservative and Labour politicians who took part in the discussions that led to the Government's White Paper".

There is substance in those words. It never entered the Government's head to ensure that the votes cast under all the procedures in the Bill should bear some relation to the end result of the election.

The utmost care is taken to ensure that the votes are cast in the correct manner. The votes are cast in secrecy. We have today discussed how to ensure secrecy in postal voting as well as in the polling station. The returning officer seals up the ballot box and applies sealing wax to it. Carefully guarded, it is taken away in a police car.

[Mr. Beith]

However, from the moment the box is opened, sense and accuracy are thrown to the wind. One might just as well treat the ballot box as if it were one of those boxes of raffle tickets which are placed in front of hon. Members at constituency functions and out of which we have to draw one or two winning tickets. That would be as fair as what happened at the last general election—which was that we ensured that it took 32,800 votes to elect a Conservative candidate, 40,000 votes to elect a Labour candidate and 339,000 votes to elect a member of the alliance. We should bear in mind that each of my hon. Friends represents 339,000 people.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I represent 20,621 Liberals, and I believe that I represent them very well indeed. Will the hon. Gentleman please take those people from his numbers?

Mr. Beith: I shall leave that to the judgment of the said Liberals when they vote at the next general election. I should be very surprised if they were to transfer their allegiance to the hon. Gentleman. All hon. Members seek to give the most effective representation to all their constituents, regardless of party. The fact remains that the end result of the general election wholly distorts the wishes and intentions of the voters and, because the Government have failed to change the system, they have failed to ensure that people will be any better represented as a result of the passing of the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): We are all anxious that all shades of opinion should be represented in this important debate, including the views of the minority parties. The debate has now lasted for three hours, and only eight hon. Members have had an opportunity to address the House. I make a plea for brevity.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): I shall not follow directly in the footsteps of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) with regard to our system of voting in national elections. My hon. Friends know where I stand on that issue and I shall not add to the burdens of my hon. Friend the Minister by dwelling on it.

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) is not in his place. He resorted to a position of principle in arguing against the Bill. I never thought to hear the right hon. Gentleman advocate modification of principle as a principle to follow, but that was the basis of his attack. It is nonsense to say that the significance of place, the principles of simultaneity or of the uniformity of the make-up of the electorate in each of our constituencies are points of principle that should inhibit the Government from pressing on with the Bill. Military men, diplomats, people working away from home, people with second homes, students, the very old and the infirm all drive a coach and horses through the argument of principle on which the right hon. Gentleman relied. This evening at least, my hon. Friend should not be deterred in any way by the right hon. Gentleman's arguments.

I welcome the Bill. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have waited for it for a long time. I am delighted that the Government have now brought it forward. It is a sign of the continuing concern and commitment of the Conservative party and Government to the proper operation of our constitutional system of parliamentary democracy.

I do not share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) for the happy-time candidate or the very small party. A general election is a method of electing representatives. It is not a soap box on which anybody—however well founded his point of view or support may be—may make his noises. If a group has made sufficient headway between elections in gaining support for its cause, it will not flinch from the £1,000 deposit. That sum is affordable by any party with a reasonable base, particularly against the new threshold of 5 per cent. advocated in the Bill.

In German elections, the 5 per cent. rule has become well established. Under the German additional member system, a party gets no additional members unless it achieves over 5 per cent. of the electorate. That is a much more important threshold.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is a different matter.

Mr. Rathbone: Very different — and much more important than the 5 per cent. threshold for losing one's deposit. However, I believe that the comparison is worth making.

There is one point on which I hope my hon. Friend will be able to put my mind at rest. I believe that my right hon. and learned Friend and the Home Office should consider whether there is a basis for reducing the increase—if that is thought necessary by the House—and building in, in addition to a lower increase, some form of signature support. As the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said, a bus queue of signatures is not envisaged. I am thinking of registered names — probably registered names of those who support the candidate — being applied to the canditature in anticipation of a general election long before that election is called. I have in mind a year-by-year list of supporters.

There is an alternative that might be considered. In Holland and Belgium, I believe, there is a national register of all parties. A fee is paid for registration, and thereafter all candidates for registered parties can stand without further cost. Perhaps we, too, could have a national register. There could be a substantial registration fee and nominal fees in the constituencies, or an insubstantial registration fee and larger fees in the constituencies. Either way, we would have some validation of all the parties with national support. That suggestion might be worth considering, if the Government have not already considered it.

Like other hon. Members, I welcome unequivocally the extension of the franchise through the granting of votes to those who take their holidays at election time and the inclusion of British citizens registered overseas. With regard to the former group, many people feel that the advance in the Bill is long delayed. Somewhat unusually, the last election was timed to take place in a holiday period. That being so, I am sure that no hon. Member failed to bump into people who were frustrated because they were going on holiday between the time when one called and shook their hand and the time of the election.

However, I question the value of the seven-year limitation. The Government seem to be adopting a somewhat picky attitude to a valuable step forward. We could look across the Channel and take a lead from our French friends, who take a positive stance on democratic involvement. Hon Members might have studied what appertains in France. There are six ways in which a French man or woman who lives abroad can register back in France. Some are by reference to where they lived originally and some give them a completely open choice of any commune of more than 30,000 inhabitants. I believe that that encourages the French abroad to participate in what is going on in their country and to vote accordingly.

It is also worth looking across the Atlantic and noting that the United States guarantees the constitutional right to vote of those who live outside the United States, subject only to two conditions: first, proper registration within that person's state of residence; and, secondly, that the person has a valid United States passport, national identity card or other national registration card. That is a timeless and basic threshold. I doubt the relevance of the time limit. As soon as some people leave these shores, they lose interest in what happens here, so seven years is too long. Other people, however, can spend almost a lifetime abroad and still be as interested in what happens here as when they left. Their interest might be for better or for worse. As has been said, an increasing number of governmental actions in different countries touch on the citizens of those countries, wherever they live. That is especially true in the European context.

As to the postal vote, to which that matter is indubitably tied, the validation of the vote as suggested in the Bill is either too liberal or not worth it. If the signature must be validated in applying for a postal vote, should it not have the same seriousness of validation as, for example, an application for a passport which, though important, is nothing like as important as the means by which we use the democratic vote. If that is not thought necessary, we should do away with it altogether. I am not especially worried in regard to what has been said about that being an open door to the miscasting of votes.

The delay in the application of the Bill to voting in Europe is, I hope, indicative of the Government's intent to adopt for the United Kingdom a system of voting for the European elections which is the same as that which will be used in other countries. I am glad about the Government's recommitment to a search for such a system. With that expectation in mind, I warmly welcome the Bill and wish it well.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's brevity.

7.42 pm

Mr. Sean Hughes (Knowsley, South): I shall confine my remarks to the increasing of the deposit as, despite the Home Secretary's appearing to suggest that the Bill does not raise any serious difficulties, this is a serious issue. One of the aspects of modern politics that I find most disturbing is the growth of authoritarianism and the suggestion that there is no alternative theory of politics. That is dangerous and nonsense because clearly there are alternatives, irrespective of whether we like them. I therefore cannot agree that people should be prevented from testing support for their alternatives, however bizarre or eccentric they might be.

The Government must accept that people are entitled to express what the Government might regard as a minority view which is opposed to theirs. I hope that all of us, whatever our party affiliations, concede that point. That means that people who want to poke fun at us, those who want to say, "A plague on all your houses" and those who think, like De Gaulle, that politics is too serious a matter to be left to politicians should be allowed to say what they think and to test support for it. The Home Secretary and the Minister said in the White Paper debate that elections are serious affairs. Of course they are. But I believe that an electoral system is weakened when it appears to be afraid of what major parties deem fringe, frivolous or joke candidates.

The one argument that I must consider is that advanced by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who fear the peddling of obnoxious doctrines such as those propagated by the National Front. A civilised society has a right to protect its members from the offence and anguish caused by such groups, but surely the way to do that is rigorously to apply and, if necessary, strengthen such legislation as that relating to race relations.

As we developed into a democracy, there was an understanding that we should avoid giving electoral advantage to those with wealth. That is the classic reason for introducing a maximum in election expenses in constituencies, even if national parties can get round it. A large election deposit clearly breaches that principle, even though it was introduced to regulate what are termed freak candidates. However, I have never understood where the oracle that defines that classification is.

If I understood him correctly, the Home Secretary said that nobody argues that there should be no deposit if a candidate clearly has no support in a constituency. How can such support be demonstrated before polling day? It certainly cannot be demonstrated by possession of £1,000. I realise that the official administrative costs of elections have been transferred from the candidate to the State, that one free postal delivery to each elector and the free use of school meetings have been provided, but everyone knows that the use of public meetings and even the free postal delivery is as nothing compared with the use of television —and which of the many fringe candidates at the last general election were able to use television? The criteria on which the electoral rules have been formulated have broken down.

In the White Paper debate, the Under-Secretary of State emphasised at column 1087 that parliamentary candidates have the right to send an election communication post-free at a possible cost to the public of £8,000. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to that. Of course candidates have such a right, but it is no more than theoretical for many. It is like my constituents right to send their sons to Eton or dine nightly at the Ritz. Most minority candidates cannot exercise that right for the simple reason that they have not the money to do so.

The Minister also argued in the White Paper debate:

> "The reasoning that led to the introduction of the deposit in 1918 is as valid now as it was then."—[Official Report, 27 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 1087.]

That deposit was £150. However, the Home Secretary told us that the 1918 deposit would be more than £2,300 today. If the Minister believes what he says, why has he not proposed a deposit of £2,300? If he argues that that figure is too high, why has he stopped at £1,000? Does he not realise that all but the very rich will be deterred by the sum of £1,000? Does he accept what I said in the White Paper debate, that the £150 was snatched out of thin air in 1918? The premise was wrong in 1918 and it is wrong today.

The Home Secretary has said that the figure chosen is bound to be arbitrary and a matter of judgment. He promised that he and the Minister would listen carefully to views expressed in the White Paper debate and that they would reflect on those views before preparing the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to that promise of consultation. In the White Paper debate, the majority of right hon. and hon. Members, including Conservatives, Scottish Nationalists, Liberals, Labour and Plaid Cymru, opposed the increase in the deposit. No doubt the Home Secretary and the Under-Secretary listened carefully, reflected upon it and then proceeded to do what they intended to do in the first place. Yet again today the Home Secretary has assured us that he will listen to what we have to say, but he should realise that we have no reason to have confidence in his words.

The Under-Secretary of State, in his speech on the White Paper, made the astonishing comment that my contribution was a class-biased analysis. Nothing could be further from the truth. He missed the point that I referred to the original debates in 1918, hoping to demonstrate that the premise upon which the deposit was introduced was faulty. There have long been Members of this House who have spoken out against the introduction of financial barriers for those who might stand for election to this House.

If my references to the 1918 debate failed to move the Under-Secretary, perhaps he will listen to an extract from the 1858 debate on the removal of the land qualification for Members of Parliament. The parallel is quite astonishing. Mr. Walpole argued that one of the reasons for that qualification was that "it would prevent speculative candidates coming forward and putting their opponents to unnecessary expense".

He continued by saying that he believed that on the whole

"much good would be gained by leaving elections perfectly free to those who might be willing to offer their services, and by allowing constituencies to choose such candidates as they might think best able to represent them in Parliament".

Yet in the debate last summer the Home Secretary poured scorn, as he did again today, upon what he considered to be fringe candidates. Referring to recent by-elections, he declared that most of them had no serious interest in, or the remotest chance of, being elected to Parliament, which, after all, is what an election is about.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) adhered to that point of view. I ask the Government to consider the position of my hon. Friend who represents the northern part of my borough, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk), who at the last election got 64·5 per cent. of the vote, the Conservative candidate getting 20·17 and the alliance candidate getting 14·8. Did the Conservative or alliance candidates have a serious interest in or the remotest chance of winning in Knowsley, North? I wonder how many right hon. and hon. Members first fought seats before coming to this House in which they had no realistic chance of winning. Was that exercise frivolous, a freak or a joke? Or is it only frivolous , a freak or a joke when they do not belong to the major parties?

Undoubtedly there are those who do not feel that political parties are putting forward what they believe to be the overriding issue. While taking part in a political system they might have no realistic ambition to serve in Parliament. Their aim is to change the climate of political debate, to raise an issue that they feel is neglected or to test the strength of public feeling for what they believe to be a priority. I may not like attempts to make elections one-issue affairs, but I cannot share the anti-libertarian point of view which proclaims that they have no right to do it.

I am reminded, as I bring my remarks to a close, of the public meeting addressed in the last century by John Morley. He asked his audience to vote for him the following day, only to hear somebody shout, "I'd sooner vote for the devil". Morley replied, "Quite, but if your friend declines to stand, will you consider voting for me?" It would not be for the want of £1,000 that the devil declined to stand. The problem is that there are a great number of decent people who cannot be classed as devils but who should have the right to stand. Perhaps the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary should borrow the slogan of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport: keep it low, or you might live to regret it.

I believe this House is diminished if people are prevented from seeking election to it on the ground that they cannot get together £1,000 for the deposit. I believe that society has the right to order its electoral affairs, but a civilised society can surely find a basis on which this can be done other than the vulgar test of ability to pay. During the Third Reading debate in 1858 to which I referred, Sir George Lewis felt that "the real safeguard lay in the choice of the electors".

I believe that that argument has stood the test of 126 years.

7.54 pm

Mrs. Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Looking round the Chamber, I can see only one other person who was with me on the Select Committee that looked at this matter. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) shakes his head. We looked at this matter over more than one session and went into it in very great detail. There was a great deal of unanimity across the political floor about the report that was finally submitted to the Home Office.

I wish warmly to welcome clause 1. The view expressed from the Labour Front Bench was rather snide, and it distressed me. The view was that if people choose to live abroad they must lose their vote, but people do not always choose to live abroad. Many of them have no choice. They go to work abroad and may be employed abroad for many years. Teachers are employed abroad on exchange contracts. Other people go to live abroad for health reasons. We must not forget that if pensioners go to live abroad for health reasons they already stand to lose the uprating of their pension.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) rightly says, so many people who live abroad —one comes across many of them when one travels— passionately care about what is going on in this country. It is not true to say that they have no further interest in this country. Many of them will return to live in this country after having worked abroad throughout their working lives. They have every right to want to be involved in the election of a Government which will choose by what laws they will live. I, too, like my hon. Friend, am not very happy about the seven-year rule. If the French Government can arrange for their citizens working abroad to have a vote, why cannot we? It is very strange that if an EC official is working abroad for this country he will not be able to vote in this country and will be unable to vote in EC elections, either, as a British citizen. He will not have a vote in the country he lives in and he will not have a vote as a British subject. That seems to me to be wrong.

Turning to clause 12, we considered for a very long time whether the deposit should be increased from £150. I felt sympathy tonight for the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) who was on the Committee and who then considered that it was right and proper that the deposit should be uprated. During the 19th century——

Mr. Corbett: Would the hon. Lady allow me to speak for a moment on behalf of my hon. Friend?

Mrs. Knight: No. The hon. Member was not on the Committee.

Mr. Corbett rose——

Mrs. Knight: Mr. Deputy Speaker, in deference to your remarks, I am trying to make a short speech. The hon. Gentleman was not on the Committee. This is a matter not of argument but of history.

During the 19th century, all administrative costs were shared between the candidates. The deposit was introduced in 1918. I do not believe that very much was said then about depriving people of the right to stand at an election. It was acknowledged that a deposit was fair. I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) that it was not a question only of selecting people who had money. That did not come into it. The point was that it was a safeguard against candidates who added to the cost and complexity of an election, with no serious prospects of gaining sufficient votes to win.

If it was possible for people then to raise £150 to show their seriousness and if we were to ask for an equivalent amount today, we should be asking for well over £2,000. The Committee felt that this was quite wrong and that a fair and reasonable judgment of the amount would be £1,000. This would put up the deposit because, as everybody knows, £150 in 1918 was a very different matter from even £1,000 today. What makes any hon. Member think that we are less capable of raising the money to back what we believe in than our forefathers were in 1918?

There has been a steady increase in the number of persons standing for election. Many hon. Members have fought, as I have, six candidates at a time. I am proud to say that I gave them all a jolly good beating. Hon. Members may well say that they should all come, and that it is curtailing democracy not to allow them to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West will read this debate and I am sure that he must acknowledge that many small parties have a small basis of interest. All hon. Members, whether Labour, Liberal or Conservative, have to represent all their constituents and all of their interests. An hon. Member may have 40 members of, say, the Ecology party in his constituency. Let 40 letters arrive on any hon. Member's desk and he will take a great deal of notice of what is said.

During the debates in Committee I remember vividly hearing about a small builder who wanted the advertisement that standing for Parliament would give him. He would get £8,000 worth of publicity for £150. That is a good bargain. That man took advantage of the free post that he was allowed and that free post asked people, not to vote for him, because he had no intention of standing for Parliament, but to vote that he was the best builder in the business and certainly the best in the district. People were asked to come and hear about him at his meeting in the town hall. That is another thing that candidates are allowed. They can have free use of a publicly funded hall when they fight an election. Anyone who seeks to use the electoral machinery to advance his business or pursuits has got it made. It is an extraordinarily good bargain for £150. I am not so worried about the right to veto broadcast transmissions, but there is no question but that that builder boosted his work by using the methods available.

The Government are being a little over-generous in fixing the percentage of vote at one twentieth before a deposit is lost. Labour Members may not disagree. We heard some rather strange suggestions in the Select Committee. Sir Robin Day came along with a marvellous system of a sliding scale. He said that a candidate who polled less than 1 per cent. of the votes cast should forfeit his entire deposit, somebody with between 1 and 2 per cent. should forfeit a little less, and so on. We put that point to the officials and they were horrified at the number of recounts that there would have to be if money were involved with such tiny percentages. We did not think that that was a good scheme to adopt. I tremble to think of the number of recounts that would be necessary if that system were adopted.

Some people have put forward the idea of a greatly increased number of signatures—between 100 and 500 — on nomination forms instead of increasing the deposits. At the moment we need only 10 names and addresses of people on the electoral register. One should consider how easy it is to get signatures by standing outside a supermarket. Anyone will sign almost anything that is put under his nose, particularly to get rid of the person who is asking for the signature. Each of those 100 or 500 names would have to be checked by the electoral returning officer. If only one was wrong, the nomination would be invalid. If there were no increase in the deposit, more and more people would stand at each election. We could have eight, nine or 10 candidates in a constituency. In one constituency 5,000 names might have to be checked, and that would take a long time.

I am worried about some of the inaccuracies of electoral registers, particularly in the inner cities. Some places have multi-registration and there are piles of voting cards inside every hall. It is easy for personation to take place. In one ward alone some 800 names on the list had no right to be there. There was no check whatever on deaths. It is amazing that the electoral returning officer said that it was not possible to find out who had died. Surely everyone who has canvassed in an election must know how distressing it is to knock on someone's door to find out that a polling card has just been received for a husband who died six months earlier.

Sometimes a death can have occurred three or four years earlier, yet the name is still on the electoral list. That is wrong. It should be possible for arrangements to be made to remove the names of those who have died from the list, particularly since the registrar of births and deaths usually works from the same place as the electoral returning officer. It was not even the deaths column in the papers that I thought the electoral returning officer should look at, but the in memoriam column, because some people on the register had been dead for so many years, but still had the vote.

I thought, as no doubt other hon. Members do, that it was filling up form A in October that gave one the vote. Not a bit of it. We discovered that the electoral returning officer would send someone to see Mrs. Jones of 15 High Street if she did not return her form. The officer would say that she had been there for years and must have forgotten to fill in the form. If Mrs. Jones had gone to Tesco or was dead nobody would know. The electoral returning officer would put her on the list, just in case. There should be some way in which the registering of names which should not be on the register is stopped. In particular, deaths should be checked. The Committee was worried that there seemed to be more concern about leaving people off the list who might have had a right to vote than about putting people on who had no right at all. There should be a clearer use of form A so that only those entitled to vote should be able to do so. I hope that the Government will consider that point.

8.7 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I agree that there should have been a Speaker's Conference. The Scottish National party was not called to give evidence before the Select Committee on Home Affairs and the consultation that has taken place since publication of the White Paper had been derisory. Opportunities to deal with some of the matters which now distinguish the contesting of elections have been lost. The hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) touched upon that.

Under the Representation of the People Acts restrictions are laid down, first, on deposits, which is touched on by the Bill, and, secondly, on candidates' expenses. As practical politicians, we all know that there has been a switch in campaigning techniques and that what matters is the amount of money disbursed on behalf of candidates collectively at central or national offices in support of an advertising or election campaign and access to the television and other media. The Bill does not attempt to deal with such vital areas.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) referred to the problem of multi-registration. She may remember, although she may care to forget, that at the time of the Scotland Act 1978 and the proposals for the 40 per cent. on the referendum, many of us brought up that very point.

Fair television coverage is probably more important to the smaller parties than to the larger parties which, naturally, have a substantial share. Those who represent parties that operate outside England — and I say that specifically — are not permitted access to the United Kingdom media during election campaigns. Yet the news and documentary programmes are transmitted in Scotland and Wales as though the reports on the election were entirely English. We obtain a share of the television and radio programmes in our home countries, but we are not given additional coverage to compensate for the lack of United Kingdom coverage. The Home Office should have included a provision to adjust the arrangements to provide a fair expression of opinion. I am highly critical of the Home Office for not doing so.

Like the Liberals, in a better year than 1983 we would not expect to be affected by substantial deposit losses. However, I accept that we suffered considerably in 1983. I had warned the Liberals about counting how many deposits they were likely to save, although we did exactly that in 1974 and had to eat our words at a later stage. A matter of principle is involved. The democratic process should be open to all.

The problem with fringe candidates has arisen largely from by-elections, especially those which have been the subject of considerable media coverage. Some candidates stand purely for notoriety.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that the real problem for all opposition parties was the accumulation of funds that must be locked in during a campaign. The Scottish National party would have to find £72,000 — money that could be better deployed during a campaign. Candidates have to put up a substantial amount of money. If someone is serious about fighting an election, that is only a small proportion of the liquid funds required for the production of leaflets, posters, and so on.

The Home Office may not think it a serious matter. Compared with other parties, the Conservative party is exceptionally well funded. It obtains money from various sources as well as its own members. It receives substantial donations from industry—something that is not available to parties such the SNP. It has been rumoured — although it is probably a huge exaggeration — that Conservative central office spent about £15 million, which is about £20,000 per candidate. There is a general limitation of £4,000 to £5,000 per candidate, dependent upon whether a candidate is a borough or county candidate and taking into account the size of the electorate in the area. Financing elections is a serious matter. Most other countries provide funds. That is now happening in the European elections. Either the House must set a restriction on the amount of money available for central expenditure or it must provide cash for the political parties to extend the democratic process. Other countries have had to make that choice, but it is avoided in the Bill.

The Bill provides for forms to be published in different languages. Specific provision is made for the Welsh language. My right hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) has drawn my attention to the fact that there is no provision for Gaelic. Those who speak Gaelic should have ballot papers in their language. If provision is made for the Welsh language, it is fair to make similar provision for the Gaelic language. We hope to table an amendment to that effect in Committee. I am raising the matter now to give the Minister time to consider it.

I find the whole process extremely disappointing. There has been insufficient consultation, the Government have been unilateral about the measure and there has been no willingness to consider the impact of the legislation on others. I suspect that the intention to extend the franchise has been calculated to ensure that the Conservative party does better from it than other political parties. Indeed, it is better organised to do that. It is reprehensible that the Government should seek to extend the franchise to those who do not pay the rates of taxation usually paid by most of us.

I hope that the House and the Government learn from the debate and that when we return to review the law relating to elections we will do so by means of a Speaker's Conference in which all political viewpoints can be represented on an equitable basis.

8.16 pm

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I give a general welcome to the Bill. Some parts of it are important and welcome, especially that relating to votes for holiday-makers. That is a long overdue reform that will eliminate the previous glaring injustice. As I am conscious of the need for brevity, I shall not dwell on that point.

The most contentious part of the Bill is the proposal to raise the deposit to £1,000. I am sure that we all begin from the premise that important principles of democracy are involved—being able to stand as a candidate and being able to vote for one's choice of candidate. It is vital that there is a proper framework of rules in the interests of all involved in the democratic process. At the same time, it is necessary to be aware of possible detractions to the electoral process, to the campaigns of serious candidates and to the involvement of those electors choosing between serious candidates, by the interventions of those who may not necessarily be serious candidates.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) kindly allowed me to intervene in his speech when he referred to the increased number of signatures and the checking procedures. In theory, there is much to be said for the alternative of a greater number of signatures on a nomination paper. However, I can envisage some practical difficulties. There is the difficulty of obtaining a large number of signatures—100, 300, 500 or whatever the figure. That might be a physical impossibility, especially for candidates who have only single figure support. How on earth could such candidates achieve that number of signatures, which would involve serious intent by those signing? That problem might be more insuperable than finding a given sum of money. Returning officers have to scrutinise nomination forms, and one signature might not be exactly the same as that on the electoral roll and this would invalidate the whole form. I expect considerable trouble from that.

Following a local election in Caerleon, adjoining my constituency, there was a prosecution of a student who had organised a bogus candidate and a bogus campaign, including bogus signatures on the nomination paper. That came to light only because neither the candidate nor his supporters turned up at the count. Indeed, they had not been seen during the campaign. That does not fit the criterion which, in other circumstances, was fairly described by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, of seeing the names published on the notice poll. Those names were published, but not challenged, and the problem came to light only during the count.

Much has been made of the responsibilities that devolve upon candidates. At this stage I do not think that it is necessary again to talk about free postage, the free use of public buildings and all the other facilities that were so well covered by previous speakers. However, I should like to touch on a small aspect of the matter—advertising, even commercial advertising, which has gone on and could still go on with the deposit at its present level of £150. It is a small investment to secure £8,000 of postage advantage for advertising purposes. I have seen candidatures for advertising purposes at local elections in Cardiff and we have all seen it happen in parliamentary elections. It could happen with people who want to set themselves up as candidates, whether it is the builder mentioned earlier who does not want to use another form of advertising, or other categories of person who are not allowed to use forms of advertising.

There is a considerable area of potential abuse that we cannot ignore in regard to persons who have no genuine political motivation offering themselves as candidates, who would be horrified if they were actually elected. That is to say, they would be horrified if they had an idea of how to do or wanted to see done properly the job of an elected representative. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has proposed a compromise figure that is not prohibitively expensive. On balance, it is the right figure, and we should accept it.

A part of the Bill that has not been touched on much today is clauses 14 to 16, which deal with what elections may or may not be held on the same day. I thought that I might quote several local examples to develop the arguments but, in the interests of being brief, I merely say that considerable consideration must be given in Committee to these clauses and to exactly what elections may or may not be held on the same day because of the confusion that there might be for at least part of the electorate.

Is democracy served by having a general election on the same day as any other election? I include even the elections for the European Assembly, although they are on a fixed date. If we move the date of local elections, they would all be treated in the same way. Would it matter if the elections for the European Assembly were on a different date from that used by the Europeans? It is doubtful whether there is a great community of interests affecting British voters voting for the European Assembly, nor is there any great enthusiasm for the elections. However, I give full credit to the media for this. Every news bulletin before the election in June 1984 had a lead story predicting that we would stay top of the apathy polls, and thus the media helped to achieve the actual turnout figures. Possibly it would be appropriate to go back to the previous system of direct nomination.

The polling day arrangements referred to in clauses 14 to 16 require careful consideration in Committee but, in general, I look forward to the completion of proceedings on the Bill and its becoming law.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I am sure that many right hon. and hon. Members are pleased that the Committee stage of the Bill will be taken on the Floor of the House so that we can develop the arguments about the clauses. Thus, we shall not waste time talking about detail on Second Reading.

As the Committee stage will be taken on the Floor of the House, there will be an opportunity for all parties to be represented, so minority parties will be able to give their points of view on the clauses. I should like to stress that, because hon. Members can see that the Benches alongside me are void of members of the alliance. Worse still, the debate has been going on for just two minutes short of four hours, and not one Member representing the Social Democratic party has spoken. When they are in the Chamber, we shall have to remind members of that new party of new-found principles on elections to be here for the Committee stage.

I should like to thank the Government for getting rid of the anomaly whereby people on holiday cannot vote at elections. Many people in my constituency and in the Labour party will welcome a change that widens the franchise. There was also a silly anomaly about postal voting in parish elections. It was difficult to explain the situation to people when one visited them in their homes to discuss the election.

There is also a clause relating to people living, as opposed to working, abroad being able to vote in a general election, although they have been abroad for six years. I have grave doubts about the intentions of the clause. I am sure that many hon. Members will want to debate it further in Committee. The Home Secretary said that people who go abroad might want to retain the link between themselves and their constituencies. However, a sizeable majority of those who live abroad might like to retain the link between dodging taxes and political parties that allow them to dodge taxes. I understand that people who are working abroad on things such as foreign aid projects, or even for the British Council, in different parts of the world might benefit by the clause, but many who do not want to pay rates or income tax in this country will also benefit. Some people do not live in this country and are not affected by Government fiscal policies.

I should like to refer to the raising of the deposit from £150 to £1,000. When I was a candidate I had to borrow £150 because my political party did not have it, due to boundary changes, and I did not have it because I was a working miner. There is a great danger that the raising of the deposit to £1,000 will benefit only those who are better off than others. That is not my only objection to the raising of the deposit. Many people who are deemed to be joke, freak or crank candidates will be prevented from standing for Parliament. At a general election, that is not a major problem anyway. It is not true that the raising of the deposit will get rid of such people.

At the general election, a candidate in Finchley, which is the Prime Minister's constituency, stood for law and order. He got 37 votes, which was 0·1 per cent. of the total vote. Someone standing against the Prime Minister on the question of law and order has every right to do so and to be taken seriously. At the 1979 general election, when the right hon. Lady was Leader of the Opposition, and at the 1983 general election, when she was Prime Minister, she promised that there would be a reduction in crime, but now we see that crime on our streets is increasing daily. Thus, people have every right at elections to stand on such issues.

The increase to £1,000 would also prejudice those who wish to stand in by-elections. In the recent by-election in Stafford a Mr. C. Teasdale stood as the candidate "soon to be unemployed". He recorded only 210 votes, but I suspect that many more than 210 people have been made unemployed in Stafford since the by-election. A candidate who wished to stand under the banner "soon to be unemployed" should be allowed to do so. In the Chesterfield by-election, a Mr. D. Cahill stood as the candidate for reclassifying some newspapers as comics. That was a worthy platform. Had I not been a member of the Labour party, I should have been sorely tempted to stand on such a platform. At the same by-election a Mr. J. Davey stood for no dental charge increases. If one considers the increase in NHS prescription charges and dental charges since 1979, that person could not be described as a crank.

We should give such people the right to stand for election. Democracy is not just a matter of voting—it is about the right to stand up and be heard. It is about the right to stand for election if one believes strongly in an issue. The increase from £150 to £1,000 will deny democratic rights to many people. If Bill Boakes and Screaming Lord Sutch wish to stand for Parliament, they have every right to do so. Having sat in the House for the past 18 months looking at Conservative Members, I can only say that it is a great pity that some of those other candidates did not win.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): On 9 June last year the votes of 77·5 per cent. of the registered electors in the parliamentary constituency of Corby were counted. In some constituencies the turnover was higher, but Corby was in the top bracket of turnouts during that election. However, although relatively high, the turnout was not high. We must ask ourselves why the turnout in a British election is lower than that in elections in most other countries.

There are three artificial barriers to voting in this country, which the Bill should try to correct. There has been wide agreement during the debate that the Bill will provide a major improvement in the law by allowing those on holiday to vote. There is no doubt that in almost every constituency the turnout would increase by at least 2 or 3 per cent. if those people were allowed to vote.

The second barrier is the fact that the register is endemically inaccurate. I regret the fact that too little provision is made in the Bill to improve the position. The criticisms made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) and other hon. Members are extremely important. It is wrong in principle that we cannot correct the register during its lifetime.

The third major reason for our low turnouts is related to the remarks of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). He referred to the desirability of simultaneity—the fact that votes should be cast on the same day between the same hours, not over a prolonged period. The way to meet his objections is to enable the register to be updated constantly. We live in a country where the population is so mobile that within a short time of the creation of the register in September it becomes inaccurate. By June last year, when the register was nine months old, thousands of people had moved to other constituencies. Many of them had moved considerable distances, and it became extremely inconvenient for them to cast their votes in the constituencies where they were registered.

There are two ways of dealing with that. One is to allow more voting by post, and in so far as the Bill allows that to happen, I do not criticise it. However, a better way, which I invite my hon. Friend the Minister to examine even more closely than he has already studied the problem, would be to institute a rolling register that could be brought up to date constantly. If that were introduced, people would not have the inconvenience of having to travel hundreds of miles because they have failed to register in time for a postal vote. If a rolling register could be organised—I see no reason in principle why it should not, and would be sceptical of those who produce technical objections to it—it would solve the problems mentioned by the right hon. Member for South Down.

I ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my hon. Friend the Minister to consider carefully all that has been said about the deposit by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I shall not support any suggestion that it be raised to £1,000. I regret the fact that an artificial hare has been introduced into the debate by way of the suggestion about collecting signatures, as though those who object to a £1,000 deposit were under any obligation to produce an alternative means. The mischief caused by superfluous candidates is too minor for the action that is prognosticated in the Bill, and I shall be unable to support it in due course.

I hope that my hon. Friend will consider more closely what the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said about multiple registrations. It must be wrong in principle to allow people to register in more than one place. If my hon. Friend says, as I am sure he will, that they pay rates in both places, my short answer would be to let a person pay rates in only one place. Although such objections may be superficially attractive, they do not undermine the fundamental principle, which is that the ballot should be cast once only. The best way to ensure that is to allow people to register in only one place.

I welcome the fact that the franchise will be extended to those who reside abroad. I hope that in due course my right hon. and learned Friend will reconsider the seven-year restriction, which is entirely artificial. We need a declaration that the franchise is open to all British subjects, wherever they are——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Indefinitely?

Mr. Powell: Yes. I look forward to debating the Bill more fully in Committee. It is a good Bill, but it could have gone much further, and I hope that we can amend it and make it better.

8.39 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): What we have heard in the past four and half hours or so is evidence enough that this subject should have been considered by a Speaker's Conference and not dealt with by a Select Committee. This is the first experiment of a Select Committee dealing with such a serious and fundamental subject for Parliament and I am afraid that it is not a success. My party tried to give oral evidence to that Committee, but was unable to do so, and I am glad that even at this late stage I am able to put our case. I hope that the Government will seriously consider the various representations that have been made from their own side as well as from Opposition Benches expressing misgivings about various aspects of the Bill.

Even at this stage, will not the Government consider whether they really wish to go ahead with the Bill when instead we should be having a major look, through a Speaker's Conference, at the whole problem of our electoral procedure? Since the war, there have been massive changes in technology, which should be taken into account by a Speaker's Conference. Other changes have brought in the mass media as they are now. There are the activities of the opinion polls, which can have a great effect. All these changes should be seriously considered, and that is a job for a Speaker's Conference, and not for a Select Committee.

Much attention has been focused on the £1,000 deposit. I have an interest to declare in this, because my party loses far too many deposits. Although the threshold at which the deposits will be kept is to come down to 5 per cent. of the vote—I am glad that the Government did not accept the Select Committee's recommendation of 7·5 per cent.—the £1,000 deposit will be a barrier to my Plaid Cymru fighting all the seats in Wales. There should not be a financial barrier such as this. It is a sort of means test and means tests should not have a part to play in our process of democracy.

Conservative Members have said that candidates add to the cost of election, but so will overseas registration. I cannot see the justification for the £1,000 deposit. The other argument that was put was that since £150 was accepted in 1918, it should be more by now, but that presupposes that £150 was right in 1918. After all, 1918 was a very different time to that in which we live now. We should not be taking the principle accepted then as necessarily being applicable now.

Some hon. Members have referred to the possibility of having a list of supporters, rather than assenters for nomination. If we moved to having, say, 100 people who were willing to designate themselves as supporters, that could be considered as the use of their vote in the election. That would sort things out niftily. It would make sure that those who were assenting really, were willing for that candidate to stand. It would also make sure that those who were standing had to look for people who positively wanted them to stand.

However, why should not people stand in an election, even if it is on only one issue? If they feel that strongly about an issue, they have the right to put their point of view to the electorate. If, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) said, there have been instances when Joe Knight, plumber, has advertised his business in electoral literature, there must be other ways to control such practices. Already, the Post Office is most careful about what it is willing to send through the free post.

In any case, the fringe candidates are not the candidates who make massive use of the free post. Often, they do not have the money to print the leaflets or the hands to put the leaflets into envelopes and write the envelopes. It will be difficult for Plaid Cymru with the £1,000 deposit, but other smaller parties, such as the Ecology party, will be even harder hit. The Ecology party has a valid point of view to put forward. At the moment, it may be a minority party but its appeal may grow.

When my party first fought an election in my constituency, we had only 600 votes. That was a deposit well lost but we now have over 52 per cent. of the votes. In the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas), we lost our deposit in 1966, and won the seat in 1974. Parties can grow from small bases and we should not be in the business of taking a steamroller to crack small nuts in case they grow up into big oak trees that may threaten the Government. I hope that the Minister will think about this. These may be small nuts, but none the less they have a role to play in our elections.

I appeal to the Government to reconsider the £1,000 deposit. It may be that, when they consider what has been said tonight, they will feel that it is appropriate not to press on with the increase to £1,000. I hope that they will decide, even if they do not keep the deposit at £150, to raise it to a somewhat lower level than £1,000 as this will allow more candidates to stand.

[Mr. Dafydd Wigley]

In another debate, I have already described the iniquities that can arise from the abuse of the postal vote system. I welcome postal votes being available to those who, through no fault of their own, are away when an election is called, particularly as we have no set dates for elections and people cannot be expected to read the tea leaves. Nevertheless, there are shortcomings and possible abuses. I see nothing in the Bill that tries to solve those shortcomings.

One of the shortcomings which has already been spoken about is second homes. I support the comments made by the hon. Members for Corby (Mr. Powell) and for Edgbaston. We need much more accurate registers, because that is the basis of the election. One of the inaccuracies that we should get rid of is the second home vote, which in some constituencies, such as Anglesey, has caused considerable contention. Some have suggested that it may even have affected the result. I do not think that it has done so but it is still a possibility, and we should be doing away with it now. If there is to be a postal vote, it could be used to enable the elector to vote in the constituency in which he is registered.

I share the grave misgivings about extending the vote to overseas residents, that have been expressed by many hon. Members. However, if we are to extend the vote to such people, the right to vote should not last for seven years but for a shorter time. As this is representation without taxation, should not such overseas residents pay a fee, as we are concerned about the cost of elections? They could pay a substantial fee of £1,000 as a contribution to the costs, as many of them could afford to pay such sums.

The amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy and myself refers to election expenses. Since the war, there has been a massive change in the impact of centralised propaganda, through radio and television, as opposed to constituency propaganda. We limit the amount of expenditure in a constituency to £4,000 or £5,000, but we allow what is the equivalent of £20,000 a constituency on central expenditure, as the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) said earlier. Surely this is making a mockery of the system of controlled expenditure. We should be looking at this problem, but we are not.

I move on to Welsh forms. The provisions in clause 21 will take out section 199 of the principal Act. Will the Minister assure me that all the provisions of the Welsh Language Act 1967 which will apply to this Act will reinstate all these provisions?

There are other points that I hope will be made in Commitee. There is the question of opinion polls during elections and of the results being announced in a way that influences the outcome. There is also the question of how spoilt papers are dealt with. The Government's response to the Select Committee on that, on page 24, is quite inadequate. I am sure that there are ways of overcoming that problem. There are also issues concerning the rights of parties to check voters as they go in to the polling station. The usage of such rights varies considerably from area to area, and there should be some guidelines for that. There is also the problem of access to booths for disabled people who want to vote themselves, but who cannot get up or down stairs.

We should examine many such issues, but they are rightly matters for Committee. The main principles under consideration concern the right of people to stand for election. The House should ensure tonight that we do not in any way fetter it.

8.49 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I welcome the Bill, because it will give many more people the right to vote. Indeed, that is one of the most encouraging aspects of the Bill, as the right to vote is one of our last democratic rights.

I welcome the extension of the franchise, particularly to those living abroad. It is right, however, that they should not have the vote after seven years. Indeed, I had hoped that the period might be shorter than seven years. But seven years should be the maximum.

However, it is unfair that those working abroad are at present unable to vote, particularly if they have a home in Britain. If they pay their rates, why on earth should they not have the right to vote?

Incidentally, the Eurocrats should have had the vote before—they will now obviously have it—as they are working abroad.

I am unhappy that Irish citizens should still have the vote here when we are still waiting to have the vote in Ireland. However, I know that we shall obtain it. There must be some sort of fair system between the countries.

It will now be easier for absentee voters to vote, but of course people should not be able to vote on demand. I very much agree with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that there should be no automatic right. The person involved must justify the need for his vote, and it will obviously involve his employment. I am particularly concerned about the meaning of "indefinite period". I think that there should be an annual renewal. Obviously service men should not have to apply each year and should get the vote as of right. But for others there should be this annual review.

The basic criterion is that anyone eligible for a postal vote must, under clause 7(3)(a),

"prove that he cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person at the polling station allotted . . . to him".

Therefore, it is of great concern to me that the special list kept by the electoral registration officer should be up to date and properly checked. The address must be checked, and I believe that after a certain time that person's right to vote should be automatically extinguished.

In June 1983, a few weeks after I was elected to the House, I tabled an early-day motion calling for the right to vote to be extended to all holidaymakers. In conjunction with the Leicester Mercury, a major campaign was launched. We must not now lose that franchise. That is why the Bill is welcome. Up to 2 million people will benefit from extending the vote to holidaymakers, and that could affect many seats. In June 1981, there were 1,337,000 United Kingdom holidaymakers and they may now be entitled to the vote. If the election had been held in October 1981, the figure would have been 513,000 United Kingdom holidaymakers. Therefore, those people will now need to apply well in time, giving the address to which the ballot paper is to be sent.

Indeed, I was reassured to discover that those going abroad will have to pay for the expense of sending their completed ballot papers back to the United Kingdom. As we all know, the application must be furnished 11 days before the poll. As my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) said, under the Bill it would seem rather easy to obtain that vote. I am concerned about that, and I should like to see counter-signatures introduced as quickly as possible, so that there cannot be any electoral abuse. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will make it clear that the fine for abusing the system is £2,000, and I hope that the word will be spread, so that people realise that they cannot take advantage of the system.

Some people have spoken about multiple registration, and the risk of taking advantage of that system. When I was at university in London, I had two votes. I had a vote in the constituency of St. Marylebone and a vote in Dorking, where my parents lived. I was on the electoral rolls for both constituencies becaused I lived in the student hall of residence in one constituency and at my parents' home in the other. It is not particularly easy to vote twice —not that I would wish or try to. Nevertheiess, it is a sad fact that at present there is no such thing as a secret ballot. If the electoral registration officer so wishes, he can look at the form and see a number that relates directly to my name on the electoral roll. Although I want to see genuine ballot papers, it is unfortunate that the ballot is not truly secret. But perhaps we can develop that futher in Committee.

Many people are offered proxy votes. As before, the proxy vote will be available, but those using it cannot be told how to vote. They know only that they may vote on behalf of the person away.

I am glad to say that in Leicester, East the machines marking the ballot papers were found to be faulty and were taken away in time. However, in Leicester, South the machines were not taken away and many votes had to be declared invalid.

Several hon. Members have mentioned polling hours, including, in particular, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). I was not convinced by his argument that the booths should stay open for that extra hour. I should be interested to know how many people vote before 8 am. I imagine that many vote then, but the elderly, in particular, do not enjoy going out to vote between 9 pm and 10 pm on a dark October night.

It is a matter of great regret that the Bill does not deal with personation. In Leicester, East I have evidence that personation occurred. I am afraid that there was a motto among some of the ethnic community, "Vote early, vote often." That worries me. However, personation can be avoided by ensuring that polling stations are properly policed. In Leicester, I hope that the police will be on duty throughout the day at each polling station and will not just move around on a rota. Thus, I regret that there is no provision about personation.

At the general election, in Leicester, East the turnout in some areas was as high as 80 per cent., and it was more than 65 per cent. in the city council elections in May 1983. I believe, therefore, that we need identification cards and other similar provisions to ensure that the right people vote and can prove who they are. I very much hope that polling cards will be properly checked and not collected, as they are in certain multi-occupied flats, and then used as some form of identification.

I also regret that the franchise is not extended to business voters. I believe that in 1959, or later, those who paid substantial rates had the right to vote, and I should like to see that right extended again today.

I accept that we do not want frivolous candidates, but some candidates are good independents with a true message. We should increase the number of assenters supporting such candidates so that they can prove their worth. The figure could be as high as 250 to 500. If so many people were assenters, a true message would come through. This is not a survival or self-interest plea on my behalf. The Indian Workers Association candidate in Leicester, East, Mr. Ratilal Ganatra, obtained 970 votes and my majority was 933. He received more than 500 votes. His 500 assenters would have supported him; otherwise they would not have signed the form. I cannot accept that people sign anything just because it is put in front of them.

I warn the House that even if the deposit were £1,000, it would not deter certain public relations companies from putting forward a candidate. I shall not name anyone, but we might remember the Warrington by-election and a drink called vodka. Such a candidate could still stand.

I recommend that the electoral deposit be about £250 and that no more than 500 assenters be required. We should do away with the other criteria. If we establish a fairer franchise, more people will take part, we shall have a fairer system and the democratic process will be respected.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) made an exceptionally serious point when he laid down three criteria. The first was the right of any citizen over voting age to stand for election. It is offensive for this House, individually or collectively, to say that in certain circumstances we shall so arrange matters that some citizens of these islands will be prevented from standing for election to Parliament. The whole idea of parliamentary elections is that that judgment belongs to the electors individually and to the electorate collectively. Without that freedom our parliamentary democracy is diminished. If we restrict the right to stand as the Bill proposes, we risk more people saying, "In that event I shall not bother to vote."

One of the gravest criticisms of the United States of America is that, although 90 million people voted in the recent presidential election, about 83 million people did not because they were not registered. About half of the citizens of the United States who were otherwise eligible to vote could not be bothered, for all sorts of reasons, to have their names put on the electoral register.

I take exception to being lectured by the Association of Chief Police Officers of England and Wales and Northern Ireland about who can and who cannot be candidates. Recently the association poked its nose into political affairs. In written evidence on 18 February 1980 to the Home Affairs Committee on the law relating to public order which sat in the 1979-80 Session the association had the effrontery to say:

> "The Association has no doubt that there is need to consider a more realistic level of deposit for Parliamentary Elections which would have the effect of considerably reducing the field of candidates, many of whom would appear to be contesting seats unjustifiably."

That has nothing to do with any police officer in this land either before a Select Committee or anywhere else. The police officers can demonstrate their feelings when they go into the polling station and use their vote. We do not need to hear from them about what we should do.

[Mr. Robin Corbett]

The deposit of £1,000 is far too high. Whatever the Government say, it is a test of whether a person can raise the cash. Some people will find it easier than others to get their fists around £1,000. That is no way to decide who can stand for Parliament and who cannot.

A better proposition, to which reference has already been made, is to beef up the number of assenters required. The report of the Home Affairs Committee, in paragraph 75, got it wrong and to some extent misled the Government. It said:

"An elector might quite casually agree to give his signature in these circumstances not because he intended to vote for the candidate but merely in the belief that he ought to be allowed to stand."

That is no proper judgment for that Select Committee to make. How dare anybody even suggest that electors are so casual and careless that they will sign anything merely to get people off the doorstep. Electors are not that casual about parliamentary elections.

There is no argument about holidaymakers having votes, but there is a difference between those who have demonstrated that they have gone abroad to live and those who have shown that they have gone abroad to work. Nationals of many other countries who go abroad on holiday receive their ballot papers and are able properly to place them in ballot boxes in embassies or high commissions in various countries. Why cannot we use that system? Most British holidaymakers go to Spain, which is not a million miles away. Individuals who are sufficiently concerned to seek a vote when on holiday would be prepared to avail themselves of the opportunity to vote at embassies or high commissions. I hope that the Government will take that on board.

9.5 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): As my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said, the Bill is fundamental. It snaps at the very heels of our democracy. It challenges the essential freedom of the individual. Even the Home Secretary dismissed the possibility that Members might be capable of free thinking. Such is his respect, or lack of it, for the freedoms which we hold precious. He described the differences between my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) and the shadow Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), as fundamental. My hon. Friend and right hon. Friend merely demonstrated the free-thinking abilities of hon. Members, especially those who have the honour to serve on Select Committees.

I express my support for the arrangements which are being made for holidaymakers. However, I must express opposition to the principle that those who reside abroad should have the right to vote for seven years. It seems that many of those who are leaving our shores in present conditions are doing so with the intention of staying away. They sometimes talk about leaving a sinking ship as if they are trying to avoid facing the problems that confront us all in our modern society in modern Britain. If they feel that they can opt out, surely we have the right to remove from them the right to vote. I hope that there will be some new thinking on this matter when the Bill is considered in Committee.

The arrangements that are proposed for deposits are an attack on our democracy. Individuals who represent minority parties and minority lobbies will lose the right to stand as candidates. The Bill will prevent many Ecology party candidates from standing throughout the United Kingdom. There may not be much sympathy on the Government Benches for the Ecology party, but that party, which represents the Green movement in British politics, is a growing one. Although it may put a candidate against a Labour candidate, the very presence of Ecology Green candidates in constituencies throughout the United Kingdom has an influence on thinking generally on the libertarian left of British politics.

The Ecology party candidates influence the way in which we develop political strategies at party conferences. The greater the vote that the Ecology party attracts and the greater the vote that Green candidates attract, the more likely it is that they will have an effect on the politics of institutional parties. That is all being put at risk.

The Green movement in Germany—admittedly, it used a form of proportional representation—was able to attract to itself a substantial part of the vote. In doing so it had a direct influence on the development of social democratic environment policies in Germany. That is a healthy development. I might not go as far as supporting proportional representation, but we should ensure that wherever possible minority parties have the opportunity to stand, if only to influence our deliberations.

I believe that the 500 signatures principle is acceptable. If the Home Secretary is confused about the bureaucratic problems that might arise in town halls because of the need to check names, why not charge £20 or £30 for the privilege of having one's nomination form checked? There is a great deal of difference between £30 lost and £1,000 lent which one cannot afford to borrow. Charging for checking would be a far more acceptable principle.

The Bill proposes that the time of closing polls should be moved from 10 pm to 9 pm. The Home Secretary said that that was a necessary move, although he dismissed the value of the 1,300,000 people who might be affected by that decision. The right hon. and learned Gentleman does not recognise the fact that many people in the industrial north and other industrial areas vote before they go on shift at 10 pm. They will have to rearrange their day to enable them to vote earlier. That may well disturb their sleeping patterns. An unnecessary pressure is being exerted on them.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which extends the right to vote to people who have chosen to live abroad and have no more than a tenuous connection with a United Kingdom constituency, while limiting the opportunity to vote of people permanently resident in the United Kingdom."

As every hon. Member who has participated in this debate has said, this is an important and constitutional Bill. Its centrality to our democratic process has been clearly evidenced by the wide range of issues raised in the debate and by many of the speeches which had a philosophical bent and clearly addressed themselves to important matters of principle. It is therefore essential, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said, that the Bill and its provisions should have the widest agreement.

The Government would like it to be thought that that is the case, and they have attempted to present themselves in the guise of guarantor of civil liberties, the protector of the electoral system and the advocate of democratic rights and representative government. According to the Home Secretary's speech, the Government want to be seen to be impartial, disinterested and, in effect, honest brokers. That is not the case, and the Home Secretary seemed to be aware that he was flying under false colours. That is probably the explanation for his shallow and shabby speech in support of Second Reading. The right hon. and learned Gentleman smiles rather cynically and benignly, but to give no more than a simple recitation of the explanation of the clauses of this important Bill was a shabby performance. Such a performance has probably never been given in this House by any other Home Secretary of any party.

The Government are not impartial, disinterested and honest brokers. The Tory Government have failed adequately to consult all the other parties represented in the House. Important matters in this Bill should have the widest possible measure of agreement and should be the product of all-party consensus. Instead, at the behest of the Tory party the provisions are foisted on the House, the political parties and the country. That will mean, as I am sure the Home Secretary has already realised, a long, difficult and hotly contested discussion in Committee. The fact that that stage will be taken on the Floor of the House will make for even longer, more contentious and more difficult proceedings. Perhaps the Under-Secretary of State will give the guarantee sought by all Opposition parties that such a constitutional measure will not be guillotined.

It is not surprising that the Tory party should have taken this attitute, because we are talking about an anti-democratic Government. That has been clearly demonstrated by the Government's policies and actions during the last 18 months, and the previous five years. We cannot accept the Government's protestations of sincerity and impartiality when they have been responsible for the greatest assault on democratic principles and practices and the greatest erosion of our civil liberties for decades. That is certainly true of the Government's attacks on local authorities and trade unions and the increasing powers they have given to the police.

The Government's anti-democratic institutions and sentiments are clearly illustrated by their proposal to increase the deposit at parliamentary elections sevenfold to £1,000. Why is it necessary? Why do it? We had the arguments adduced in June and today by the Home Secretary. First, he said that many candidates do not belong to any of the major political parties. So what? It is not yet a crime not to belong to a political party. Political parties do not have—although some of us may wish to believe that they do—a monopoly of political wisdom and they should not have the monopoly of access to the political system.

The Home Secretary then announced that many of the so-called fringe candidates are not, in any event, serious. That is for the electorate to judge, not for the Home Secretary. It is not for him to determine the seriousness or otherwise of individual candidates. Many of those candidates who are clearly fringe candidates and who do not gain many votes are, nevertheless, extremely serious in their motivation, their objectives and the message that they are putting before the electorate. Moreover, many of the most serious, dedicated and determined parliamentary candidates representing the so-called fringe parties are accidentally poor. That is true of those who in previous years stood in favour of votes for women, and as independents for the abolition of capital punishment, and of those who stood in recent general elections for the Welsh and Scottish Nationalist parties and the Ecology party.

The Welsh Nationalist party lost 24 deposits at the last general election, which cost it £4,800. Under the Government's proposals, it would have still lost all 24 deposits even with the lower 5 per cent. threshold but that would have cost it £24,000. The Ecology party fared even worse. All its 63 candidates lost their deposits. It cost the party £9,450 at the last general election. Not one of those candidates attained the 5 per cent. threshold that will be necessary to retain the £1,000 deposit. If these proposals were in effect, they would cost it £63,000.

The proposals will be a major inhibiting factor for independents and small parties. There is no evidence that the frivolous candidates are poor and the serious candidates are rich. Many of the richest candidates are the most frivolous and the most offensive. They will not be deterred by the proposal of a £1,000 deposit.

The Home Secretary then came forward with the argument that, in any event, the fringe candidates have no chance of being elected. That may well be the case, but how does he know? Is that, in itself, a good reason for deterring them from standing? That is what he said today and in June.

It is no good reason to deter candidates from standing, because, irrespective of their other merits, they have no chance of being elected. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton and other hon. Members have said, if that were to be the criterion it would apply to many Tory candidates in many constituencies, not least mine and those of Liverpool, Riverside, Bootle, Islwyn and Glasgow, Central.

The Home Secretary then resorted to a patronising and offensive argument that fringe candidates confuse and distract the electorate. That is patronising and offensive not just to the fringe candidates but to the electorate whom the Home Secretary underestimates. Conservative Members tend to cite Chesterfield with its record 17 fringe candidates as an example of where such a proliferation of candidates distracts and confuses the electorate. All those 17 candidates lost their deposits. None of them sufficiently distracted or confused the electorate to stop my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) being elected as everyone expected that he would be.

Conservative Members resort to the argument that some candidates stand only for commercial reasons. I accept that there is some substance in that argument. There is abuse. Some candidates wish to stand for the free publicity that arises from being a parliamentary candidate, and for the commercial benefits that might accrue to their businesses and enterprises as a result.

If that is so, a higher deposit would be no bar. Such people would be prepared to pay £1,000 for that commercial advantage. If that is such an abuse, there are other ways to deal with it rather than imposing a deposit which will inhibit and prohibit serious, worthwhile, committed and dedicated candidates.

Many candidates and their parties are deeply offensive and some of my hon. Friends may be sympathetic to the notion of an increased deposit for that reason. There are candidates with policies that none of us could support or abide, but it is for the electorate to humiliate and dismiss them and to show that such candidates, be they from the Communist party or the National Front, have no semblance of support in this country. It is extremely important that people representing such offensive views nevertheless have access to our democratic political system, that it is not blocked off for them and that they do not feel that there is no outlet even for racist and minority views in our political system.

In any event, money should never be the key to access to our political system. The Conservatives constantly attempt to make money the key to everything. They are already doing it for access to education and they are trying to do it for access to the health system, but money must not become the key to access to our democratic system.

The same disregard for democratic principles is evident in the Government's treatment of Northern Ireland electors. The Bill provides that residents of Northern Ireland cannot have an absent vote sent to an address abroad or for a specific parliamentary election under the same terms and conditions as citizens in other parts of the United Kingdom. More important, it provides that in future residents of Northern Ireland cannot have a postal vote if they move from one constituency to another. Those provisions are wrong in principle. We cannot and should not make distinctions between British citizens within the United Kingdom. As the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said, as Members of Parliament we are all equal and we should be elected by the same means, under the same rules and with the same opportunities for citizens to vote for or against us.

If there is a problem of abuse, it must be dealt with, but to restrict democratic rights because there is abuse is to concede victory to those seeking to undermine the democratic process because, in effect, it allows them to set the terms of our electoral system and to determine the laws by which our elections are conducted. That cannot be tolerated and it is inexcusable for the Government to suggest that it can. It is an anomaly and a gross injustice in the Bill that we shall attempt to put right. Members of the citizenry in Northern Ireland are already second-class citizens in many respects, certainly in many aspects of the criminal justice system. We cannot accept that they should also be second-class citizens in terms of their democratic rights and their ability to cast votes in parliamentary elections within the domain of the United Kingdom.

The right hon. Member for South Down made an appeal to the House on behalf of his constituents. That appeal has certainly been heard by Labour Members and we shall respond to it. I hope that Conservative Back Benchers will also regard it as their right and duty when considering the Bill in the House and in Committee to give every citizen in the United Kingdom the same rights, duties and opportunities as the Bill provides for those in Great Britain.

It would seem that the Government are extending our democracy at least through the proposals to enable expatriate or overseas electors to vote in parliamentary or European Assembly elections. However, that is not so. First, the Government, as one would expect, have had regard to their narrow party advantage in enfranchising about 600,000 Britons living abroad. No doubt that is why the Government have gone beyond the Select Committee's recommendation to restrict the extension of the franchise to British citizens living and working within the EEC.

Secondly, it is no advantage to our party system to allow to participate in it those who have no commitment to it and no future in it. We accept that there are many people working temporarily abroad who intend to return and who still feel an emotional, political, social and physical commitment to this country and have a future here. However, the vast majority of those who are enfranchised by the Bill and who will take advantage of the opportunity to cast a vote are emigrants, tax exiles and indeed, criminals.

There is no reason why those who have emigrated from this country, those who have washed their hands of it and want nothing more to do with its social, political or economic institutions, should be given the right to participate in our elections. There is no good reason why those who are evading their dues and responsibilities in terms of the taxes that they are expected and obliged to pay should have any right to participate in our democratic parliamentary processes. There is certainly no reason at all why we should go out of our way to extend the opportunity and the right to vote to those who are living on what my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton, described as the Costa del Crime and who are sought for criminal offences committed here.

Moreover, it cannot be to the advantage of our representative parliamentary democracy, which is based upon single-Member constituencies, simply that more people should be able to vote before the campaign has ended. It cannot be to the advantage of our representative parliamentary democracy that more people will vote who have little or no contact with Britain, its politics or its political parties. It cannot be to our advantage that there should be more people entitled to vote who have no knowledge of the candidate and no wish — still less opportunity — to see, hear and argue with those candidates.

Certainly, it would be of no advantage to our democracy to allow tax exiles or criminals to determine the outcome of elections in particular constituencies or indeed —as has been said, it could have happened in 1964— the outcome of a general election. There is no justification for enabling people with no future in this country and no commitment to it to influence either specific results or the outcome of general elections.

Some semblance of an improvement in our democratic principles and practice would seem to be effectd by means of the proposals in the Bill which make changes in relation to the absent vote, and in particular, to those who are on holiday. All parties accept that it is manifestly unjust that people who through no fault of their own are on holiday when an election is held should not be able to vote. As candidates, we have all met people who had booked their holidays well in advance of the election or who had no choice in the matter of when they took their holiday. Thousands of people are involved, especially now that the taboo on holding elections in the late spring or early summer seems to have been broken. We all know constituents who have expressed shock, who are bitter and rightly angry, especially when it is not their fault and cannot be avoided because we, unlike other countries, do not have fixed dates for elections.

The anomaly and injustice is now being put right. That is to be welcomed but it is only a small move. It is the only real extension of substance of our democracy in the Bill. Its relative triviality must be set against the background of the Government's attack on civil liberties and democratic principles in other respects. When we are asked to debate the matter, approve the Government's proposals and welcome the Bill, we must not forget, nor should we allow our constituents to forget, that this is the same Government who have interfered in local democracy by imposing rate capping on elected local authorities. We must insist that this is the same Government who are attempting to eliminate democratically elected Labour-controlled councils and, in London, to substitute an elected Labour council with Tory placemen. We must set this trivial gain against the Government's attack on an individual's right to belong to trade unions at GCHQ. [Interruption] Hon. Members who are now dissenting were not present to hear the Home Secretary present himself as the great saviour of democratic principles and civil liberties. If he intends to pretend to the House and the country that he is extending our democracy and safeguarding our liberties, it is right to draw attention to the fact that he is also a Member of the Government who have trampled on more democratic rights and taken away more civil liberties than any other party or any other Government in the past decade or more.

It behoves us to draw attention to the Government's offensive against trade unions and internal trade union democracy. It behoves us to draw attention to the fact that the Government are trying to weaken the link between the Labour party and its trade union sponsors and supporters. We must set the small democratic gains in the Bill by the side of the erosion of civil liberties and of individual privacy to be found in some parts of the Data Protection Act 1984 and, more importantly, as a result of the increase in police powers to stop, search, arrest and detain law-abiding citizens under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

We must place these small democratic gains in the Bill by the side of the new powers that are given, by omission, to the police in the current coal mining dispute, during which the Government have stood by calmly and silently while a national police force with paramilitary powers has, de facto, been created. These are powerful reasons for not being prepared to take the Tories on trust. They are powerful reasons for suspecting their pretence to be the protectors of democracy. They are powerful reasons for our cynicism at their impartiality when wanting to change electoral law. They are powerful and overwhelming reasons why my right hon. and hon. Friends should vote against the Bill reciving a Second Reading.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): After several minutes of generalised all-purpose rant from the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk), I hope that I shall be forgiven for returning to the subject of the Bill. In June, in the debate on the White Paper, I said that democracy depends on getting right the broad principles and the mechanics. This Bill is about getting those mechanics right, and I believe it is a major step towards achieving that aim. On that basis, I commend it to the House.

The Bill contains three very important proposals which many will believe are long overdue. First, it contains the proposal to extend the vote to Britons living overseas. What is surprising about that is that it has taken so long to come about, not that we are bringing it forward now.

The second proposal is to extend postal votes. Surely none of us wants to go through another election with large numbers of our constituents disfranchised as a result of holiday arrangments into which they entered in good faith without knowing, and having no reason to know, that there would be a general election.

The third proposal is, I recognise, the most controversial feature of the Bill: to restore the credibility of the deposit by fixing it at a more suitable and sensible level.

We should not ignore other changes which are brought about by the Bill. While not so central as the three that I have mentioned, nevertheless they are important. I would mention the extension of absent voting to parish and community council elections. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) in his place, as I remember that this has been a favourite topic of his for some time. I hope that he and other hon. Members on both sides of the House will welcome it.

There are changes in expenses limits and changes which make combinations of elections on the same day easier. There are changes to simplify the election timetable, to deal with the difficult issue of the demise of the Crown during an election period, to update the penalties for election offences, to make it easier to add names to the election register after a notice of election has been published and to allow an unaddressed and free delivery service to be provided rather than each envelope having to be addressed before it can be part of the free post. There are also changes of importance to political parties which have computers to allow for the provision of magnetic tapes and floppy discs containing electoral register information, instead of just the hard copies as at present. These important and useful reforms are contained in the Bill.

I want now to say something about consultation, as this has been a controversial issue in some quarters. I am not sure that many of the points that have been made are entirely fair. Perhaps I could briefly trace the history of this measure. The Select Committee on Home Affairs decided in July 1982 that it would consider the Representation of the People Acts. The Select Committee gave this matter careful consideration, as is entirely typical of that estimable Committee, and it reported in April 1983. It did a thorough job and came out with 22 firm recommendations, 18 of them unanimous—a figure not to be forgotten when one considers what is to follow. Among the dignitaries on the Select Committee was the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), now an Opposition Front Bench spokesman but then a Back Bencher, who was free to think rather different thoughts from some of those that have been voiced today by the Labour Front Bench.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): That is wrong.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman says that I am wrong. If he wants me to deal with the matter now, I am willing to do so. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that he was absent when some of the votes were taken, I hardly think that it is a particularly good defence. If he has a better point than that, I shall of course give way to him.

The Select Committee in the other place which considered the matter reported on uniform procedures for the European Parliament in a report published in January 1983 and recommended that votes should be given to British citizens resident in the European Community for a period of 10 years. Its consideration is also relevant to matters contained in the Bill.

[Mr. Mellor]

In October 1983, the Government announced their intention to bring forward proposals in this Session of Parliament and embarked upon a period of consultation during which my right hon. and learned Friend sent letters to each of the leaders of the parties represented in this House asking them if they would kindly submit answers to questions on matters under consideration for inclusion in the Bill and making it clear that, as well as obtaining written responses, my right hon. and learned Friend was only too willing to arrange meetings at which these matters could be more extensively discussed. Every invitation extended for a meeting that was accepted resulted in a meeting being held and the matters being thoroughly discussed.

As a result of those discussions, a White Paper was produced in January 1984 which set out the Government's thinking. Seven consultation papers were produced: two in January 1984, dealing with the extension of the franchise and absent voting; three in February 1984, dealing with the electoral registration timetable and the free delivery of candidates' election communications in the election campaign; one in August 1984, dealing with penalties; and one this month, dealing with the availability of the register of electors. All of those were widely distributed to obtain opinions.

As well as Ministers being available for consultations with the parties, Home Office officials were available to continue discussions with officials of all of the parties represented in the House, as well as others who wished to see them. We had the debate in June and we now have the Bill.

Having regard to the careful procedure that I have outlined, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), with the greatest respect to him, had a difficult furrow to plough when he said that we had not handled the Bill in a manner befitting a constitutional measure. What more, by way of consultation, would it be reasonable to expect any Government to have embarked on than the careful list that I have suggested?

It has become a feature of one or two Opposition spokesmen — on the basis that other people may not know the facts — to say that there has not been consultation and that the Government have sought to ride roughshod over the Opposition, when really the Opposition have shown precious little interest in putting their views forward.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman obviously has a crystal ball, because I was about to couple his name with that point. The hon. Gentleman has complained in rounded terms. The Scottish National party responded in one letter to the invitations sent by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. After that, it attended none of the meetings at which consultation papers were discussed. We have heard nothing more from the SDP, nor have any papers been forwarded from the Scottish Office suggesting that anything was raised with it that should have come to us.

Mr. Wilson: Is the Minister not aware that we wrote to the Secretary of State for Scotland? Our main complaint was in relation to the agenda for the changes. Indeed, if the hon. Gentleman had listened to my speech, he would know that I pointed out the need to reform electoral law on the overall expenditure of political parties and the electronic media, radio and television. He has not attempted to deal with those important facts.

Mr. Mellor: That is an attempt to get round the point. The hon. Gentleman is agreeing entirely with the point that I made. His party made one response at the end of last year. Since then there has been nothing, and now we are blamed for no consultation. It does not make sense.

I, and I believe many hon. Members — not just Conservative Members—believe that overseas voting is one of the major innovations of the Bill, and long overdue. The right hon. Member for Gorton made an attack that was at least witty, although that of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North was not. That attack was a travesty of the position of hundreds of thousands of British citizens who, as part of their service to the companies which employ them and to the nation, spend part of their working lives overseas. They are as much British as we are. It is no good the hon. Member for Knowsley, North engaging in animated conversation with the right hon. Member for Gorton. As he has made a charge, he should listen to my reply. Among those hundreds of thousands of people, I dare say, are some of his constituents. There are no class barriers to working overseas these days, as anyone who has travelled on a plane to the middle east will know only too well.

The right hon. Member for Gorton talked about underage peers, escaped fugitives and tax evaders. That might have delighted some of the groundlings on the Labour Back Benches, but those who usually admire the quality of his argument felt that he fell sadly below the level of the bench. It is an extremely difficult proposition to try to oppose what is manifestly a sensible proposition.

The hon. Member for Battersea was absent in embarrassment from the debate on the White Paper. I am not sure that it is an improvement for him to be embarrassed in person now as a result of what he said on the Select Committee which his colleagues on the Front Bench, on which he now sits, have scattered to the four winds. It is a dereliction of an argument that we should have an argument that people who live overseas are tax dodgers and so should not vote. Apart from anything else, it is inaccurate; but that is no surprise. Since when has paying tax been a qualification for voting in British elections? Are we suggesting that those in receipt of supplementary benefit and pensions should be disfranchised? I hardly think so.

Had the right hon. Gentleman's point about back registers been true, it would have been a point of substance. However, back registers are kept. We have managed to contact many electoral registration officers, who say that they have back registers for the relevant period. If they do not, back registers from 1948 have been kept on behalf of the Home Office by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. Therefore, there is a complete record upon which voters overseas could make claims about residency in a certain constituency to gain a vote for seven years.

The right hon. Gentleman strongly criticised our decision to move the close of poll at a general election from 10 pm to 9 pm. Again, it is one of those matters that the hon. Member for Battersea was content with during the Select Committee consideration——

Mr. Dubs: I was not there.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman keeps saying that. He does not show himself in his best light by saying that. He should take his duty as a member of the Select Committee with great seriousness. Knowing him, I am sure that he did. Why does he not admit that he held a different view two years ago? That would do him a great deal more credit than trying to pretend that he was not there. If he had been, there would have been a Division on every proposal to which his hon. Friends now take exception.

We gained the unanimity for which we were all looking, yet we are now told that party advantage is involved. None of the Labour representatives on the Select Committee saw the matter in that way. Rather than the asseverations of the right hon. Member for Gorton, they preferred the rather more dispassionate and objective evidence of Dr. David Butler—the great panjandrum on these matters—who said that on his analyses of the 4 per cent. of the public who vote between 9 pm and 10 pm, there was no party advantage either way.

In so far as any one is incommoded by the decision to move from 10 pm to 9 pm for the close of poll, the aim of our arrangements on postal votes is to ensure that people can obtain a postal vote if, for some reason, they cannot attend the poll between 7 am and 9 pm. Whatever else troubles the House about the proposals, I hope that the removal of an hour from the polling day will be viewed as relatively insubstantial.

The debate was made more memorable by the involvement of two of the most distinguished parliamentarians of our time—the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). I am sure that I speak for all who participated in saying how glad we were that they spoke in the debate.

The right hon. Member for South Down took issue with the provision about postal votes in a wider basis. I am glad to say that not many other participants took that view. As I said at the outset, it must be accepted that we can no longer maintain the present distinctions between people who are away on employment and those who may be away on holiday or because of urgent family business. Most people recognise that even though that may constitute an open invitation—a menu card for postal voting—once a decision has been taken to extend and widen the availability of absent voting facilities, it is difficult—without piling anomaly upon anomaly — to create another category of availability of postal votes. It is far better to say that we have reached a point where there are a large number of good reasons why someone should want to vote by post and to acknowledge and accept that by making one qualification, which is what we do in the Bill.

I am, of course, grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for putting with such clarity the issue that faces us and recognising that not everyone reaches the same conclusion. However, the alternative of continuing with our restrictive view of postal votes is no alternative—and certainly not a route that I would want to take.

Anyway, we must bear in mind that the present arrangements on postal votes are based more on people's willingness to accept the rules than on anything that the framework of law imposes. If someone is prepared to tell a lie about where he is, there are no penal sanctions, and he can get a postal vote if the electoral registration officer believes him.

Of course, we understand the real difficulties that are faced in Northern Ireland. It gives us no pleasure at all to seek restrictions in voting procedure changes in Northern Ireland that do not apply in Great Britain, but the alternative that faces us is either to add to the difficulties of electoral malpractice in Northern Ireland or to refuse to bring forward changes in the rest of Great Britain that we feel are long overdue in a context where the electoral process, whatever people may say about malpractice, is nothing like the same as that which prevails on the other side of the Irish sea.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Are the Government then willing to go case by case through the possibilities of malpractice which might be raised by the arrangements proposed to be made in the rest of Great Britain and, if they do not appear to be substantial in Northern Ireland, not to stand in the way of the extension of those facilities to Northern Ireland?

Mr. Mellor: Absolutely. I was going to say that I took the right hon. Gentleman's point about the removal of the right for a postal vote in Northern Ireland. There appears to have been a misunderstanding. The fact is that that right was removed with no fuss in January this year in relation to the European elections. Our intention to do the same in this legislation was expressed in the consultative document issued in January this year. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that in Committee we shall want to look again at those matters with great care. I accept the sincerity of his view. I say again to Northern Ireland Members present that it gives us no pleasure to make these restrictions. We do so in good faith. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will be available to deal with some of those matters in Committee.

I was a little troubled that the official Opposition appeared to be jumping too willingly on the bandwagon. I thought that they would have had discussions with their opposite numbers in the Social Democratic and Labour party of Northern Ireland——

Mr. Dubs: Never.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman, who is not having a good evening, says, "Never." I do not know why he says that, because surely that is a reputable group. It wrote a letter to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, in response to the consultation exercise, saying:

> "We have expressed the view to the Secretary of State that the electoral process is under direct threat in Northern Ireland because of the extent of electoral abuse which is being organised by extremists. In our view, that situation requires immediate and radical action to protect the citizen's right to vote. Your letter contains no proposals related to this problem, and shows little appreciation of its urgency."

Since then the Government have introduced the proposals to deal with the difficult issue of personation in Northern Ireland. The restrictions proposed in the Bill will be fully considered in Committee.

I should like to refer to the speech by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent. I can understand that he wanted to shore up the flimsy structure of the Opposition's case against the measure. His eloquence was considerable, and it is a privilege to participate in the debate with him. However, no amount of eloquence could disguise his somewhat mean-spirited approach to the Government's proposals and particularly towards my right hon. and learned Friend who, I suspect, he will find to be a more formidable figure than emerged with any clarity from his speech.

The right hon. Gentleman made three points. First, he suggested that it was part of the promotion of the narrow sectional interests of the Conservative party that the Bill was being introduced. I say once again — it bears repeating—that it is extremely difficult to equate that with the fact that the Bill contains the acceptance of 15 out of 22 recommendations of an all-party Select Committee of the House. Two of the seven that were not accepted are still under consideration because they relate to the public order law review that is going on.

The right hon. Gentleman lent his name and reputation to the suggestion that there has been no consultation. I do not suppose that he did so in the clear knowledge of the consultation exercise that I outlined, but I should be interested to know what consultation he believes could have gone beyond that. His answer might well be the Speaker's Conference, and he challenged us in round terms about why the Government had thrown it over. We accept that several important changes in electoral law this century have been preceded by a conference of all the parties, meeting under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker, but it is widely accepted that the Speaker's Conference has not been a satisfactory method of taking electoral law out of the political arena.

The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but perhaps I could quote two people to him. The first is Dr. David Butler, who said:

> "It is hard to see the virtues of a Speaker's Conference . . . They have not been good bodies, producing reports that command intellectual respect."

Your distinguished predecessor, Mr. Speaker, Lord Selwyn Lloyd, said after his experience — which he plainly did not enjoy — of chairing the 1972 to 1974 conference:

> "We were too large a body . . . it was difficult to assemble the necessary evidence . . . I was glad that no attempt was made to set up another Conference while I was Speaker."

Mr. Foot: Some of us have always believed that Select Committees should not have the final word of advice to the House of Commons on such matters. When the Government submitted evidence to the Select Committee, did they say, "We wish to make it clear that this is a substitute for the Speaker's Conference?"

Mr. Mellor: It was not necessary to do so. Before the right hon. Gentleman waxes too lyrical about a Speaker's Conference, he should be brought face to face with some of the facts that did not appear in his eloquent and passionate attack on the Government. He quoted to us the Labour Government's adherence to a Speaker's Conference, but I remind him of what happened in 1969 when there was a Speaker's Conference on a representation of the people Bill introduced by the Labour Government. The Conference recommended that the age for voting should be reduced from 21 to 20. What did the Labour Government — those respecters of Speaker's Conferences—do? They pushed through, in the teeth of opposition in the House, a voting age of 18.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It should be 16 years.

Mr. Mellor: I am glad to discover that the representative of teenagers is as eloquent as ever. I was not referring to the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent. Although the Speaker's Conference suggested that there should not be another hour of polling, the Labour Government imposed that extra hour. That is hardly good evidence of the Labour Government's adherence to the principles of a Speaker's Conference. Is it not rather hypocritical and canting to suggest that the Government should have had one in this case?

Mr. Foot: Is it not true that, much more recently than that, a major issue of changing the franchise was referred to a Speaker's Conference by the Labour Government? Is it the Government's policy not to have a Speaker's Conference on this matter, and when was that policy decided?

Mr. Mellor: I have just said that we are sceptical of it because of the way in which the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues played ducks and drakes with it. I should have thought that that was a straightforward matter.

As my right hon. and learned Friend said, there is no magic about the figure of £1,000 for the deposit. It is not as iniquitous as has been suggested. It emerged from the Select Committee, and the Labour party—in the person of its deputy leader — gave evidence to the Select Committee, proposing a figure of £600 with the threshold to remain unchanged. Our figure of £1,000 and a threshold reduced to 5 per cent. is not as outlandish as it has been made to appear during attacks in this debate. We are in no sense firmly wedded to a figure that would be unacceptable to the House, but we shall not be driven from it by people who said one thing a year ago and who are saying something completely different today. We shall consider carefully the many things that will be said in Committee.

This Bill, in place by the next election, could enfranchise as many as 3 million people. We estimate that, even on a cautious assessment of take-up rates, at least 1 million more people will vote next time who, without the measure, could not do so. This is a principled and important Bill which promotes the health of our democratic system. I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the motion relating to Ways and Means may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. —[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Representation of the People Bill ('the Act'), it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the charging on and payment out of the Consolidated Fund of—

(i) any expenses of any returning officer for an election of parish or community councillors which are attributable to the postponement of the election under the Act; and

(ii) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums charged on and paid out of that Fund under any other Act;

(b) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(i) any administrative expenses incurred by the Secretary of State by virtue of the Act; and

(ii) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

WAYS AND MEANS

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE

Resolved,

That any Act resulting from the Representation of the People Bill may repeal section 103(2) of the Representation of the People Act 1983 (vehicles used for conveyance to or from the poll exempted from duty etc.)—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Local Government

10.26 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): I beg to move,

That the draft Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 (Appointed Day) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 22nd November, be approved.

In this order, the Government seek the approval of the House for the cancellation of the GLC and metropolitan county council elections that would otherwise be held next May.

Despite the controversy which surrounded last Session's paving Bill, both Houses of Parliament agreed that it was right to put on the statute book what is now part II of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 — provision to suspend these elections subject to the approval by both Houses of an affirmative order to this effect. In other words, both Houses accepted the Government's view that it makes no sense to hold elections to councils which, if Parliament enacts the Local Government Bill, would only have 11 months to run. Never before has a whole council been elected for a term of less than a year.

Right from the outset, the Government made it clear that the order bringing part II of the paving Bill into force would not be made until this House had approved the main principle of abolition by giving a Second Reading to the Local Government Bill. This we did last week by a majority of 135.

The main purpose of this order is therefore to suspend these 1985 elections and to extend to 1 April 1986 the term of office of the existing councillors of the seven abolition authorities.

In the most unlikely event—that is the view which is now widely recognised as realistic — of the main abolition Bill failing to reach the statute book, the elections would be reinstated as swiftly as possible. Section 1(2) of the paving Act provides power to reinstate the elections by order, also subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. I have already given the House a firm commitment, which I am happy to repeat, that, if the main Bill falls, that order would be introduced as soon as it was practicable to do so. However, the House may share my view that, given the Government's clear manifesto commitment and last week's substantial Second Reading majority, that is most improbable. I am in no doubt that the Bill will be enacted. In those circumstances, it would be unnecessary and contrary to precedent for elections to the abolition authorities to be held next year.

This order will bring part II of the paving Act into force on 1 February 1985. Part II comprises two sections— section 2, which is concerned with the ordinary elections to the Greater London council and to the metropolitan county councils, and section 3, which is concerned with the quorum for meetings of those councils.

With effect from the coming into force of this order, section 2 of the Act suspends the ordinary elections of councillors of the GLC and MCCs and extends until 1 April 1986 the term of office of serving GLC and MCC councillors. Any councillor elected to fill a casual vacancy will likewise serve until 1 April 1986.

Section 2(3) adapts the rules for the filling of casual vacancies.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): In the event of there being a whole range of casual vacancies on the GLC, for example, may we have an assurance from the Secretary of State that the Conservative party will actually contest them?

Mr. Jenkin: I think that if the hon. Gentleman and his friends were so unwise as to engage in another series of electoral stunts they would meet with exactly the same debacle as last time, so I would not advise him to embark on that course.

The effect of section 2(3) is that a by-election to fill a vacancy arising on or after 1 October 1985 will not be held unless, when the vacancy occurs, the total number of unfilled vacancies exceeds one third of the total number of members. That is entirely in accordance with the normal rule that vacancies are not filled within six months before an election, although in this case, of course, the council will disappear.

Finally, section 2 amends the provisions made in the Local Government Act 1972 relating to the years in which elections to metropolitan district councils are held. This is a purely consequential amendment. The effect is to ensure that the cycle of metropolitan district elections continues undisturbed by the suspension of the metropolitan county council elections. The corresponding provisions of the 1972 Act in relation to the Greater London council are repealed by section 2(4).

I may be asked why 1 February has been chosen as the appointed day. The answer is that that allows a reasonable time for both Houses to give their approval to this order, while giving three months notice of cancellation of elections, which is sufficient time to avoid abortive expenditure and unnecessary work.

The cancellation of the 1985 elections was one of the major issues of debate during the passage of the paving legislation and I do not propose to repeat the arguments today. The reasons are simple. It would be a waste of expenditure and quite unprecedented to hold elections in circumstances where the councillors so elected would serve for less than a year. After much debate, both Houses of Parliament took this view. Indeed, it was reflected in the comments of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), whom I do not see in the Chamber, when he said:

"I can sympathise with the Secretary of State's claim that it would have been wasteful to hold elections. I fully realise that, but the natural thing to do in those circumstances is to let local authorities continue in existence for another year."[Official Report, 11 April 1984; Vol. 58, c. 469.]

That is precisely what part II of the paving Act does.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): How can the Secretary of State say with such confidence that if elections were allowed, as they ought to be, the councillors so elected would serve for less than 12 months? Does not that presuppose the decision of both Houses of Parliament?

Mr. Jenkin: I do not want to weary the House with tedious repetition, but if at any stage the main abolition Bill falls, the paving Act contains the power to reinstate those elections. I have given a categorical undertaking that, in that event, the order to effect that reinstatement would be presented as soon as might be possible. I do not take for granted the passage of the legislation. I have accepted — as many hon. Members and many people outside the House have accepted—that it is probable that the legislation will reach the statute book. That being so, it is quite unnecessary to hold the elections.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has raised the question of further by-elections. I find that most of those who called most loudly for the GLC elections are now remarkably silent on that issue.

Mr. Tony Banks: No. The right hon. Gentleman must wait and see.

Mr. Jenkin: On 20 September there was an attempt to hold four by-elections. It was forecast that Londoners would turn out in tens and fifties of thousands to vote for the pro-GLC candidates. People of all parties were supposed to flock to their banner. Those four stunt by-elections were the flops of the year. Compared with the results in 1981, 8,000 fewer people voted for the four Labour candidates. Less than one elector in five even took the trouble to register his vote for a Labour candidate. Where are the other stunt by-elections that were promised? They are as hard to find as a living dodo. I suspect that we have heard the last of them.

The order also brings section 3 of the paving Act into force. That is the section that allows the Secretary of State to prescribe a smaller quorum for meetings of the GLC or of an MCC. The present statutory quorum is one quarter of the whole number of members of the council. Section 3 allows the Secretary of State by order to reduce that number if he considers it necessary for the transaction of the business of the GLC or of a metropolitan county council. That order-making power is subjeect to the negative resolution procedure, and can be prayed against.

Ideally, this order would confine itself to elections. It should not be necessary to provide for the substitution of a smaller quorum. However, a number of councillors have been threatening to obstruct the will of Parliament. They would be in a position to bring their council's business to a standstill simply by refusing to attend council meetings. It is to safeguard against such sabotage that section 3 was included in the Act, enabling the quorum to be varied.

I have honoured the promise that I made on Second Reading. I have not sought to make the order to activate part II of the paving Act before the principle of abolition had been debated and approved by the House. It has now been approved by the Second Reading given to the Bill last week. It would be unjustifiable to delay any longer the coming into effect of the order. I ask the House to approve the appointed day order.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I have no hesitation in saying that we reject the Secretary of State's arguments for this order. As he well knows, he is creating a precedent in presenting this order. It is yet another precedent in a long and rather unenviable line of precedents that the right hon. Gentleman has set in local government legislation.

The order abolishes elections that would involve between 13 million and 14 million electors in the GLC and metropolitan county areas. The Secretary of State and his colleagues are taking away the votes of that many people and not, as has been the case in previous local government reorganisations, replacing them with votes for successor authorities. In no sense can the Secretary of State claim that, in producing the order and his arguments for it, he is following the precedent even of former Conservative Secretaries of State.

In spite of what the Secretary of State has said today, he is taking the decision of this House and that of another place for granted in assuming that the Local Government Bill, which recently received a Second Reading, will become law. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was not taking the House for granted but that he was confident that the Bill would be carried. If that is so, why does he not leave things as they are? Why does he have to bring the order to the House to abolish elections? He has no answer to either question. The reality, in spite of what he has just said about by-elections to the GLC, is that he, the House and the country know full well that he and his right hon. and hon. Friends are frightened of an expression of opinion through the ballot box by the people of London and the met counties. That would be a major test of public opinion on this issue.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): There has been one.

Dr. Cunningham: Well, I cannot believe that the way in which this measure was cobbled together at the last moment and stuffed into the Conservative party manifesto produced any real test of opinion. I do not believe that it featured highly in elections anywhere. On the contrary, it was hidden away. Perhaps I can ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he agrees with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who said last week that the commitment to abolish the GLC and the met counties was "put in nine days after the election was called against the wishes of the party policy committee." —[Official Report, 4 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 191.]

I invite the Secretary of State to say whether that is a true record of events.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who is not here to defend himself, might have had more inside knowledge of these matters that I do not share. All I know is that after many months of discussions, as I said last week, this matter was included by a decision of the Cabinet. If it is such anathema to the Labour party, how come the Labour party's Environment spokesman placed not one recorded word in any speech handout on this subject throughout the 1983 general election? Are we to believe that he did not read the manifesto? Did he not know all about it? Did he try to pretend that it did not exist?

Dr. Cunningham: Wriggle as the right hon. Gentleman will, he is not able to duck the charge that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup levelled at him and the Government that the commitment was shoved into the manifesto at the last possible moment without any proper consultation.

The right hon. Gentleman said that there were months of discussions. I invite him to tell the House who was involved in the discussions: certainly not leading Conservatives on the GLC group, certainly not the right hon. Gentleman's own representative on the GLC. As the right hon. Gentleman is only too well aware, they say very different things today.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): The hon. Gentleman prays in aid the statement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) — he has prayed in aid his statements on a number of occasions — that the policy was rushed through at the last minute against the wishes of the policy-making committee. Is he aware that the county of Humberside was created 10 years ago against the wishes of the people, in a plebiscite in which 85 per cent. of the people of south Humberside voted against its creation, when the Prime Minister was my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup?

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman seems to be arguing in favour of local choice and consultation. In my remarks I have said that there has been no consultation. Also there has been no proper inquiry or investigation into the nature of the proposals. Previously when elections to outgoing authorities, or authorities which have been wound up or which were disappearing, have been cancelled they have been balanced by the introduction of new elections to new successor authorities. That was the case in the 1974 election when existing councils ran in parallel with the new ones which were elected in 1973 until the changeover occurred.

It is absolutely wrong for the Secretary of State to claim, as he has claimed in the past although I noticed that he did not make the claim this evening, that he is following precedent in what he is doing with this order and the actions he is taking as a result of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984. The principle is quite different. It is one which we on this side of the House stand by: that local democratic accountability should be preserved. It would be far better for everybody concerned, including although he seems reluctant to agree, the reputation of the right hon. Gentleman, if in this case that principle were to be preserved.

The proposals put forward by the Government do not match up to any credible attempt either to reorganise local government properly in a non-partisan manner, or to take account or make any test of the opinions of the people who are affected by the change.

It should not be argued—indeed, it cannot be argued —that the changeover date should be seen as settled at this stage of the parliamentary process. That implies another assumption: that the Bill will go through as it stands unamended and in the time scale the Government envisage. Given the Government's experience of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, that is a very arrogant assumption for the right hon. Gentleman to make. He knows as well as we know that not only in the other place but in this House a significant number of his right hon. and hon. Friends are fundamentally opposed to what the Government are suggesting should happen. There is a bald assumption that everything will proceed just as the Government intend.

The West Midlands seems to be the only metropolitan county council for which re-warding has been completed. Therefore, the electoral arrangements are entirely different from those of the other metropolitan counties and the GLC. In that sense, two different wardings are likely to run in parallel — the existing ones and the new ones which result from the Boundary Commission changes which have been put into effect by an order made in 1982.

We must surely presume that if a by-election were to occur in the West Midlands after 2 May it would be held on the new ward basis. That is an anomalous state of affairs. The existing authority, elected on old wards, on old boundaries, is to continue in place but any by-election would apparently take place on new ward boundaries. Is that so?

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Government are well aware of that point. I shall be discussing it with my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, with whom responsibility in that matter rests. Proposals to deal with what the hon. Gentleman has perfectly fairly identified will be brought forward in good time before that boundary order takes effect.

Dr. Cunningham: That is just another example, along a road littered with such examples, of how little thought and proper preparation has been put into what the Government are proposing to do. Here again there is a glaring anomaly in the situation as proposed by the Government. It is not good enough to say to the House in the middle of this debate, only because the Labour party had been able to pick up the point, that the Government will respond. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman come to the House and explain it, since he obviously knew about the situation, and say what the Government's intentions were? That would have been a far better way to approach the matter than to have to respond to a question from the Opposition.

The longer the House looks at the Government's proposals and has the opportunity to examine them in detail, the clearer it is that the charges of not only the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup but of other Conservative Members, as well as people in the authorities themselves, are substantiated.

The Government's botched-up approach to local government reorganisation is a shambles. It is shot full of holes, contradictions, errors and matters which have not been properly thought out. The order is not necessary at this time. It is not necessary for the House to approve it. Perhaps it is a little too optimistic to say that nothing would go wrong for the Government, but if the order had not been presented and were not approved by the House it would not affect the Government's proposed timetable. Indeed, it would do something for the Secretary of State's reputation and for that of his right hon. and hon. Friends if it had not been presented at this time.

The order should not be approved now. The House should recommend the Secretary of State not to submit it until at least the Local Government Bill has received the Royal Assent. At that time only would it be necessary to abolish elections to the authorities and not before.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I support the order. It is entirely right that at this stage the order should come before the House, the House having formally given a Second Reading, with a large majority, to the Local Government Bill. It would be entirely wrong to suggest or imply that there would be an election for the GLC, with which I am more particularly concerned, when that authority has a life of only about 12 months ahead of it, the House having given a clear sign of its intentions.

There have been examples of elections being cancelled because of local government reform. I remind the House that there will be London borough elections in May 1986 when Londoners will have the opportunity to elect more than 1,000 councillors who will be responsible for running London's services and affairs. It is significant that in the reform of local government in London, of the remaining functions of the GLC 95 per cent. in cost terms will be transferred to the control of the elected borough councils.

Mention has been made of the desirability of testing public opinion. Such a test has already taken place in London. On 20 September this year there were four by-elections. It was the most boring of political experiences for the people of London. They were not interested in the elections. They did not participate to the extent of 75 per cent. not turning out to vote. It was significant that the leadership of the GLC had threatened Londoners with a number of by-elections. The GLC leader has clearly shown that the result of the by-elections was such that there was no point in continuing with them.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): While the hon. Gentleman is reflecting on the by-elections, will he tell us what the turn-out was in Westminister, North, what the vote was and why his Conservative association had to be strong-armed into not contesting it?

Mr. Wheeler: The hon. Gentleman knows the answer to that. He knows the arithmetic of the four by-elections. I shall repeat the results for the benefit of the House. About 25 per cent. turned out in the by-elections. In north Westminster it was slightly above that figure. That is not altogether surprising considering that the present leader of the GLC was the candidate in the division in Paddington and considering also the extent of the propaganda expenditure incurred in the run-up to the by-election.

I well recall that after the result was declared, every conceivable excuse was trotted out to account for the reason why the electorate did not turn out to vote. It was said to be raining, a bad register and so on. It was raining during the GLC election in 1981, when the turn-out in the same division was 44 per cent. The electorate found the whole by-election issue extremely tedious and did not participate.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): I know that the hon. Gentleman would wish to be fair to the House. Will he give as a comparison the national figures in the general election if no Conservative candidate had stood?

Mr. Wheeler: I shall not be tempted down that road. We are concerned with an order that is perfectly reasonable and desirable in view of the expression of the House on the Local Government Bill, before us a few days ago.

We must bear in mind the cost implications of by-elections. It would be wholly inappropriate to spend hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of pounds of ratepayers' money merely to return a council which, in the case of London, would have 12 months or less to serve. I believe that the order should be supported and I shall vote for it tonight.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I must declare an interest as a Londoner whose vote is being taken away, but that is not why I wish to address the House. As far as I can make out, this is the first time in our history when a Government have reduced the franchise. There have been reorganisations in the past of one kind and another, but tonight we are being asked to take away the votes of those who previously enjoyed them.

The Secretary of State, who speaks of votes as if they could be calculated in terms of efficiency alone or common sense in terms of a better way of organising things, appears to forget that votes were won in this country not by the grace and favour of successive Governments, but by systematic public campaigns, and systematic campaigns of law breaking to win the rights that we have. I am referring historically to that. The right to worship as we wish was won against laws passed by Parliament that sought to impose uniformity on methods of worship; the rights of trade unions were won by systematic law-breaking of the Combination Acts; the rights of working class men were won after riots and disturbances, led by the Chartists, had been forced on a very unwilling House of Commons and an exceptionally reluctant House of Lords. The Prime Minister would not be in her position as a voter, a Member of Parliament or Prime Minister if the suffragettes had not systematically broken the law, chained themselves to the railings, been imprisoned, force-fed, released and then rearrested under the infamous cat and mouse Act that was passed during the lifetime of many present tonight.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The right hon. Gentleman is being dramatic and seems to be inciting people to break the law. Will he answer this question? Since the environment spokesman of his party, the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), argued in favour of unitary authorities, and since that would have meant elections to but one level of government, is it not inevitable, beyond peradventure, that precisely the same process would have taken place—that there would have been a reduction in the number of elections held for layers of local government?

Mr. Benn: The right hon. Gentleman only confirms my long suspicion that he does not understand the impact of his own Bill, because he is taking executive power from elected people and using the prerogative — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Yes, indeed. We are discussing not the other legislation, but the power to abolish the Inner London education authority by statutory instrument. The Secretary of State is using the prerogative of the Crown and taking power from elected people. That is a wholly different matter from the reorganisation of the structure of local government.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: Many hon. Members want to speak. I am putting a point to the House. I have not intervened before——

Mr. Tracey rose——

Mr. Benn: If the hon. Gentleman has a serious point, I shall try to answer it.

Mr. Tracey: Indeed, I have a serious point to put to the right hon. Gentleman. His right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is on record, on the point about unitary authorities, as saying that if his party were elected in the general election on that policy it would proceed with no more Royal Commissions and no more reviews, but direct to legislation. That was said by the right hon. Member for Gorton. Will the right hon. Gentleman comment on it?

Mr. Benn: I dealt with the point in answering the Secretary of State's question. The issue, as the hon.

Gentleman knows very well, is the removal of powers from the elected local authorities to the Executive using the prerogative of the Crown, in some cases without having to come back to the House of Commons at all.

The point that I want to make is that if the Secretary of State, who is introducing the order, were to study our history, he would find that the pressure for democratic rights was not an abstract pressure. It was not that anybody thought that elections in themselves were of value; it was the consequence of the extension of the franchise that people wanted to see. In 1832, 1867, 1884, 1918 and in subsequent Bills, the enlargement of the franchise brought much-valued social progress. Those who remember—some are still alive—what the House of Commons was like before women were granted the vote—which was only in 1918—will remember that in those days, when Members of Parliament were answerable only to male constituents, women's issues and rights got short shrift in Parliament.

If one considers local democracy, it is clear that, as it spread, health, education, housing and transport became much improved. I have with me—it may have been cited previously—the development of the city council in Birmingham from 1838, when the municipal charter was granted: 1842, the police force; 1861 the public library; 1867, the art gallery; 1870, the school board; 1872, the first medical officer of health; 1874, the first municipal hospital; 1875, the city took over the supply of gas; 1875, the fire brigade; 1876, the water supply; 1890, the first municipal houses; 1898, the supply of electricity; 1904, its own tramways; 1908, maternity and child welfare; 1916, municipal savings; 1919, the orchestra; and 1939, the municipal airport. All those things were made possible by the extension of the franchise. It is no good saying that the GLC has no functions left, because the Government have removed those functions. They have performed a characteristic administrative trick of destroying the functions of an elected body and then describing it as unnecessary.

The public must understand clearly that this is not an administrative reorganisation. The Secretary of State is committed to the destruction of the services provided by local government, and therefore he has chosen to attack the democratic institutions that provide them. That is what this is about. It has nothing whatever to do with the need for a better organisation. I forget whether the Secretary of State was a member of the Government who set up the GLC, but I was a Member of Parliament at the time. There was no argument then about the need for those services; there was an argument about how they could best be provided. No one outside should believe that we are having a limited debate about how best to run local services. The Government wish to cut services as part of their central economic policy. This is a by-product of their economic and social policies and has nothing to do with the better government of London or the metropolitan counties.

I give a special warning to another place, and in doing so I differentiate myself momentarily from Ken Livingstone's notice on County hall. I did not agree with his slogan, "Peers, Thank you for saving democracy in London." It may be tactically useful to the GLC to butter up some bishops and wangle some wets into voting against the legislation, but the Lords have never believed in democracy. I searched through all the debates on the Reform Bills last century to find the best quotation from the House of Lords on the democratic process, and I offer to the House a quotation from a dissent to the Third Reading of the Reform Act 1867, which was registered.

The grounds for the dissent are stated clearly. The first was:

"Because the Bill, creating in almost every City and Borough in England a new Constituency more numerous than that which exists, impairs, where it does not destroy, the power of the present Electors, and substitutes for it that of a new Body inferior to them in Property and Education."

The second reason was:

"Because the Confidence justly placed in Constituencies of approved Worth cannot reasonably be transferred to such Men now first entrusted with electoral Power; and it is to be feared that when Labour makes laws for Capital, Poverty for Property, legislation, no longer directed by educated Intelligence, will impair the individual Freedom of Action and the Security of Possession which have been the Foundations of our Prosperity and Wealth."

I warn Ken Livingstone not to put too much hope in the other place, for it has never believed in democracy. It is half filled with hereditary peers, and padded out with the patronage of successive Prime Ministers.

If the other place passes this order, which will go to it soon, let me remind it of another Act of Parliament, passed on 19 March 1649. It is an Act to abolish the House of Peers, passed by the House of Commons. It is one of the Acts of the interregnum. I shall read it for the benefit of the other place, because I think that the peers are more likely to be influenced by this than by another lunch with the campaigners for the preservation of the GLC. It begins "The Commons of England". I doubt whether those words have been uttered in the House since then, so let me remind those who have forgotten what they are:

"The Commons of England assembled in Parliament, finding by too long experience, that the House of Lords is useless and dangerous to the People of England to be continued, have thought fit to Ordain and Enact, and be it Ordained and Enacted by this present Parliament, and by the Authority of the same, That from henceforth the House of Lords in Parliament, shall be and is hereby wholly abolished and taken away; And that the Lords shall not from henceforth meet or sit in the said House called The Lords House, or in any other House or Place whatsoever, as a House of Lords; nor shall Sit, Vote, Advise, Adjudge, or Determine of any matter or thing whatsoever, as a House of Lords in Parliament."

That was clearer legislation than that introduced by the Secretary of State. If a non-elected House takes away the votes of the people of Britain, it signs its own death warrant the day that it does so. Nobody should have any illusions about that.

I shall now relate the order to the wider attack. We are always told by the Tory party that the proper way to get our rights is to vote. However, when the GLC was elected on a cheap fares policy, the Government wheeled out Lord Denning from the chamber of horrors, and he said that that manifesto was illegal. Now that that has been amended, they wheel out a Bill to abolish the GLC. No Tory Members should try to tell the British people, certainly not Londoners or those who live in the metropolitan counties, that they are prepared to see change made by democratic means, because they are not. The attack by rate-capping, the introduction of quangos—which is only the Royal prerogative reappearing in the modern language of adminstration—the use of ministerial fiats, the abolition of trade unionism at GCHQ, sequestration by the courts and the national police force are designed to crush all opposition to the Government of the day.

That is why the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) expresses his doubts. No doubt, if one could get him into a Sub-Committee, one would have an interesting discussion about some of the managerial problems that we are told we are discussing. But he knows what we know—that the Tory party, by reverting to a principle that has not illuminated its thinking for many centuries, is trying to crush all opposition, however expressed.

I say seriously that if those rights, which were never granted graciously from the top, but were won by law breaking from underneath, are taken away, that will be an open invitation to return to law breaking as a means of winning back rights that the Government are taking away. If that happens, although I believe that the Prime Minister will not be allowed by her party to get away with it—for it is only with the party that the capacity to remove her now rests—everything that flows from the clutch of policies, of which this is one, will be the responsibility of the Prime Minister, the Cabinet and every hon. Member who votes for the order tonight, and any peer who votes for it when it reaches the other place. This is a very much graver matter than can be settled by an exchange of witticisms, comments or even quotations from other people's speeches on other occasions.

Tonight, the House is being asked to reverse its own history, and, in so far as it does, it should recognise that putting the clock back is a package deal that has other consequences. This, and other measures, will reawaken the determination of the British people to govern themselves and not to be told what to do by Ministers cloaking themselves in prerogative in order to destroy the rights of those they were elected to represent.

Mr. William Shelton (Streatham): I tried to follow the speech of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), but I had some difficulty. I think that he is in some confusion when he speaks of enlargement of the franchise. If he considers the examples that he gave from the last century he will find—or if he asks his researcher, he will no doubt tell him—that the references are to giving votes to those who did not have them. That is the usual meaning of the phrase, "enlargement of the franchise".

The order proposes not to take away votes from those who have them, but to take away a vote from those who at present have three, so that they then have two. However, if the right hon. Gentleman looks at the motion, he will see that there will be an additional vote for the Inner London education authority and so, hey presto, there will be three again. Therefore, I cannot accept the right hon. Gentleman's assertion that to take away a vote from those who have three is an incitement to violence. I cannot believe that most hon. Members follow the right hon. Gentleman in that.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): During the past year there has been a great deal of complaint from Conservative Members that people have votes in local elections when they do not pay rates. The implication has been—and it has been mentioned by Conservatives outside the House—that those who do not pay rates should not have votes in local elections. Is that the hon. Gentleman's view?

Mr. Shelton: No. Like the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is completely confused.

My point is that the quotations about the enlargement of the franchise referred to giving votes to those who did not have them. But the motion takes away a vote for the GLC from those who have the vote for local councils and for Parliament, and gives—if the right hon. Gentleman so wishes—a vote for ILEA. That is not, in any normal sense, a restriction of the franchise. The right hon. Gentleman was also deeply confused when he spoke about a centralisation of powers. I am sure that he has read the Bill, so I shall remind him that on abolition of the GLC—if that is what the House decides—all the services provided by it alone, or together with the boroughs, will pass to the boroughs—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—with a few exceptions.

I shall list those exceptions. First, there is ILEA. There will be an increase in representation with regard to ILEA, because we shall now be able to vote directly for that body. Then there is London Transport, which has already become London Regional Transport, and the recommendation concerning that was made by an all-party Select Committee. I agree that the fire service will involve a joint board, but of borough members. Flood protection is of tremendous national importance and responsibility for that will go to the Thames water authority. There are historic buildings, ancient monuments and the arts. But the arts will be dealt with mainly by the boroughs. If anyone calls that a centralisation of powers that will lead to violence in the streets, he is deeply confused.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Is not the hon. Gentleman aware that by the time all these quangos, joint boards and other devices are put into effect, 67 per cent. of the services now run by the metropolitan county councils will come under the Secretary of State's jurisdiction?

Mr. Shelton: No new quango is being formed, one new joint board is to be formed. I am talking about the GLC. I do not have sufficient knowledge to talk about the metropolitan counties. When I was a member of the GLC about 15 years ago I thought that it had come to the end of its useful life.

The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) referred to my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) saying that the legislation was hastily cobbled together. I have no idea whether it was or was not, because I am not in the Cabinet. If my right hon. Friend tells me that the proposals were agreed by the Cabinet I believe him.

It is strange that the 1983 alliance manifesto proposes "abolishing one of the existing tiers of local government". which will "inevitably involve the eventual abolition of the Metropolitan Counties, and the GLC."

Was that purely by chance and cobbled up overnight? Even the Socialists in "Labour's Programme 1982" say:

"The main difficulties of the present system are clear enough. There is an irrational split of functions between the two tiers . . . a confusing overlap of responsibilities".

In a typically Socialist way that expresses a dilemma but does not suggest any way to solve it. At least the Conservatives and the alliance gave a pledge.

It is said that no referendum was held. In the 1983 election the Conservatives won 56 out of 84 London seats.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not wish to mislead the House, but like many of his colleagues who quoted from the alliance manifesto he left out a sentence. That sentence referred to the proposals to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties:

"against the background of our proposals for the development of regional government."

There is a difference between replacing authorities and putting nothing in their place, as the Government propose.

Mr. Shelton: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Nevertheless the alliance was unhappy with the present system of local government and proposed to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

I was a member of the GLC between 1967 and 1970. Even then its powers had been eroded. When I mentioned the centralisation of powers a moment ago, I wonder if the right hon. Member for Chesterfield was aware of how many powers the GLC today operates alone, without the co-operation of the boroughs. It operates about four such powers. One could say more if one included for instance the collection of information. Very few people know that it operates only four such powers. The only powers of importance that the GLC exercises today without borough co-operation are the fire service, waste disposal, land drainage and building control—not for the whole of London; just for Inner London.

I applaud the Government's decision. Having decided to abolish the GLC, what do we do about elections in May 1985, which will be less than 12 months before abolition, should the House so decide? There are three choices. The first is to let the elections go ahead.

I understand entirely why some Labour Members relished the thought of elections going ahead, but I am surprised that they still take that view after Labour's miserable showing in the four by-elections that took place. Those who say that the elections should go ahead, to be regarded as some form of referendum, are doing as much damage to our constitution and the House as the right hon. Member for Chesterfield seemed to believe that the GLC's abolition would do to Britain's peace and tranquility. Quite apart from the cost and the fact that councillors would have been in office for less than a year, there are precedents to support the Government's position. In 1963-64, for example, local elections were cancelled with the reorganisation of local government.

Mr. Sidney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): Surely the essence of the argument is that the House has not yet decided to abolish the GLC. The hon. Gentleman should address his mind to that.

Mr. Shelton: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening, he would have heard me say "should the House so decide" to abolish the GLC. If he checks Hansard, he will find that I said that.

One of the benefits of a good Government is that it plans ahead. This motion is another example of a good Conservative Government planning what should happen in a year's time or two years' time. The Opposition should welcome this demonstration of careful planning.

The first possibility was to let elections take place. The second was to extend the term of the present councillors. The third was to install a provisional council formed by members of the borough councils. Initially, the Government recommended the third plan. It is a sign of the Government's flexibility and genuine readiness to engage in consultation that they changed their plan and took the second course.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Is my hon. Friend not under-rating somewhat an event that took place not so very far from this place?

Mr. Shelton: I accept that it is difficult for Labour Members to realise that the Government are prepared to consult. I remind them that they did so on the composition of the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my hon. Friend please acknowledge that there was an element of force majeure in what the Government had to do in that the other place decided contrary to what Her Majesty's Government intended?

Mr. Shelton: I remind my hon. Friend that the Government's decision on ILEA reflected pure, voluntary good will. It had been decided that ILEA should be a joint board of borough councillors. That was known as the Marshall solution, following the recommendations of the Marshall inquiry. However, they changed their mind to go along with majority feeling and decided that there should be direct elections. This new election should reassure Labour Members that the franchise is not being eroded.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The hon. Gentleman will surely remember that the Secretary of State for Education and Science said that he reinstated ILEA because of the overwhelming feeling on the issue and the arguments. It was not a matter of good will. The right hon. Gentleman said that the reinstatement was due to the convincing nature of the arguments for taking that course. Why does the same test not apply on this issue? The feeling is similar and the arguments against the Government's policy are equally overwhelming.

Mr. Wilkinson: We have not had the arguments.

Mr. Shelton: As my hon. Friend says, we have not had the arguments. I confess that, on balance, I favoured a joint board. I was wrong, and I believe that the Government were right to change their mind. I think that it is right to have direct elections. I have some doubts about having a single-purpose elected local authority, because there will not be the necessary conflict between competing claims for funds as, for example, in local government and central Government, and there may be some difficulty as a result. I look forward to the ILEA elections. I wish that they would take place in 1985 rather than 1986. I do not like the transition period. However, I am afraid that it is inevitable. There is little or no way of getting the measure through without that transition period.

It is time that I gave way to allow other hon. Members to participate in the debate. I support the order, because it is right. When we look back in five or 10 years the Government's decision will be vindicated. For some 15 years, I have thought that the GLC should be abolished, and I am glad to vote for this measure.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): The major objection to the order——

Mr. Robert C. Brown: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I certainly would not dare to suggest that I should insist on the right of any hon. Member to be called, but I draw your attention to this fact: if we include the Front Bench speakers and the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), who has just been called, so far in this debate five London Members and one provincial Member—my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) — will have been called. Hon. Members representing the Tyne and Wear county council area, Merseyside and other metropolitan county council areas are present. I suggest seriously, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that those hon. Members will feel a sense of outrage if this continues to be a London debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I am sharply aware of the hon. Member's point. Obviously I must take many factors into account in determining which hon. Members I should call. I shall, of course, bear in mind the hon. Member's comments.

Mr. Cartwright: The major objection to the order is that it abolishes elections to authorities that Parliament has not yet decided to abolish. The hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) may regard that as planning ahead; I think that most people would regard it as total arrogance.

The fact is that this order was not planned all that far ahead. We all know that we are debating this order because of the actions of the other place, where last summer the Government moved an amendment to the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Bill producing this affirmative order procedure. They did so under pressure of criticism that they were abolishing elections even before a Second Reading debate in this House. When the amendment from the other place was debated in this House on 30 July this year, only the alliance and our occasional allies, the hon. Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Tooting (Mr. Cox) voted against the amendment; the official Labour party abstained.

The reasons for the alliance's decision to vote against the affirmative order procedure to abolish elections were outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who criticised that procedure which allowed no amendment. My hon. Friend quoted the case of Conservative Members who supported the principle of abolition, but believed that the Government would make a mess of the drafting of the Bill, which clearly they have done. My hon. Friend said that such hon. Members might "suggest that there are particular and detailed objections to the Bill that arise not from total opposition to its intentions and basic provisions."

My hon. Friend said that those hon. Members might not wish at that time to approve the order. He went on:

"I do not want this to come as a surprise to those people, which is why I underline it now. They will find that there is nothing that they can do to the commencement order."—[Official Report, 30 July 1984; Vol. 65, c. 39.]

That is one of our objections to the procedure. There is no room for amendment — no opportunity for hon. Members who have reservations about the abolition Bill to amend the Bill.

The House is being asked to agree a procedure over which it has virtually no power. There are hon. Members, including those on the Conservative Back Benches, who may wish to amend the abolition Bill in a variety of ways. Some of them have already put their names to substantive amendments which will be debated on Wednesday and Thursday. At present there is no way in which any of us can be sure what form the abolition Bill will finally take.

There is an amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) and some of his hon. Friends which calls for a new scaled-down authority to replace the GLC. If that amendment is passed, or receives substantial support, which leads to a modification of the Minister's plans, or if a similar amendment is carried in another place some months hence, then the Bill with which we shall have to deal will be different from the one with which we are now concerned.

The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) rightly reminded us that one only has to remember the saga of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Bill 1984. It started life as one type of Bill but ended up as a different type. The Bill that left this House on 22 May was designed to cancel elections and set up interim bodies. It had one minor financial clause only. The Bill which returned to this House from the other place on 30 July had a different purpose — to extend the life of the councils and to introduce major financial restrictions on their autonomy. The Bill was changed out of all recognition. The Bill accepted by the House of Commons on Second Reading was different from the Bill which was finally enacted. On that basis, none of us can be sure of the final form of the Local Government Act.

It is, in my judgment, wrong and arrogant for the Government to seek to force through the order tonight. It should be left until after clause 1 has been debated on Wednesday and Thursday.

I do not often these days agree with the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), but I agree with him when he says that the order will lead to the biggest reduction in the franchise since 1832. Every previous Bill enacted in the House dealing with elections has extended the franchise or left it the same, all the way through from the great Reform Bill 1832 until the Bill given a Second Reading today which extends the franchise to those people who are on holiday and those resident overseas.

It is ironic that on the day on which the House of Commons has agreed, in principle, to extend the franchise to 500,000 more people it should go on to be asked to approve an order which deprives 40 per cent. of the electorate of their right to vote in next May's county council elections. That would not be so bad if the other 60 per cent. of the electorate also lost that power, because it would be a move to one-tier local government throughout the country. It would not be a reduction of democracy but a consolidation of two votes into one.

It would not be so bad if the bodies which were to take over the functions of the GLC and the metropolitan counties were all elected. No one will directly elect the London fire and civil defence boards; no one will vote in the election of the London Planning Commission; no votes will be cast in the election of joint boards for waste disposal, although all those bodies are taking powers away from a directly elected body in London. On the same basis, no one will vote for joint boards for police, fire and transport which will remove many of the functions of the directly elected metropolitan county councils.

The order will deprive a large section of the population of its vote. Electors in London and the metropolitan counties will not have a vote on 2 May 1985 even though electors outside those areas will be voting for authorities that provide many similar services.

The order will also have an effect on councillors who were elected in 1981 for a four-year term. There are likely to be by-elections next May, not for the political reasons that caused the by-elections in Grater London, but because people who were elected for four years have planned their lives on that basis and did not expect and should not be ecpected to carry on for a further year.

If the Government believe what they say—that there is genuine public support for their abolition plans—they should let the elections go ahead. They should put their fate in the ballot box and allow a new Greater London council and new metropolitan county councils to be elected. That would be much better than trying to coerce existing members to continue in office. The order is a shabby measure with the smell of gerrymandering about it. We shall vote against it.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): When one listens to a lesson in history from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) one has the impression that history itself is speaking. One of the sad things about the order is that it has given him a degree of credibility that he would not have had if we were not seeking to pass this somewhat shabby and disreputable measure.

I believe that this will constitute an unhappy precedent for our party. It would have been better and wiser to secure the enactment of the Local Government Bill first and then to take the necessary steps to abrogate the Greater London Council elections. That would have been the correct and wise chronology. I fear that the legislation on which we are embarked and which is to be debated on Wednesday and Thursday will prove as unhappy an experience for the Conservative Government as the devolution Bill proved for the Labour Government. That is not the subject of this debate, but it is indeed an unhappy measure.

I also believe that the road to political condemnation is paved with the consciences of my right hon. and hon. Friends. I did not vote against the paving Bill, but now —unlike then—we know what the Local Government Bill contains. We know that it arrogates even more centralised power to the Secretary of State and that it will lead to the creation and proliferation of quangos, joint boards and other bodies on which borough councillors will serve although they were not elected to do so and may not have the necessary time or qualifications. But that is for another day.

I suspect that the Government, with their very big majority, may succeed in laying the body politic of the Greater London council to rest, but I fear that its spectre will rise to haunt us. In the future, anything that goes wrong with London's governance will be laid at our door and if the Labour party ever returns to power — unfortunately, these things sometimes happen—it may use this precedent to do away with elections of far greater import than those due to take place next spring.

Mr. Tony Banks: We are democrats.

Mr. Wilkinson: Labour Members may shake their heads now, and I am glad that they do, but I suspect that my fear may well prove to be justified.

Many Members of this House would have the other place do our work for us. That has been a growing tendency of this Parliament, but I shall not resort to it. If my conscience dictates on behalf of my constituents that the amendment of the coming legislation requires a vigorous and critical approach I shall pursue such an approach, and if I judge this order to be unworthy I shall act accordingly. My action today will be to abstain because I do not believe that the measure merits passage.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I oppose the order for the cancellation of the 1985 elections for the GLC and metropolitan county councils. My theme will be similar to that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). Any remarks that I may make about Conservative Members should be understood not to include the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). The hon. Gentleman will understand why.

The order is one more step on the road to dictatorship. Centralisation is now on its way, and dictatorship will certainly follow. This is a time when much frustration is being caused because an insensitive Government do not understand the problems of the provinces or the inner cities, or the pressures of unemployment. At such a time, the Government are bringing in even more legislation to curtail the freedom of the individual. The nation is already divided. Trade union legislation is crushing the fundamental rights of trade unionists to defend and represent themselves. Millions face unemployment for the rest of their lives. The arm of the law is used to suppress democratic rights and to do the dirty work of central Government. The Government are continuing to remove any opposition to their views, and putting pressure on people by imprisonment, various forms of restriction, bankruptcy and force. The Government are now taking the final step—the removal of the right to vote. That is why I oppose the order, and that is why there is so much frustration and despair in the country.

Why do the Government not address themselves to the real issues and evils of the present day? Why do they not try to stop the rot in our industries? Why do they not try to bring back hope to those in despair? Why do they not use the good offices of local government, which not only upholds local democracy but contributes directly through services, the stimulation of jobs, care and understanding. When there are so many problems everywhere, why, instead of helping people and using the good offices of local government, do the Government remove the one element that clearly has served its purpose very well?

No one says that the system is perfect. No one says that there is no room for change. What the people say is, "For God's sake, do not remove the one area of democratic control where we can make ourselves heard through the ballot box." If the people do not like something, they can remove it. That is not a job for central Government. That is what my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield was saying.

Governments can change things, but they should not remove something just because it happens to be a thorn in their side and obstructs policies that the people recognise as insensitive. Sooner or later, the price must be paid.

Why not use central Government to stimulate the economy to protect freedom, and to allow local people to have their say through the ballot box?

I have been worried by some of the comments made by Tory Ministers and Back Benchers. They talk about democracy. They may think that by defending the Government they are defending democracy. I suggest that they are betraying democracy, and that it is time that they had the guts to stand up and fight.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): It is perhaps not unusual that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) should forget that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) has had a provincial reincarnation and that his speech was not relevant to the debate. It was much more a repetition of the farrago of words that we have had during the past few months, based on the unreal world in which he dwells. His speech had little or nothing to do with local government or the order.

I am a realist and I know that the Bill will pass through this House and another place [Interruption.] It will do so for two reasons. First, the Bill was in our general election manifesto.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you remind the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) that we are discussing an order and not a Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will relate his remarks to the order.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I have done so, but it was difficult with the noise of Opposition Members, for you to hear that the order arises out of the Bill.

Hon. Members: No, it does not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House has dealt with the Bill. We are now dealing with the order.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: As I said, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said three times that the order arises because the House has given the Bill a Second Reading. The order and the Bill—the two are inseparably linked, but I shall speak merely about the order — will pass through both Houses because there is a principle, which has been enshrined for many years in another place, that legislation which appears in a party's manifesto is not blocked by another place. That happened several times when there was a Conservative majority in another place —which there is not now—and a Labour Government.

There is one advantage in the extra year that will result from the order and the extension of the term of office of members of the GLC—we shall have more time to see Mr. Livingstone in action. We shall have more time to hear him join his allies, the Palestine Liberation Organisation and Sinn Fein, and give him more time perhaps to apoligise for having called Jews Fascists. His calling the Board of Deputies of British Jewry Fascist is the biggest racial insult that I have heard during my public life. [HON. MEMBERS: "When did he do that?"] In an interview on Monday 10 December. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will refer that speech to his national executive and call for the expulsion of that member for such language.

I have dealt with the reality and shall now deal with what the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said. He said that there are significant numbers of Conservative Members who might not support the order or the Bill. He made a mistake. There might be a number of significant Members, but there is not a significant number of Members. Many who have said that they do not like the order will recall that they said that they wanted to abolish the GLC in their manifestos. As this order flows from it, it is important to recognise that fact.

Mr. Wilkinson: Would my hon. Friend agree that there need be no conflict between a desire to abolish the GLC and an equal wish to see an appropriate, directly elected, slimmed-down body in its place and that it is perfectly reasonable to oppose this order since it pre-empts the will of Parliament? It is that which sticks in most people's craws, to use that most unparliamentary expression.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: My hon. Friend is entitled to his view. I merely recall that the democratically elected council in the area he serves has specifically called not merely for abolition but for no directly elected body to replace it. That is the view of most people who follow these matters very carefully.

Mr. Corbyn: While the hon. Member is dwelling on this point, would he care to tell the House what the member of the Greater London council and the Inner London education authority from Hampstead thinks about the abolition Bill and the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I said when I spoke on Second Reading, and I repeat it in the context of the order, that Mr. Alan Greengross is wholly and totally committed to the abolition of the Greater London council, as stated in the election manifesto. That is a fact that I have reconfirmed with him, following the intervention of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) last week.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Not again, no. In 1967 elections were due for the London borough councils. It was the Labour party, supported by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, then representing Bristol, South-East, who postponed those elections for one year — and postoned them very clearly for political advantage. On this occasion the order we are being asked to pass is being put forward because it would be the height of stupidity to have an election for the very limited period for which electors would be asked to vote. We need to realise that, even with £10 million worth of propaganda, four phoney GLC by-elections got under 30 per cent. of the voters out to vote. I recall also——

Mr. Tony Banks: Could I inform the hon. Member that the amount of money that the GLC has spent so far in this financial year on its advertising programme is not £10 million but £4·8 million. Last year it was £1·4 million. The projection for next year is £1·2 million. Could we have correct figures?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: We have the figure of £10 million directly and indirectly spent on political propaganda, including phoney adverts by an organisation called GLEB. May I remind the House that at the general election in 1979 my opponent was a certain Mr. Kenneth Livingstone and that he was seen off from Hampstead. My opponent in 1983 was a certain Mr. McDonnell, and he was seen off from Hampstead, too. I appreciate that there are many problems connected with local government outside London and I am sure we shall hear more about them during the debate this evening on the order. I am sure that the House would not expect me to talk about the problems of areas such as the Socialist republic of south Yorkshire. That can be well done by Labour Members.

We are being asked today to act in a sense of realism. The Bill has been given its Second Reading and has therefore properly persuaded my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to bring forward the order. He clearly does not intend to put all the electors of Greater London and the six metropolitan counties through the farce of an election. It does not matter if the political parties have to spend their money, but why should the ratepayers have to spend money on elections for a period so short as to be meaningless.

My right hon. Friend is right. The general public, who have begun to see through the barrage of propaganda, now realise that the organisations for which they were being asked to vote have no real functions and no real purpose. Conservative-controlled local councils throughout London, all of which, without exception, have said that they want abolition, all of which want the powers as rapidly as possible, and none of which want a directly elected replacement, are right, and my right hon. Friend is right, to ask for the order to be passed tonight.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): It is fair to say that the House is getting used to seeing constitutional monstrosities coming before it, as the Government, with their enormous majority, tread down elected representatives of the people on both sides of the Chamber.

Tonight's measure can only be described as a constitutional outrage, a constitutional obscenity, a constitutional disgrace or a constitutional scandal. No matter how hard Ministers try to tart up this tatty order —I have no doubt that the Minister will do that when he replies—there is no way that the Minister or any Conservative Member can deny that tonight we are embarking on a serious precendent. As the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) so rightly said, it is a dangerous precedent that the Government may well come to regret, although not for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman suggested.

The Government cannot deny that no Administration has ever had cause to deprive the British people, or a major part of it, of what is in any language their inalienable democratic right to vote for an administration of their choice through the ballot box at a local election, which would have been in May next year, without a major Bill already on the statute book, and included in the Bill the reason for the abolition or postponement of an election.

Let no one forget that, had it not been for the action of their Lordships in the other place, my constituents in Newcastle upon Tyne, North would have been ruled until 1986 by nominated Tory councillors, or, to be fastidiously correct, by councillors nominated by a Tory Minister. Indeed, as things stand, a major part of Britain's electors is to be lumbered with an administration which it may or may not wish to continue in office for a further year. Only the ballot box could determine the true wishes of the electorate in Greater London and the metropolitan county councils.

The Secretary of State has waxed eloquently about the months of discussion in committees in the Tory party prior to the general election last year, when this issue became an election manifesto commitment. I find it extremely difficult to believe that the major issue in this Parliament —and the Minister must concede that—should find a place in the manifesto nine days after the election was declared. Are we to believe a former Tory Prime Minister? I am sure that no one in the House would be so unworthy as to suggest that the word of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) should be doubted. If we believe him, this pledge was thrust into the manifesto after the election was declared. It is difficult to believe that a major Government commitment was not in the draft manifesto long before the election was declared. In any event, without wishing to be offensive to any of the Tory Front Bench, I would prefer to accept the word of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup than that of anyone sitting on the Treasury Bench.

There is no valid reason for the abolition of the Tyne and Wear county council other than sheer, unadulterated political spite. The electors of Tyne and Wear will not take kindly to having their democratic rights nicked, stolen —call it what we may—for any reason other than that they have persisted in voting Labour since a previous Tory Government gave birth to the metropolitan county councils.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood referred to the dangerous precedent of the abolition of elections. He suggested that a future Labour Government might use this dangerous precedent to abolish general elections. Perish the unworthy thought of the hon. Gentleman. However, that thought had not escaped my mind. Several months ago I wrote to the Secretary of State protesting about the proposal. In a lengthy letter I posed the question of the evils of the abolition Bill. I asked what guarantee had the electorate that in 1988, with a Tory Government who were so desperately unpopular that they would clearly lose the election, they would not use their massive majority to push through a Bill to postpone the general election using the argument that they would be saving the country from a dangerous Marxist Labour authority.

12.8 am

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): There is a rumour that the Government will distribute an official Christmas present this year. Labour Members do not believe it because we all know that they are too mean. However, the rumour is that it will be a deck of playing cards made out of sandpaper for all the people to whom they have given a rough deal. That means all those in London and the metropolitan counties who have had their votes taken away.

This order is all about dogma before democracy. The Government are so obsessed with their dogma of cuts, and their political vendetta against local authorities and the GLC, that they are prepared to abolish elections to further that obsession. The Government are increasing public spending in several areas—for example, on Trident, and the waste there, Fortress Falklands, the British Telecom City bonanza, the cost of the coal industry strike, which they have described as a worthwhile investment, and the dole money paid under their unemployment strategy. They are spending public money when it suits them and wasting it when it suits them. However, the wastage has to be paid for through cuts in social services, education, housing and other factors in local authority budgets. Then they have the nerve to say that there is no alternative. That is absolutely ludicrous when the priorities are put side by side.

There is also the Government's political vendetta. They have become obsessed against Ken Livingstone at the GLC and now against the rate-capped Labour local authorities. It is because those Labour authorities are showing that there is an alternative to dismal, doleful Toryism. They have sought to match their public services to local needs. They have promoted economic development and job creation, and employed community policies that are both popular and relevant in their areas. With such programmes, those councils would be re-elected with massive majorities if they were allowed to go to the electorate. Hence the Government are coming forward with the order to abolish them and the elections.

Last week we debated the Local Government Bill. Conservative Members were wrestling with their consciences on the matter of their mandate. Listening to them was like being an intruder on their private grief. Of course, it was a mess all of their own making. It is exactly what happens when an authoritarian petty tyrant writes in a commitment on a whim. The right hon. Lady the Prime Minister did that to avoid any real commitment to tackling unemployment.

Manifesto commitments are not to be taken lightly. The Government will be condemned if they break their commitment. They should not promise what they cannot deliver or what has not been properly thought out. They will be condemned much more if they implement that commitment, particularly in the Local Government Bill. During the general election, at no stage did they say what the alternative to the GLC and the metropolitan counties would be or that they would abolish the elections and people's right to vote for their own regional and city governments.

If the Government push ahead with that manifesto commitment—so called—their manifesto will have to be rewritten, certainly for the next election. If they do not do it, we shall have to do it for them. Perhaps we shall have what can be described only as an honesty manifesto—for example, that the Conservatives are for creeping centralisation. That is actually being quite charitable, considering the reserve powers of the Secretary of State. A plethora of clauses give him powers. Clause 93 is a classic, giving him the power to do anything that he wants that he regards as necessary and expedient. It is a blank cheque.

What has happened to the Prime Minister's famous insert into her conference speeches, that she was protecting the individual from the power of the state. I hope that we shall hear no more of that. What with the Government using the police and the courts against trade unionists and the overwhelming powers that they are taking to themselves in the Bill, it is not creeping centralisation, but much more like galloping centralisation.

The Conservative party will have to say in its honesty manifesto that it is in favour of quangos and more complexity. The previous manifesto was sold to the public on the basis that a Conservative Government would make life simpler, but they have made it about as simple as Einstein's theories. A web of quangos and joint boards will replace directly elected councillors. People will not know where to go and who to see if they have a problem or complaint.

The Conservative party will have to say in its manifesto, "Conservatives put people on the dole." It is the party of unemployment. That would be an automatic inclusion, with unemployment presently running at 4 million; but they even had the cheek to boast in the debate on the Local Government Bill that they would put another 7,100 public servants out of work.

The manifesto would also have to say, "Conservatives waste public money." Last week's Coopers and Lybrand report estimated that the provisions would cost £69 million, which is completely unnecessary expenditure. It will cost ratepayers more as the quangos determine their rate precepts——

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Rubbish.

Mr. Cohen: Those precepts will increase considerably.

On top of all that, an important inclusion in the honesty manifesto will be that, "Conservatives are for diminishing democracy." The order is about abolishing elections. That would be bad enough—indeed, it is diabolical—but they are doing it on a partial, biased basis. They are doing it on a party-political basis, because only Labour-controlled authorities will be abolished, not Tory-controlled shire county councils. It will also be remembered that the Government tried to gerrymander the House on the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Bill. First, they tried to ensure that they obtained a Tory majority in the borough nominations; they even floated the idea of London Members of Parliament being involved. They were all temporary devices to ensure that they had a majority.

However, the Secretary of State has gone beyond that and taken the powers unto himself. From an answer to a parliamentary question that I put down, I learnt that his powers will extend to deciding whether the GLC can buy teabags.

The abolition of the elections is massively unpopular; the opinion polls show that more than 70 per cent. of Londoners are opposed to it. During the consultations on "Streamlining the Cities" many people, including Conservatives, spoke against the abolition of elections. They included voluntary organisations, local authorities —not just those involved directly—the staff of local authorities, trade unions, churches, pensioners' organisations, women's organisations, ethnic minorities, housing associations and professional organisations.

Even the arts came out against abolition. If the Government will not take account of those views, they will have to include in their honesty manifesto, "Conservatives are uncaring, undemocratic Philistines."

Mr. Fallon: Rubbish.

Mr. Cohen: As a result of this order and the Local Government Bill, London will be the only capital city in the Western world without its own directly elected, city-wide government, and it has been shown overwhelmingly that Londoners do not want that. The Conservative honesty manifesto will not win many votes, but it is the truth and——

Mr. Fallon: Rubbish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) is not helping our proceedings by keeping up a running commentary of abuse. I hope that he will desist.

Mr. Cohen: I was on my last sentence, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Government's honesty manifesto will not win many votes, but it is the truth, and the Minister knows it.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Much has been made by the Government Front Bench of precedents for the abandonment of elections, but for two years after the passage of the Local Government Act 1972 there existed not one set of elected councils, but three. There were the old county borough councils, which were going out of existence, there were the district councils elected in 1973, and the metropolitan county councils. Now for most of the country, the reality will be no local elections for 1985.

The Government wish to avoid elections as much as possible. Despite the hoo-ha about the opinion polls, they know that in much of the country they are very unpopular and would suffer in any local elections. We are being asked to transfer the sort of inner-party autocracy that already exists in the Tory party to the major conurbations. There will be no elections if——

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Is not my hon. Friend a little concerned that, as the debate has developed, Tory Members have left the Chamber——

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I have not.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I have not.

Mr. Fatchett: There is a noticeable improvement on the Tory Benches by the presence of my hon. Friends the Members for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) and for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). However, is not my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) worried that there is not a Tory Member who wishes to make a contribution to support his Government? It is not a problem of Tory Members wrestling with their consciences. They must have decided that they do not support their Government.

Mr. Wareing: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. I appreciate that most of the Tory Members are not here in the Chamber, and those who are present are not all here either. They certainly have nothing to contribute to the debate.

Under this order, there will be no elections. People in the conurbations will not therefore be allowed to determine what transport, police, fire service and economic development policies there will be, because, like the water and health authorities, those services will be run by people who have got their jobs by indirect appointment. There will never be a coherent, clear policy presented to the people in the conurbations. They will not be able to determine what sort of administration they desire.

The reason for all this is simple. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) has made it clear that the Labour party thinks that this is a battle for democracy against the autocrats in the Tory Government. Autocracy began inside the Cabinet. The real professionals in the Tory party have been sent on to the Back Benches. Few in the Cabinet now will resist the Prime Minister. It is the Prime Minister's whim that we are debating, and it is her whim that will be debated on successive nights this week when we discuss the Local Government Bill. The essential point is that what the Tory party failed to win in the local elections of 1981, it now seeks to win by silencing opposition the in the metropolitan counties. It has tried everything else.

I notice that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) is no longer in the Chamber, but I understand that he has some interest in Great Universal Stores — the patron saint of the small shopkeeper. That was the organisation that took Merseyside county council to court over its "Fares fair" policy.

Mr. Fallon: I am not surprised.

Mr. Wareing: But the hon. Gentleman may be surprised to know that Great Universal Stores was defeated even in the High Court; and it did not have the courage to go as far as the other place, because, I suggest, it realised that Merseyside county council was performing its fiduciary duty to its ratepayers. Many of them do not have the use of a car and do not live in the luxiourous areas represented by so many Conservative Members. Those people cannot afford the luxury of sitting in a slovenly manner on the Tory Benches——

Sir Ian Percival (Southport) rose——

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, especially as the one Conservative Member who actually wants to participate in the debate also rose to his feet. If the Government think that the judges made the wrong decision in the case of Great Universal Stores, might they not start thinking about abolition of the judges' bench?

Mr. Wareing: With this Conservative Government, anything is possible. Their belief in democracy is clearly skin-deep. Even those who reside in Southport on Merseyside now benefit from the fairer fares policy, and that is particularly true of those who are of the age of the right hon. and learned Member for Southport (Sir. I. Percival), who I now see rising to his feet. They have concessionary fares.

Sir. Ian Percival: A moment ago the hon. Gentleman was asked if he could explain why there were so few Conservative Members present. Has it occurred to him that we are sick and tired of hearing the same old claptrap over and over again? He may ask why not more of us want to contribute, but we have made our contributions. We know what is right. I know what is right for the people of Southport and I do not require the hon. Gentleman to tell me. We shall support the Government in the Lobby the minute that we have the chance.

Mr. Wareing: Through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, perhaps I can offer to acquaint the people of Southport, particularly the pensioners, of the debate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might care to debate with me in Southport, and in front of pensioners, the problems involved in travelling round Merseyside.

Mr. Nigel Spearing: (Newham, South): Is not the more likely explanation of the absence of Conservative Members—including the right hon. and learned Member for Southport (Sir. I. Percival)—that they know that the order has the whiff of totalitarianism about it and that it comes from 10 Downing street?

Mr. Wareing: Yes, a sufficient number of Conservative Members smell—[Interuption.]—not only the whiff of totalitarianism but of defeat for the Prime Minister. They want to distance themselves from such policies, which they believe will ultimately lead to the demise of the Conservative party.

The Tories are using the weapon of trade union legislation and the Police and Criminal Evidence Act against the official Opposition because the Government fear the day when our arguments will win accord with the public and sweep them from office. That will happen soon.

The decision on the elections comes before Parliament makes a decision on the main Bill. Assuming that it goes through both Houses unamended, Royal Assent is not likely before next year. Yet the elections, which as a Merseyside county councillor, I would welcome, are to be swept aside. In May 1985 the people who elected me cannot say whether my stewardship has been good or bad. I prefer the people in my ward to make that decision, not the diktat of the Gauleiter of Marsham street. This is a deliberate attempt to prevent opposition.

Conservative Members believe that their consciences will be salved by saying "Well, it was in the manifesto." It was put there by the Prime Minister nine days after the election was declared without any discussion with her policy committee or reference to London Members in her party. Conservative Members are not voting tonight for their manifesto commitment. By refusing elections for the metropolitan counties, they are not ensuring that district councils will take over the services, because on Merseyside only 15 per cent. of expenditure by the Merseyside county council will go to the district councils. The joint boards, the indirectly appointed bodies which have no coherent policy, will take over.

Conservative Members who have any belief in democratic accountability will exercise their right to vote against this intolerable measure which is more akin to Fascism in Spain under Franco than to the democracy on which this House has been built throughout the ages.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): In future years people may ask what we were doing in 1984, when there was so much unemployment and poverty and when so much money was spent on armaments, discussing the abolition of elections in Greater London and the met counties. Our discussion is not irrelevant to those problems. It is indicative of the Government's attitude to those problems that they are abolishing elections. They are abolishing them because of what many local authorities have been able to achieve. Before coming to the Chamber I was looking at the election address for the 1898 London county council elections. The then Conservative party in London, which said that it was moderate — we have heard about that before — was campaigning for the abolition of the London county council because it did not like the direct works department, the attempts to clear away the slum landlords, to clean up the Thames, to introduce a proper fire service and all the other things upon which Londoners now depend for a decent life.

Ever since those days the Conservative party has been opposed to the principle of a Londonwide elected authority. The Government are using their majority to force through this squalid order to destroy the right of Londoners and those in the metropolitan counties to vote for a local authority. If anyone imagines that the day after the local authorities are abolished consequent upon the order he will be able to influence decisions, let him bear in mind the quangos and the problems associated with them. If anyone in my constituency has a housing problem or any problem connected with the local authority or the GLC, he can see an elected representative, take up the matter and possibly obtain satisfactory, or possibly not. He can vote to remove that person from office if he wishes to do so. Let him try to do the same to representatives of the gas board, the electricity board, the Thames water authority or even the health authorities. Democracy is to be removed from many vital services.

Conservative participation in the debate about the future of local government and the abolition of elections could well be described as abdication. Conservatives have used their friends in the media to rubbish the idea of democracy. When the four by-elections took place in Greater London in September, the Conservative party did not participate. That was a bit thick, Conservatives having called the leader of the GLC the most hated and most wanted man in Britain. They have said that the Labour administration at County hall is an evil on the face of the earth but they refused the opportunity to participate in the by-elections. Had they won them, they could have gained control of the GLC.

The real reason for the Conservative party's non-participation was fear. It was not prepared to send its supporters to knock on doors to tell the electorate why its vote was being taken away. The Conservative party has still not satisfied anyone in London of its reasons for wishing to destroy the GLC or the metropolitan counties outside London, or take away the right of people to vote. Opinion polls show an increasing level of support for the principle of elected local government and a decreasing level of support for the Government. There are 33 Conservative Members who would lose their seats if an election were to take place on the issue of the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties. They should be well aware of that.

The proposals that we are discussing are indicative of the continuing centralisation of power under an increasingly paranoid Government. Since 1979 they have been systematically removing funding from the inner city areas. They have been systematically trying to control local authority finance. They have been systematically removing powers from local authorities and systematically penalising the poorer areas of the country.

We know that Britain's problems are severe. Against that background, why are the Government afraid of allowing those in the poorest areas to vote? Unemployment rates in London are well above the national average. In my constituency there is 21 per cent. unemployment, which is a common figure for many in London's inner city areas. The Government are denying these people the right to vote. They know that they will vote for a local authority that will try to provide jobs and services to alleviate the hardships that exist within London. They will continue to vote for a GLC, or successor bodies, that will campaign politically to get resources back into the inner city areas and thereby stop the poorest people being stamped down by Conservative Members.

The order is indicative of the Government's contempt for the poor and for democracy. When the order is passed, it should be remembered that a Conservative Member said during the debate that he was concerned that a future Labour Administration might be tempted to use these measures as precedents for further abolition Bills or as reasons for denying elections in other spheres. I have no fears about that. Conservative Members should understand that Opposition Members are members of a democratic party. We are born of democracy, because the Labour party has fought for it. [Interruption.] We have fought for democracy in all places and in all spheres. The order is the beginning of the abolition of other forms of elections. Anyone who organises to oppose the Government is immediately opposed by the Government and their puppets in the media and, eventually, some squalid little Bill is forced through the House late at night. The day of reckoning for the Government will come. Government Members will have a rude awakening if they ever step outside the chamber late at night or during the day—I realise that some have other jobs to do — and test opinion to find out what people really think about being denied the right to vote, and the abolition of the local authorities. They will be surprised to learn of the respect felt by many for what the GLC and metropolitan councils have done in improving planning, fighting for the rights of women and ethnic communities and for industrial jobs, and so on.

The Government may well succeed in forcing this nasty little order through the House and in officially destroying next year's elections—with the ridiculous excuse of the cost of printing ballot papers, when they spend £17 billion on defence. The Government have contempt for democracy and for the poorest people. They will rue the day they passed this order, because they know what will happen to them when the people finally get an opportunity to vote.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): A number of Opposition Members wish to participate in this debate, so I shall try to limit my remarks to a few minutes.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg), who is no longer in the Chamber, asked why we should bother holding elections when those elected will remain in office for only one year. During the past few months, the running theme of our arguments has been that, if the elections are not held, the assumption is that both Houses of Parliament will pass the abolition Bill and that the legislations will receive the Royal Assent. The Opposition believe that it is disgraceful and unacceptable that there will not be elections in 1985.

There was an interesting reaction from Conservative Members when the word "democracy" was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). It is clear that Conservative Members have forgotten what that word means. I think that I am the fifth Opposition Member in succession to speak — the Government ran out of speakers nearly one hour ago, so few are the Conservative Members who desire to defend the order.

Surely the election in 1985 would have given the people an opportunity to decide. We are democratic because we would have been prepared to let the people in the met counties, including Tyne and Wear county of which my constituency is a part, hear the case put by the Conservatives—they are the opposition in my area—and the case for the retention of the Tyne and Wear county council. We would have been prepared to let the people decide what they want. The Conservatives could have put the case about profligate spending, and so on. The people know what the Tyne and Wear county council has done for them in an area of massive unemployment. I could spend some time citing figures, but suffice it to say that the male unemployment rate—even on the Government's fiddled figures—is 22 per cent. and that nearly 50 per cent. of the unemployed in Tyne and Wear have been out of work for more than a year.

If I had been a Conservative Member, I would not have wanted to put my case to the people who have suffered such deprivation for so long, because I would have known that the election result would have been a foregone conclusion. The only word that can express the Government's position is cowardice. The Government were too cowardly to put their case to the people of Tyne and Wear county, the other met counties and the GLC.

Ministers have made great play of the fact that the decision to abolish the GLC and the met counties was contained in the Conservative manifesto. Let me remind the House of what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said about the manifesto;

"they must recognise that a democratic Government still have to justify to the House what they are doing even though proposals were set out in the party's manifesto. No democratic Government have ever been able to say, 'it was in the party's manifesto, so we shall do it.'"—[Official Report, 4 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 191.]

Let us see what that means. The right hon. and learned Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) said that he was fed up with hearing the same old claptrap. The claptrap may be coming from the Conservative Benches. Two respected opinion polls have been published—one by MORI for The Sunday Times, and one by Harris for The Observer. They were published the week after the Government had spent hours and hours presenting their argument to the country. The first opinion poll was taken throughout the country and not just in London and the metropolitan counties. It showed that 46 per cent. of the people were against abolition and only 30 per cent. were in favour.

A by-election is taking place in Enfield, Southgate this week, and an opinion poll has been taken there on the people's attitude to the Government's proposals. The Harris poll found that 47 per cent. of the people were against the Government's proposals and 31 per cent. were in favour of them.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire) rose——

Mr. Boyes: Conservative Members are not convincing the country with their arguments. The Government's case is not proven. They should drop this order until the abolition Bill has been decided by Parliament.

Mr. Forth rose——

Mr. Boyes: There is still time to have an independent inquiry. Five Opposition Members have wanted to speak but not one Conservative Member has stood up. The Government's case has not been proven and they have no right to expect support in the Lobby on this order.

12.47 am

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): I am driven to speak by the extreme observations of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes). This is a serious issue and it is possible for there to be two different points of view. Do not Opposition Members realise that everything that can be said has been said? They may hold their views passionately, but it was a rather sick joke when an Opposition Member said that the Labour party is the democratic party. Does he not remember the time when the Labour Home Secretary was obliged to put forward the Boundary Commission's recommendations which did not suit the Labour party?

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) rose——

Sir Ian Percival: I shall not give way. The Home Secretary was under a statutory duty to propose that the recommendations be adopted and so he laid the order. His party was whipped to vote against it. That is an example of democracy and parliament fighting for it.

The arguments for and against the Government's proposals have been fully rehearsed. It does nothing for Opposition Members to put forward extravagant arguments that have no bearing on the point. Conservative Members have not taken up much of the time of the House this evening because we have made up our minds. We are aware of the arguments. We are convinced that the Government are right and we shall support them.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): For hundreds of years there have been battles to extend and preserve people's right to vote and the duty to preserve that right is deeply ingrained in all of us. I do not think that anyone in the House, in London or elsewhere would ever have believed that in 1984 Parliament would be called upon to destroy a vote.

In all those battles no group has been so disadvantaged, obliged to fight so hard and held back from voting for so long as women. The women of London are very angry at the taking away of their vote, the cancellation of the elections and the prospect of the Greater London council ceasing to exist. The GLC has given women a voice in London—[HON. MEMBERS: "Come off it!"] It is no use Conservative Members shaking their heads. They should listen. They do not listen to anyone. The GLC listens to women. [Interruption.] There is nothing for hon. Members to laugh about. Let me tell them a story.

The GLC is the successor to the old London county council. Like other hon. Members, I was fascinated to read the record of the first election to the LCC, written by the record keeper to the council and entitled, "Sexism and the first London County Council election, 1889". At that time women did not have the vote and it was a matter of contention whether they could stand for election. Indeed, it was another 20 years before they obtained the right to stand for Parliament. In the end, however, three women stood for the first LCC election and two were elected—Lady Sandhurst, who was returned for one of the two Brixton constituencies, and Miss Jane Cobden, daughter of the famous Richard Cobden, who won one of the two seats for Bromley and Bow.

When the two ladies took their seats at county hall the council seemed determined to reinforce the feminist view that had come into the council chamber and as well as welcoming the two women members they took the very progressive step of electing an alderman who was a woman to make a women's triumvirate in the chamber. Those women were scarcely a threat to local government democracy, but they were vulnerable because they were not masculine. The person who had stood against Lady Sandhurst in the election challenged her right to her seat, took the case to the High Court and won. Although the women retained their seats they were not allowed to vote or to speak, so they sat it out, unable to do any more than to attend council meetings. Finally, they got fed up with that and decided to speak and to vote. They were then challenged yet again, someone else took them to the High Court and they lost.

The anger throughout London and in the council itself, however, was such that campaigns were pursued until those women and others after them were able to take their seats and to vote in the council chamber. Those battles have been won. Women in London today are determined that the battle for the GLC shall be won as well. That is what we are discussing this evening.

Much has been said in the debate about the Tory manifesto. One woman said to me the other day that she found it strange that, although our Prime Minister is a woman, there was no woman's perspective in the manifesto. As far as the women of London are concerned, the Prime Minister has not contributed a woman's perspective. All her policies, including the abolition of these elections and perhaps of the GLC, tend to disadvantage women and to cut them off from services that have been of enormous benefit to them.

Many women may well have voted for the Prime Minister and the Tory Government at the last general election. Very many of them will be thinking again about what they should do at the next general election. Indeed, many of them are wondering whether the Government will go on to abolish the next general election as well.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The time of night—or early morning—chosen to discuss an order such as this is of crucial importance. The Government must be hoping that their proposals will receive as little publicity as possible.

By their failure to speak in the debate, Conservative Members have shown that they do not wish to be associated with the proposal—or, perhaps, that they cannot summon up adequate arguments to support their own Government.

It is appropriate that we should be discussing the order at such a time, because our democratic rights are being stolen from us. The Government, like a thief in the night, are taking away the democratic rights of Londoners and of people in other areas.

There has been another interesting feature of today's proceedings in Parliament. Earlier, we discussed the Representation of the People Bill, which proposes certain extensions—as the Government see it—to the franchise. Now, however, we are discussing an order that will take the vote away from 18 million people. The Government say that there are other opportunities to vote.

The hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) said that only one vote is being taken away from the people of London. He should reflect on the fact that in the shire counties people have opportunities to vote in parish, district, shire county and general elections. In outer London constituencies, such as mine, we will, if the order is passed have only two opportunities to vote—in borough council and general elections. We have only two opportunities to vote, whereas in the shire counties there are four.

How many more proposals will the Government make, saying that voting is inappropriate and too expensive and that people must therefore lose their right to vote? The order will deprive London of 95 years of voting for city-wide government. This is a squalid little measure from a squalid little Government who will get their come-uppance in the local government elections in 1986.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Only eight months ago, the Secretary of State advised the House, with all the conviction that he alone can command, of the merits of his Local Government (Interim Provisions) Bill, which at that stage not only abolished the 1985 elections but replaced the authorities by nominated bodies, thus transferring political power without elections.

We would do well to remember that this debate is taking place only because the Government have suffered abject humiliation at the hands of the House, another place and the British people. There would not have been the same pressure if it had not been for the fact that representatives here have woken up the deep unpopularity of the measures that the Secretary of State and his colleagues have advanced. None of these recommendations would have been accepted in April if only Conservative Members had bothered to listen to the arguments and to study the issues. Instead, as we have seen again today, the Government do not bother to consult their Back Benchers. That is no wonder, because they are not worthy of consultation. The Government know that almost anything that they present, unless it directly affects the pockets of wealthy voters, will be supported by Conservative Members, who will jump up and read Conservative research department briefings and troop through the Lobby behind the Government.

When he seconded the motion on the Loyal Address on 15 May 1979, the Minister for Local Government said:

"it is difficult to find that narrow strip of land that lies between rebellion and sycophancy."—[Official Report, 15 May 1979; Vol. 967, c. 57.]

Far too many Conservative Members have found it too difficult today.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): It is called the art of politics.

Mr. Straw: Is it? I know that the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) once thought that the future of his political career lay in rebellion. He obviously now thinks that it lies in——

Mr. Tony Banks: He has got a Parliamentary Private Secretary's job now.

Mr. Straw: I am not sure that he has got a Parliamentary Private Secretary's job. Has he? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] Maybe——

Mr. Tony Banks: He gets money for it.

Mr. Straw: I learnt only tonight that the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) has wisely decided not to continue as Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Paymaster General. Perhaps the hon. Member for South Ribble has taken that job.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): My hon. Friend may care to note that the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), whose principal responsibility at the moment is as a Parliamentary Private Secretary on the Films Bill, has admitted to the Committee that he has not been to the cinema for some six or seven years? That is the extent of his competence and knowledge.

Mr. Straw: I do not think that there are any cinemas in his constituency.

There was little justification for this measure when it was first introduced and then amended, but there is now even less justification for abolishing the elections. The first reason, as my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, is that we now know that the manifesto commitment that was presented to the British people lacked all legitimacy. It is claimed by none other than the Prime Minister—I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to savour these words—that the Conservative party

"can reasonably claim to be the leading democratic party in the world."

It is a modest claim in a modest speech—her Carlton Club lecture which was given last week. We all enjoy the spectacle of the Conservative party, flexible as ever, as the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) told us, fighting for years—in some cases centuries—against a major principle, such as democracy, as it did until Disraeli persuaded it that democracy might be in its interests. We now see what has happened to him. The Prime Minister wants to go back to Lord North. It is fascinating to us, who are members of what we believe to be a party of principles, however inconvenient they might sometimes be, to watch the flexibility of the Tory party fighting democracy. The democrat used to be a term of abuse used by Tories. Now Tories suggest that they are in favour of democracy and that the Conservative party is the most democratic party in the world. If so, I ask the Minister, how, in an internally democratic party, can a commitment find its way into the manifesto against the wishes of the party policy committee? I assume that, if it is a democratic party, it has a constitution and that there are votes. The right hon. Gentleman must answer that question.

If the Tory party practised what it preaches about democracy—I am interested to find that evidently it does not—plainly that commitment was railroaded into the manifesto against the wishes of the party as a whole and it lacks any legitimacy either in the country or in the Conservative party.

The second reason why there is even less justification for this measure which abolishes elections to precede the abolition of the authorities is the evidence which has emerged about the cost of this farrago of proposals. We have all noted that the Government have gone very coy indeed about their claim that £120 million is to be saved from the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan authorities. I am glad that they have. The message has not quite reached some of their hon. Friends. I took part in a radio interview with the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), who claimed that as a result of this change 9,000 bureaucrats would go. It is obvious that the hon. Gentleman believes that all of these savings will come from savings in administration. If that is so, the metropolitan counties would have to save £50 million from administration. The metropolitan counties spent only £47 million upon the administrative costs of all their services. In order to achieve those administrative savings, those services would almost have to be wiped out.

However, since those wild claims were made and since our debates last week there has been the fascinating story in the Financial Times—not denied, not even commented upon tonight by Ministers—that to dismantle the GLC and London's capital fund could add £750 million to public borrowing. The article was written by Mr. Robin Pauley, who was so derided by the Secretary of State during the proceedings on the Rates Bill for his, Mr. Pauley's, leaks from the Treasury that the Rates Bill would cost £900 million. Mr. Pauley proved to be entirely accurate on that occasion, as he will on this, since his information is impeccable. I hope that when the right hon. Gentleman winds up the debate he will tell us a little more about the Treasury's briefing of the Financial Times: that the abolition of the GLC will add £750 million to public borrowing. Had that been anticipated by the Prime Minister when she forced that commitment into the manifesto, I do not believe the Government would have gone ahead with the legislation.

The third reason why there is even less justification for this measure than there was is the personality of the Minister for Local Government who apparently has the principal responsibility for piloting this measure through the House. As we heard last week, his claims that he had always been in favour of the abolition of the GLC ever since the early 1960s were not entirely accurate. What the right hon. Gentleman told this House on 18 March 1971 bears repeating. Indeed, it should be repeated daily. We must not forget that he told the country only recently that he had always been opposed to the abolition of the GLC ever since the 1960s. His exact words were:

"I believe and have always believed in the abolition of the GLC, consistently since I represented London back in the 1960s".

He said on 18 March 1971 when moving the Second Reading of the Greater London Council Bill:

"It"——

the GLC—

"has progressive and expanding programmes, it is making life better for Londoners, and it will make it infinitely better for Londoners in the 1970s and the 1980s".—[Official Report, 18 March 1971; Vol. 813, c. 1741.]

We let the Minister off rather lightly last Tuesday. The right hon. Gentleman owes the House and the country an apology for deliberately misleading them about the position he took on the GLC during the 1960s and 1970s. He said on the radio that he had always supported the abolition of the GLC. That is utterly inconsistent with speech after speech that he has made in the House. I now offer the right hon. Gentleman the chance to set the record straight.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth) rose——

Mr. Straw: If we cannot have the organ grinder, let us have the monkey.

Mr. Dickens: It takes a gorilla to know a monkey. May I say, in defence of my right hon. Friend, that when I first came into the House in 1979 I introduced a ten-minute Bill to abolish the metropolitan county councils, and my right hon. Friend was most supportive.

Mr. Straw: I regret to tell the hon. Gentleman that although he may think that the world revolves around him, I was talking about his right hon Friend's record. If the Minister did support the abolition of the GLC throughout the 1960s and 1970s, how did he manage to write that now notorious pamphlet and make so many speeches in the House? I hope that at some stage he will have the courage and guts to explain to the House the problems that he now faces.

We have heard the many forebodings of my hon. Friends about where the anti-democratic actions of the Government are likely to lead. I share many of them. Let me read to the house a report that appeared in the Lancashire Evening Telegraph on 24 December 1983 on the Lancashire county council's proposal to abolish the metropolitan county councils. A county councillor told the policy resources committee that she foresaw a day when elected representatives would be "not worth a fig". She said:

"Will the shire counties be next in their place? Will we have Government sponsored people on district councils to put them on the right lines? How long will it be before we have 1984 when elected representatives are not worth a fig? I see this day coming and I am fearful."

That comes not from a Labour councillor but from a woman elected as Conservative county councillor for Lancashire.

Ultimately, although we are concerned about services, the order and the Local Government Bill are about democracy. The Government tonight are seeking to fly in the face of democratic principles that they claim to hold dear and the democratic rights of 13 million voters in London and the metropolitan counties. It is a completely disreputable and dishonourable order, and it should be opposed.

1.13 am

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) dips yet again into my voluminous speeches and writings. I have been looking through what he has written and spoken over the past few years. But I must disappoint my hon. Friends because I have not been able to find anything either interesting or memorable.

Let me briefly remind the House of the purpose of the order that we are discussing. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) said that in the paving Bill both Houses of Parliament agreed that it was right to put on the statute book what is now part II of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984—the provision to suspend elections. So the principle was then agreed. However, it was subject to the approval of both honourable Houses by way of an affirmative order, and that is what we are asking the House to agree to tonight.

In effect, both Houses—including the House at the other end of the Corridor—accepted the Government's view that it makes little sense to hold elections to councils which, if Parliament enacts the Local Government Bill, will have only 11 months to run. Never before has a whole council been elected for a term of less than a year. That was the principle agreed in the Bill, although I appreciate that Opposition Members do not accept that.

From the outset the Government made it clear that they would introduce an order instituting part II of the paving Bill, and that that would not be made until the House had approved the main principle of abolition by giving a Second Reading to the Local Government Bill, which it did last week by a majority of 135.

I come now to the speech of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). He made an interesting and important speech, which was echoed by the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson). The tenor of his speech was that the struggle for democracy has been long and hard. He said that great advances had been made only by systematic breaking of the law. He listed a great parade of the various advances of democracy.

The right hon. Gentleman's memory was a little selective. It stopped short when he took office. It was a parade of the Labour party's great crusade of extending democracy. During the first Wilson Government, the Cabinet took action that could not be described as democracy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate said, in 1967 that Government postponed the London borough elections for a year—from 1967 to 1968. It is possible that those elections were postponed because the Labour Government were unpopular, were losing by-elections at Meridon, Dudley and Acton, and therefore it became convenient to postpone them? When it suited the Labour Government, they postponed the elections.

Having learned how to do that, in 1969 the right hon. Gentleman participated in one of the most disgusting pieces of gerrymandering that this House has ever seen. The Labour Government wanted to postpone the boundary revisions of 1969 because they would have abolished a number of small inner London seats. They tried not to introduce the measure, but then introduced a Bill only for London. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman remembers that marvellous episode in the great progress of Labour party democracy. They introduced a Bill to gerrymander London alone. They found themselves in a mess because it involved Hertfordshire, Middlesex, Surrey and all the areas around London. Overcome by shame, they withdrew the Bill and did nothing. The record of the Labour party on democracy is poor.

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Baker: I am sorry, but I will not give way as I wish to answer the debate.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) said in effect that we are introducing the measures because we are frightened of having elections. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman read last week's New Statesman. Perhaps it is a little too Right-wing for him. If he had read it, he would have seen an article by Peter Kellner, the political editor, who is one of the most accurate and best commentators upon local government election results. He was analysing the November local government results all over the country, and the article was under the heading:

"Worst council results of Kinnock leadership"

Analysing what happened in November, Mr. Kellner said:

"Labour came third in local council by-elections in November — the party's worst month since Neil Kinnock became leader."

In the month of November, taking all the council and county council by elections——

Mr. Michie: What about the county council elections?

Mr. Baker: I am coming to the county council elections in a moment. The hon. Gentleman should wait for it. Mr. Kellner stated that in all the council elections in November, of all the people who voted, 40·1 per cent. voted Conservative, Alliance 29·9 per cent., and Labour 27·3 per cent. What was interesting was that buried deep in those results was a by-election for a county council that is to be abolished—the West Midlands county council. There was a by-election in Coventry, South West in which the Conservative candidate stood on a ticket to scrap the council. He won with a swing of 4 per cent. and ——

Mr. Michie rose——

Mr. Baker: I am sorry, I cannot give way.

The seat that was contested was Coventry, South-West. This is what Mr. Peter Kellner said about Coventry, South-West, which we held with a swing of 4 per cent:

"It is . . . precisely the sort of ward Labour needs to win."

The seat was represented by an old friend of us all Audrey Wise, from 1974 to 1979. Mr. Kellner says:

"Last month's result, however, represents a 4 per cent swing to the Tories".

Therefore, according to the evidence the recent electoral contests that we have had have been shown to be valueless, and we are doing rather well. Let me refer——

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baker: No, I must reply to the debate.

Mr. Straw: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baker: I must reply to the debate.

Mr. Hughes rose——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): Order.

Mr. Straw: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want it to be placed on record that this Minister was given more time than he asked for, and it is dishonourable of him not to give way. The way that he is behaving is outrageous.

Mr. Baker: I should like to refer to the GLC by-elections. They show the unscrupulous attitude of Opposition Members. Two of the candidates who stood and were re-elected in the stunt by-elections were Mr. McDonnell, the deputy leader of the GLC, and Mr. Ken Little of Edmonton. They were just re-elected in September at the stunt by-elections. But in this week's London Labour Briefing, Mr. McDonnell says that all the wet members of the GLC on the Labour side who were not prepared to risk bankruptcy and illegality in setting a rate should stand down and resign their seats and allow the Labour party to replace them "with a councillor who is willing to stand firm in support of party policy. In my view if any councillor refuses to stand down now and goes on to support compliance and cuts . . . he or she is as much a scab as any miner currently crossing NUM picket lines."

I do not ascribe those views to the hon. Members for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) or Blackburn, but that is what Mr. McDonnell said. He is saying that his colleague who has just been re-elected, Mr. Ken Little, must stand down. Mr. Little has been told that he must obey the caucus, not the people who re-elected him. That shows entirely the attitude of——

Mr. Wareing: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that the Minister has very little time in which to reply to the debate——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Baker: The example that I quoted of Mr. McDonnell trying to force out of office one of his elected colleagues shows that Labour's approach to local government in London is not one of concern for the people or for essential services. The hard Left in London has used local government as a platform for its Left-wing dogma and political ambitions, and I wish to use——

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business), and to order [5 December]:—

1.32 am

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): I beg leave to present a petition that has been signed by more than 50,000 women in London. Its purport is to show

That the Government's plan to abolish the Greater London Council and to replace it with non-elected boards, and to cancel the 1985 GLC elections, is an affront to democracy and to the liberties of the people of London;

That the Government's proposals would seriously reduce the quality of public services available to Londoners, and increase the rate burden in most London Boroughs;

That abolition of the GLC would be against the interests of women in London, for these specific reasons.

The reasons are listed in the petition, and include child care projects, employment and training opportunities and other projects of general benefit.

I have great pleasure in presenting this petition. If there had been more time, we would have had more signatures. But it generally reflects the feelings of women and other citizens in our capital.

To lie upon the Table.

Cream Heat Treatment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

1.38 am

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the important subject of the Cream (Heat Treatment) Regulations (Scotland) 1983. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for keeping him at this late hour, but, in view of the importance of the issue, I am sure that he will forgive me.

The regulations came into effect on 18 November 1983, two days after they had been theoretically debated in Parliament. I say "theoretically", because they were only one of 11 measures for debate, and in the subsequent Division they were grouped with nine others. The debate hardly touched on the case for heat treatment for milk, cream and other dairy products. The issue that night was the impact of European UHT milk and the earlier action by the Community which prevented United Kingdom opposition to imports.

That lack of serious consideration has characterised the progress of this and other regulations governing the production, distribution and sale of milk, cream and other dairy products.

The earlier Milk (Special Designation) (Scotland) Order 1980 was brought in without taking into account the implications for the small producers of effectively enforcing the heat treatment of all milk in Scotland. The consequences were understood by the local authorities which had to enforce the regulations. Indeed, some of them spoke out at the time. I understand that about 200 small producers in Scotland have gone out of business as a result of the 1980 order. At least when that order was implemented people had reasonable time to react, since it came into effect in mid-1983.

In a letter from the Scotish Office dated 3 November 1980, it was said that the Government had no plans to extend the requirement for heat treatment to include cream, yoghurt or other milk products. Yet, a little over two and a half years later, the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in Scotland wrote to 11 organisations indicating its intention to introduce heat treatment for cream.

I understand that the representative of those most likely to be affected, the Small Farmers Association, was not among those consulted. Had it been consulted, objections would have been made and perhaps we should have had second thoughts about the order. No objections were made by any of the organisations. That is not surprising since the regulations eliminate the small, independent producer and benefit the larger producer.

The order came into effect without those most closely affected being consulted or even being aware of its existence. The first that producers of cream in my constituency knew of it was when they were contacted by environmental health officers one month after the order had come into effect explaining their obligations and saying that they should cease selling their cream. That is no criticism of the district council, because it had received little prior notice.

In the circumstances, it is interesting to examine the reasons for justifying this secondary legislation. Salmonella poisoning arising from milk has been a small, if persistent, problem for many years. According to written answers, between 1970 and 1983 the number of outbreaks varied between two and 10 and the number of people affected between 21 and 730. In one year—1971 — no outbreaks were attributable to milk. Over the entire period there were 12 deaths.

The dairy industry's record on food poisoning is such that most other food industries envy it. That includes National Health Service kitchens. It is significant that none of the outbreaks can be traced to cream or other dairy products, as all of them have involved milk.

I have seen no evidence to link even the incidents involving milk with small milk producers with fewer than 20 cows. I am informed that one case was attributed to cream, although parliamentary answers suggest that there has been none. The case involved pasteurised or treated cream, so it does not add to the argument.

Equally significant is that it has not been thought necessary to introduce the same rigorous controls on the sale of cream in England or in Wales. Despite the fact that there is no evidence of salmonella poisoning arising from cream, I received a parliamentary answer from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State giving reasons for the introduction of the regulations which suggested that there was a proven risk to health.

All this might have been understandable in the real world of politics if there had been tremendous public pressure for regulations to be introduced. However, it seems that the Government have not had one representation to suggest that heat treatment regulations should be introduced to cover cream.

The implications are all too obvious. Choice is effectively destroyed for the consumer as an attractive, quality and varied natural product is replaced by a standardised and homogenised mass-produced material which is related more to shaving foam than to cream. Small businesses will be destroyed along with jobs in local communities in favour of large organisations which already have, or can afford, the expensive equipment that is required to pasteurise cream. Even for the smallest producer, the cheapest equipment available amounts to an investment of about £10,000. That has a bearing on the local economy, including local printing, packaging and distributon, which centres on the small producer. All those enterprises suffer.

My constituent argues convincingly that tourism will suffer. He has a thriving business selling his cream, providing farm teas and showing customers round his private and unsurbsidised farm museum. All that is prejudiced by his inability to sell his cream.

The best protection for the consumer is knowing the man who produces the cream. Locally produced cream for the consumer means that he knows the dairyman and the farmer. He will see the cows and he will be able to judge for himself the public health risks, if any, that he is taking. That cannot be said of the cream coming from the large producers, or of the milk. It is ironic that, on a day when the front page of The Scotsman carries an article about a Scottish farmer who says that he will not drink his own milk because he believes that it is being polluted by dioxide and that he has had independent testimony to that effect from scientists, the combined forces of the farmer and the district council are unable to prevent his milk being uplifted by the Milk Marketing Board for general sale. However, the regulations that we are discussing prevent my constituent from selling his cream to his neighbours.

Those who are being asked to cease production are not cowboys. My constituent has consistently won an order of merit for the cleanliness of his milk and for his cream. I understand that my hon. Friend must be concerned with public health, but we appear to have no evidence that the sale of unpasteurised cream constitutes a health risk. If there are zealots in the Department who wish to eliminate salmonella, should they not be applying their minds to banning imported poultry, which is far more of a risk, or preventing people from having holidays in foreign countries? I hasten to add that I do not favour either of those measures, but they would do more to reduce the incidence of salmonella poisoning than attacking those who produce small quantities of cream.

I am conscious, of course, of the problems of bovine leucosis, which I understand can survive the pasteurisation process; yet the testing of herds for it is not compulsory. From a series of parliamentary answers that I obtained on 1 August, I am forced to the conclusion that there have been no representations in support of the regulations.

There have been no replies to the consultation documents sent out by the Department. Indeed, the people affected were not consulted. Therefore, I am forced to conclude that no public health problems exist and that the consequences of the regulations and the costs of compliance are unknown to the Scottish Office. This is a classic example of regulations which destroy jobs, incentives, enterprise, competition and a quality product —things to which all Conservative Members subscribe.

I understand that the regulations are being reviewed. I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to consider seriously exempting small producers—perhaps allowing them to sell unpasteurised cream from the farm gate—or making a blanket exemption for people who produce less than a given quantity. I shall leave it to my hon. Friend to suggest an appropriate amount. It is not unreasonable to review these regulations with a view to change, because the future of small, quality producers is at stake. The regulations have not been given the consideration due to them because of their consequences.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I thank the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) for choosing this topic for an Adjournment debate. I know that he has a long and continuing interest in this subject. It is to his credit that he has raised this topic, which affects a small number of persons who run fairly small enterprises. None the less, it is important that the House should turn its attention to their needs as well as to the greater needs of our constituents.

I certainly subscribe to the hon. Gentleman's argument about the way in which the Government have played safe in introducing buying orders—originally on raw milk and subsequently in the 1980-83 period on cream. The Under-Secretary of the State must accept responsibility for public health. We must err on the side of safety. The Government have got the balance wrong. They have gone over the top and are prejudicing unnecessarily the rights of small producers in view of public health needs.

A small organisation in my constituency produces milk products from unpasteurised milk, specifically Bonchester cheese. I commend that cheese to the Under-Secretary of State. I make special trips to Harrods to buy it—it is about the only product I can afford to buy there—and I am alive to tell the tale. The arguments about cream advanced by the hon. Member for Stirling showed how ridiculous the regulations are. They are even more ridiculous when they apply to the contamination of cheese made from unpasteurised milk. Small producers of unpasteurised cheese milk would suffer if they had to incur the capital costs of the machinery involved in small-scale pasteurisation, as mentioned by the hon. Member for Stirling. The figure of £10,000 was mentioned to me, too. The use of such machinery would produce bland cheese, unsuited to market requirements, and the small producers would not be able to receive the premium prices they are able to commend at present. The products would probably not even be mentioned in the marvellous publication "The Taste of Scotland" produced by the tourist board. We must ensure that public health is protected, but we must not legislate bacteria out of existence. We cannot go on producing sterile foods that have no character or flavour.

As the hon. Member for Stirling said, it is a matter of freedom of choice. I subscribe to the view—perhaps I can put it more forcefully than he did — that this requirement runs just about counter to every chapter of the Conservative manifesto in terms of liberties, distinctive ways of life, trade prospering, free enterprise, incentives to small businesses, lifting restrictions on farmers, reducing the burdens on small firms, diversifying regional economies and supporting tourism.

Tourism is important. People have conducted tours of small businesses such as that which produces Bonchester. The concluding paragraphs of the 1983 Conservative manifesto talked about cutting a path through the jungle of modern bureaucracy. The Conservatives claimed that that was hard going. It is as hard going for the producers of small, high value products such as unpasteurised cheese as it is for cream producers.

The Government should consider the matter carefully when they review the regulations, because, although the number of people affected is not great, the Government can easily put small businesses out of business by playing it safe and going for the easy option and banning production on the basis that there might be future health risks.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): My hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) have made an eloquent appeal against the heat treatment provisions of the Cream (Heat Treatment) (Scotland) Regulations 1983 based on the constraints this imposes on small businesses and the limitation of the freedom of choice for the individual.

It was good to hear that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire had read the Conservative party manifesto. We hope that he might perhaps be converted by it. He seemed to be convinced by parts of it.

The latter point about the freedom of individuals is one underlying the basic doctrines of our democracy and is one of the tenets, which my hon. Friend and I hold dear. It is, nevertheless, necessary on certain occasions for the good of the individual and for the greater well-being of others to constrain that freedom. I merely draw hon. Members' attention to the laws and regulations that have been passed in this House in recent years and in particular to the provisions that have been introduced to regulate the use of seat belts in cars, and the tightening up of standards in respect of transport and building. The underlying principle in all of these actions has been to improve the standards of services and facilities for the general public. The driving force behind the action on untreated cream is that of protecting public health and I should like to return to this point shortly.

First, however, it may be useful to remind my hon. Friend of the background to the introduction of the regulations under discussion this evening. During 1983, this country was faced with an adverse judgment by the European Court of Justice in respect of the ban on imports of UHT milk. The Government rightly considered, however, that if imports of milk were to be permitted it would be essential to ensure that public health be safeguarded as far as possible. The terms of the court "judgment" confirmed that the United Kingdom could take measures in this field and, following discussions with the Commission and the industry, we established a system of certificates and standards. These are principally embodied in the Import of Milk (Scotland) Regulations 1983, for Scotland. Concomitant with this system it was necessary to establish standards to apply to the production and manufacture of domestic milk products. For this reason the Milk-Based Drink (Hygiene and Heat Treatment) (Scotland) Regulations 1983 and the Cream (Heat Treatment) (Scotland) Regulations 1983 were promoted. These estalished parameters for domestic trade against which any imports could be measured. Generally speaking, the regulations merely embodied the standards and practices operated by the dairy industry. In view of the legal obligation on the Government to accept imports, it was necessary to promote the regulations as quickly as possible but formal consultations were undertaken with the industry in adddition to many meetings on an informal basis.

While the regulations were being prepared, consideration was given in Scotland to sales of untreated cream. My hon. Friend will be aware that at that time action was being taken in respect of sales of untreated milk in Scotland. This resulted in a ban on the sale of untreated milk on 1 August 1983. As was made clear in the period leading up to the ban and subsequently, action was required in Scotland to require heat treatment of milk in view of the numerous instances of food poisoning resulting from the consumption of untreated milk. In recent years the instances of poisoning had been numerous and over the previous decade some 12 people had died as a direct result of drinking untreated milk. My hon. Friend will no doubt recall the outbreak at Keith when some 200 individuals were affected and the subsequent outbreak on Islay in my constituency affecting some 70 people.

The requirement to pasteurise is in no way intended as a criticism of the management techniques of farmers. Salmonella infection can be transmitted in the best-managed herds and passed through cow's system to the milk. The only reliable means of killing salmonella and rendering the milk safe is by a form of heat treatment. To protect the health of the consumer in Scotland and in particular to minimise the risk to the young and the elderly, a programe of compulsory pasteurisation was introduced. A system of exemptions was also established to enable producers who faced severe economic difficulty and in whose area no alternative supply of heat-treated milk was readily available to continue to sell untreated milk after 1 August 1983.

Seventeen applications for exemption were received, of which 14 were granted. Each exemption lasts for a period of one year and is subject to review. When consideration was given to exemptions this year, 11 were renewed. A continuation of the exemption was granted to many of those only as a result of the introduction of a milk quota system which, as my hon. Friend will be well aware, still places certain difficulties on direct sellers of milk. It is to allow time for the position to be clarified that those producers have been given exemption. Subject to the status of direct sellers being clearer, only four producers will continue to be exempted from the ban after 31 March 1985. All the exemptions are in island areas.

I have outlined in some detail the arrangements which apply in respect of untreated milk in Scotland to show the extent to which we are limiting the sales of untreated milk. The arguments in respect of freedom of choice for the consumer and the effect on small businesses apply equally and it was with this background that we gave serious consideration during the preparation of the regulations to introducing a compulsory ban on the sale of untreated cream in Scotland. The health arguments for requiring heat treatment of cream are no less than those in respect of milk. In fact, cream as a medium is more likely to promote the growth of harmful bacteria. For that reason, when sales of cream were reintroduced after the war there was a major drive by the sellers of cream themselves to pasteurise their product. The code of practice recommended that cream be heat treated to preserve its shelf life and to protect the health of the consumer. The pattern of sales in Scotland has resulted in most cream passing through a few manufacturers and for several years around 99 per cent. of all cream sold has been heat treated. For this reason, actual recorded outbreaks of food poisoning resulting from cream are very few indeed. Logic and the evidence from milk before heat treatment was introduced, however, tell us that if cream was not heat treated outbreaks of salmonella poisoning would occur. Therefore, to improve the quality of milk and milk products on offer to the consumer, we believe that a complete ban on untreated products should be introduced.

On that basis, the consultation document was issued on 18 July 1983 and the letter referred to the proposed ban. I note my hon. Friend's comments about the Small Farmers Association. The Scottish National Farmers Union has a producer-retailer sub-committee which encompasses most of the small producers in Scotland as well as the large ones, but no comments were received on that aspect of the regulations. Since the regulations came into effect we have been made aware of difficulties, due to the ban on the sale of untreated cream, being experienced by only two producers in Scotland, one in my hon. Friend's constituency and the other in the constituency of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. In view of the concern expressed by my hon. Friend, my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State undertook to re-examine the application of the Cream (Heat Treatment) (Scotland) Regulations 1983 in this regard and the operation of certain other aspects of the regulation which have been drawn to the Department's attention by certain enforcement authorities.

My right hon. and noble Friend is still considering the regulations, and I would not wish to pre-empt the outcome, of his deliberations. Nor, however, would I like to hold out too much hope that a re-examination of the regulations will provide the outcome desired by my hon. Friend. In reviewing the regulations my right hon. and noble Friend has to have regard to the availability of supplies of pasteurised cream and to our policy in respect of public health that exemptions should not be permitted simply for economic reasons.

The success of pasteurisation speaks for itself. I draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) to the ice cream regulations which have required compulsory pasteurisation of that product since 1956. All manufacturers of ice cream must comply with that arrangement. Since pasteurisation was introduced nearly 30 years ago, there have been no recorded outbreaks of disease attributed to the product.

More recently, in August 1983, with the introduction in Scotland of the general requirement that milk be pasteurised, there has been a dramatic reduction in the number of cases of salmonellosis following the consumption of raw milk. While raw milk may still be consumed on the farm, pasteurisation is a measure which is outstandingly successful in protecting the public from this source of food poisoning. I think I need neither dwell on this point, nor apologise for our having introduced a measure that benefits the industry by the production of food that can now, without qualification, carry this high standard of safety.

My hon. Friend has drawn to my attention the differences that exist between England, Wales and Scotland. The difference in policy in Scotland results from more recorded incidences of outbreaks of food poisoning and a recognition that there was a degree of public concern not prevalent elsewhere in the United Kingdom which had to be met. It was therefore decided that, in view of the health arguments and the pattern of milk sales in Scotland, it would be feasible to move towards a complete ban.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire mentioned in particular the question of the cheese milk used for Bonchester cheese. After the good advertising that the hon. Gentleman has given that product this evening, I may even make a trip to Harrods to purchase some and sample it.

I can tell the hon. Gentleman that there is a recommendation that cheese milk should be pasteurised. That recommendation is made by the milk and milk products technical advisory committee in its code of hygienic practice for the manufacture of cheese, published in 1963. That code of practice has been generally implemented by creamery cheese-makers, and compliance with the code of practice has ensured that no recorded outbreak of milk-borne infections have occurred from cheese.

There are no plans at present to involve cheese milk in a compulsory heat treatment scheme such as exists for ordinary milk and for cream, and the hon. Gentleman may tell his constituent so.

The arguments are equally applicable to cream, and a similar move was appropriate. In reviewing the regulations, my right hon. and noble Friend will keep the principle of improving safeguards to protect public health in Scotland to the fore. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that the Government have a duty in this area and that we are endeavouring to fulfil our responsibilities towards the public as a whole. I can, however, assure my hon. Friend that my right hon. and noble Friend is fully aware of the circumstances of his constituent. I am sure that he is equally aware of the circumstances of the constituent of the right hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. The arguments put forward this evening will be borne very much in mind in reaching a conclusion.

Over many years there have been campaigns in Scotland — indeed, campaigns have been conducted in some national newspapers — to introduce the heat treatment of milk to safeguard public health, and——

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Defence Programme (Annual Review)

1. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State of Defence when he expects to announce the results of the annual review of the defence programme.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): Information about the future defence programme will be given in the 1985 "Statement on the Defence Estimates" in the normal way.

Mr. Cartwright: As the existing commitments in the 10-year defence programme are reported to exceed available resources by as much as £10 billion, will the Secretary of State ensure that his next review makes it clear what non-nuclear commitments are being cut out to make room for the Trident programme?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman must learn to distinguish between a planning process and a commitment. There are no excess commitments in the Ministry's long-term policies, because such commitments have not been authorised by Ministers.

Mr. Robert Atkins: In the course of the review, will my right hon. Friend give urgent consideration to the future of the European fighter aircraft, bearing in mind that discussions are being protracted, largely by the French? Will he make provision, if necessary, for funds to go national?

Mr. Heseltine: I appreciate my hon. Friend's real interest in this matter from his constituency point of view, with which I sympathise. However, there are great prizes to be achieved if Europe can co-ordinate more closely its military procurement. Ministers of various Alliance countries are trying to achieve that, if possible. We cannot say that it is possible to achieve greater co-ordination, but we are trying to achieve it within the framework of the EFA discussions.

Mr. Boyes: Has the Secretary of State had time to study an answer that I was given about using animals, without anaesthetics, to test the effects of cyanide poisoning? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a number of Conservative voters have told me that they will vote Labour at the next general election because of the Government's outrageous attitude to animal welfare? Does he believe that it is in the national interest to propose in the defence review the closure of Porton Down as a chemical research establishment or to consider it as a suitable and useful area for peaceful purposes?

Mr. Heseltine: I think we all realise the immensely difficult issues that are raised in the context of the research to which the hon. Gentleman draws the attention of the House. We must also realise that we have a responsibility to our troops, especially those in Germany who face the possibility of a chemical attack by the Soviet Union. It would be unthinkably irresponsible for a Ministry of Defence Minister not to do everything possible to provide them with the best preventive kit.

Mr. Stern: In the course of the defence review, will my right hon. Friend consider the role of export sales in making our defence programme possible? Will he encourage his Department of Trade and Industry colleagues to take a realistic attitude to potential export sales, particularly to countries, such as Turkey, which have never defaulted on such contracts?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support and interest. I have the closest and most harmonious relationships with all my Government colleagues, who meet to discuss these difficult issues of priorities.

Mr. Denzil Davies: When the Secretary of State comes to publish the fruits of the defence review, will he be as candid as was the Minister of State for the Armed forces in the Royal Navy debate two weeks ago and admit that the cost of Trident is bound to come out of conventional defence programmes? If that is so, does he agree that, by cutting our conventional defence, he is weakening Britain's real defences and its contribution to NATO at a time when it is important to build up conventional defences and not to rely on the first use of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Heseltine: It is fascinating to note that the right hon. Gentleman, whose party campaigned during the election for a reduction of 30 per cent. in the conventional defence budget, should now tell us that the Labour party wants to improve our conventional defences.

Cruise Missiles

2. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to alter security precautions for exercises involving cruise missile convoys.

5. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any proposals to change the security precautions for exercises involving cruise convoys.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): Security precautions always remain under review.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware that, in the early hours of 15 November, when a convoy of cruise missiles was entering Longmoor camp in Hampshire, two local inhabitants who were disturbed by the convoy were kidnapped by the police, deposited in a 5 ft deep pit, fenced by barbed wire, and guarded by two armed soldiers? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the deployment of cruise missiles will inevitably lead to this sort of erosion of civil rights and put us on the road to totalitarianism?

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman has an extraordinary recollection of that event. Those individuals were trespassing in a military training area during a military exercise. To protect them, they were put in the one place where there was some shelter and cover from the elements —a rifle range, which was not, of course, being used at that time.

Mr. Home Robertson: Does the Minister accept that interference with telephone lines in the neighbourhood of cruise missile convoy exercises, as happened last night, is neither tolerable nor legitimate as a security precaution? Does the right hon. Gentleman now accept that his strategy of trying to hide American weapons in the British countryside is doomed to failure, because many thousands of people will not turn a blind eye to what is going on?

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. The off-base deployment programme of ground-launched cruise missiles for training purposes has been extremely successful.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is most important that there should be off-base deployment to maintain the credibility and deterrence effect of the second strike power of all this weaponry? It seems to me that that approach is broadly accepted not only by those who live in the area but by those who are concerned about defence matters.

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for making that point. He is entirely correct.

Mr. John Browne: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the activity of people such as those who participate in Cruise Watch—whether or not they are aware of it—in monitoring the movement of these missiles off-base only aids and abets this country's enemies?

Mr. Stanley: I agree with my hon. Friend that the amount of time and effort devoted by certain small minorities to watching cruise missiles is strange. Some Conservative Members wish that those people would devote the same amount of energy to watching the progress on SS20s on the other side of the wall.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Are not all these problems an indication of how ridiculous it is to base cruise missiles not only in Britain but in the most populous areas of southern England? Is it not a fact that the cardinal principle of ground-launched missiles is that they should be mobile and not be detected? These missiles are not mobile. It seems that everyone from here to the Kremlin knows where they are.

Mr. Stanley: That is not the case, as the right hon. Gentleman knows. The Government and NATO were right to serve notice on the Soviet Union that the massive increase in its capacity to blackmail western Europe through the SS20s would not go unanswered by the West.

Mr. Viggers: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that such are the safeguards built into the cruise missile system that the only risk of deployment is a traffic accident and, therefore, the right action for right minded people is to ensure that deployment can occur without obstruction?

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. I am sure that all responsible people believe that deployment for training purposes is a necessary part of deterrence. Responsible people will enable those deployments to take place.

RAF Molesworth and Alconbury

3. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of Defence if he will make a statement on the development of RAF Molesworth and RAF Alconbury.

Mr. Stanley: On RAF Molesworth I cannot at present add to my answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 29 October .

RAF Alconbury is scheduled to be developed in support of the deployment of TR1 tactical reconnaissance aircraft, with construction planned to begin next year.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister proud of the fact that he is a member of a Government who have turned Britain into a police state against the miners? Not content with that, they are now crawling on their hands and knees to Reagan and the Americans and are prepared to bring conspiracy charges against the Alconbury seven to help site American missiles there? Why do the Government not send them back where they belong and drop the charges against those people? They are British people.

Mr. Stanley: I am proud to be a member of a Government, as are all my right hon. and hon. Friends, who have cemented the Anglo-American alliance which formed the linchpin of our security during the second world war.

Dr. Mawhinney: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the people of Cambridgeshire will not react kindly to any authority which allows to be established at Molesworth and Alconbury the type of peace-camp nonsense that was established at Greenham common? The people of Cambridgeshire do not expect to have to pay increased police bills as a consequence of any unlawful activity at Molesworth and Alconbury.

Mr. Stanley: I note what my hon. Friend says. Police bills are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I am sure my hon. Friend accepts that the important deployment that will be taking place at Molesworth should be subject to the necessary security measures to protect the ground-launched cruise missiles as and when they are established there.

Mr. Marlow: If Britain were to be the only significant territory within a nuclear alliance—NATO—on which no nuclear weapons were based, and if hostilities broke out with the Warsaw pact, would not the most likely area of NATO to be subject to nuclear attack be the United Kingdom, because the likelihood of retaliation would be rather less? If the United Kingdom were not to have atomic weapons on its soil, would we not be in more rather than less danger?

Mr. Stanley: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. If the Opposition believe that it somehow serves our defence interests to ask our most important ally to go back across the Atlantic, their logic escapes me.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister tell us when we shall reach a stage, such as we have at Greenham common at present, when what was originally a Royal Air Force camp turns into a United States air force base where we have little or no control over whether weapons are used in this country.

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to be aware that the agreement establishing ground-launched cruise missiles in this country was between the United States Government and the Government of this country.

Helicopters (Northern Ireland)

4. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received any complaints about helicopters operating in Northern Ireland, especially in the Crossmaglen and Forkhill areas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): There have been a few complaints, including some from the Crossmaglen and Forkhill areas. We are considering whether the levels of noise referred to in these complaints are sufficient to justify the payment of compensation by the Ministry of Defence. A decision on this complicated matter will be taken next year.

Mr. Dubs: May I urge the Minister to go to Forkhill and Crossmaglen and listen to local people? Is he aware that there is enormous feeling about the frequent helicopter flights? They sometimes fly as often as one every 30 seconds out of the military base at Crossmaglen. People who are by no means opposed to the security forces in general feel angry about helicopters flying at night 30 ft above their bedroom windows.

Mr. Lee: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. This is an operationally dangerous area. Many members of the security forces have been killed. There is a substantial threat from culvert bombs. Therefore, substantial helicopter activity is essential.

Mr. Key: Will my hon. Friend accept from those on both sides of the House who have been to Forkhill that people have a genuine complaint, particularly on Sundays when church services are upset by the noise of helicopters? Despite the security implications, will he do all that he can to ensure that only necessary flights take place on Sundays?

Mr. Lee: The security considerations must be paramount, but we shall take into account the points made, particularly about the sabbath.

Mr. John David Taylor: As I live in the same county as Crossmaglen and Forkhill and within 100 yards of the helicopter station, may I put it to the Minister that the vast majority of people in County Armagh welcome the presence of the helicopters and their constructive contribution towards the pursuit of terrorists? Is he aware that people have been killed even during church hours?

Mr. Lee: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's sentiments. I am sure that the security forces will also be grateful.

Mr. Duffy: Is the Minister aware that when more force than is reasonably necessary is used in sensitive areas, such as Crossmaglen, Forkhill and Derry, simply to appease Unionist politicians, not only is the infamy of the Black and Tans recalled, but the most notable and enduring casualty is the honour and reputation of the British Army?

Sir Humphrey Atkins: Sit down, you silly man.

Mr. Duffy: Say that outside.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lee: With respect, I think that the hon. Gentleman is overreacting. I am sure that the security forces do not use more force than is necessary in the circumstances.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: In view of the difficulty of operating helicopters in that region without infringing the border, is it not time that there was direct co-operation between the British and Irish Armies against those whom Dr. FitzGerald has described as the common enemy?

Mr. Lee: Relationships between the two forces are extremely good, but I take the specific point that my hon. Friend makes.

Mr. McNamara: Can the Minister say whether helicopters were used at the time of the Gransha hospital incident last week? Can he also say whether the British Army has now abandoned its stop-and-search policy in favour of a shoot-and-kill policy? Is he aware that the yellow card procedures seem to have been completely abandoned? Can he also tell us whether the two people killed by the British Army last week were first given the opportunity to surrender, whether there were any warrants out for their arrest, and, if so, why they were not dealt with by the RUC?

Mr. Lee: The services are, as always, answerable to the law.

Nuclear Missiles

6. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the equivalent numbers of nuclear missiles targeted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Warsaw pact countries on western Europe and vice-versa.

Mr. Stanley: As detailed on page 43 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984", the Soviet Union has deployed about 1,800 intermediate and short-range land-based nuclear missiles facing western Europe. The equivalent figure for NATO systems based in Europe facing the Soviet Union is some 300. Strategic nuclear missile systems would be additional on both sides.

Mr. Chapman: As there is clearly an imbalance in nuclear missiles in favour of the Eastern bloc, would not any simple nuclear freeze result in a greater threat to western Europe unless it were the first stage of an agreed, verifiable multilateral disarmament programme?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The fallacy of a nuclear freeze is that in the present circumstances it would merely freeze the very substantial superiority of the Soviet Union in this area and remove any incentive for the Soviet Union to reduce that superiority.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: Is not the question of balance in terms of the number of warheads completely academic? Does the Minister appreciate that if nuclear war broke out in Europe many fewer missiles than those now sited would create a very cindery situation in this country and mainland Europe?

Mr. Stanley: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the policy of successive Governments has been that multilateral disarmament should be on a balanced and verifiable basis.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Does the Minister accept that whether he is counting missiles or warheads, which he is not counting today, the deployment of sea-launched cruise missiles, not only in the waters surrounding Europe but in the Atlantic and other areas totally annihilates the potential for verifiable arms control?

Mr. Stanley: The deployment to which the hon. Gentleman refers is carried out by both the United States and the Soviet Union. In the short term, the Soviet Union is likely to have an operational capability for strategic ground-launched cruise missiles, strategic air-launched cruise missiles and strategic sea-launched cruise missiles.

Mr. Terlezki: As Mr. Chernenko is to visit this country soon, will my right hon. Friend give him a message to take back to the Soviet Union—that we want peace, but not at any price; that if the Soviets dismantle their nuclear missiles we will dismantle ours; and that the British people are not naive?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend summarises the message very well. The British Government want a more peaceful world, and a world that is also more secure. That means multilateral balanced disarmament by both sides.

Mr. Denzil Davies: When we consider nuclear missiles, must we not also consider strategic as well as Euro and intermediate missiles? On the question of a freeze, is it not true that there is a balance now, generally speaking, between the Soviet Union and the West?

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned multilateral talks. Can he tell us whether the British Government favour talks to cover both strategic and intermediate range weapons? As he is so keen on multilateral disarmament, will he also tell us whether the British Government will be present at those talks?

Mr. Stanley: Like the American Government, the British Government favour participation in both the strategic and intermediate areas. We have been taking part in the negotiations. We have been directly involved, for example in the talks on chemical weapons. Traditionally, strategic negotiations have been matters for the United States and the Soviet Union.

Defence Expenditure

7. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the level of conventional defence spending.

Mr. Heseltine: The defence budget for the current financial year amounts to £17·25 billion. Of this, some 97 per cent. will be spent on our conventional forces.

Mr. Cook: When will the Secretary of State realise that the electorate will not tolerate the kind of fob-off offered to my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) in answers to supplementary questions on question No. 1? Does not persistent dependence on a reduction in conventional spending inevitably mean that we rely more on the threat of nuclear arms and the sophisticated weapons that are being developed? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that persistent reliance on that strategy means that we will inevitably contribute to the destruction of the globe?

Mr. Heseltine: I take a somewhat different view. All Labour Governments since the war have followed the policies that I follow. I believe that we should continue to follow those policies, because they have worked.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Will my right hon. Friend spell out the implications of a decision by this country to scale down our spending on conventional forces to the levels currently maintained by our NATO colleagues? Would not such a decision mean the decimation of our conventional forces and place greater reliance upon nuclear weapons?

Mr. Heseltine: I believe that all those consequences would indeed flow from such a decision, together with another which my hon. Friend did not mention, but which I am sure he will accept, namely, the incalculable effect upon the credibility of the NATO Alliance of Britain's taking a decision dramatically to reduce our commitment to defence.

Mr. O'Neill: Will not the assurances given by the Secretary of State today have a somewhat hollow ring for the 1,000 people who are to lose their jobs in the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers workshops? Will they not directly relate any savings of that nature to a campaign to make money available for Trident in the future?

Mr. Heseltine: I do not think that anyone would seriously believe that that is the purpose of trying to get more value for money out of the defence budget, which, on all counts, we have a responsibility to do.

Light Aircraft Industry

8. Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from representatives of British industry about the opportunity to re-establish a British light aircraft industry during his evaluation of the tenders for the new basic trainer for the Royal Air Force.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Adam Butler): My right hon. Friend and I have received numerous representations from industrialists in support of the companies tendering for the new basic trainer aircraft including some reference to the wider aspects of re-establishing a civil light aircraft industry.

Mr. Lyell: Will my right hon. and hon. Friends remember that Hunting Engineering Ltd.'s Firecracker is a beautiful aircraft, which well meets the RAF's needs, is wholly the product of private enterprise, is wholly privately financed, and would provide Hunting Engineering Ltd. with a real opportunity to re-establish the British light aircraft industry?

Mr. Butler: I appreciate my hon. Friend taking this opportunity to press the case of one aircraft. Of course, what he mentioned is one of a wide range of considerations that we have to take into account.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Is the Minister aware that what remains of the British light aircraft industry is to be found in my constituency? Is he aware that no fewer than three of the contenders have connections with the Isle of Wight, where unemployment is now approaching 17 per cent. and where many of those who work in the aircraft industry are working a three-day week? Will he assure the House that he will take those facts fully into account when making a decision about a replacement for the Jet Provost?

Mr. Butler: We shall take those facts fully into account. Perhaps I might say something about the light aircraft industry. We have short-listed two aeroplanes, which will be made by companies which are not manufacturing fixed-wing aircraft at the moment. That means that we are prepared to accept that possibility. However, there are many other considerations that will carry greater weight.

Sir Patrick Wall: When considering these tenders, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that only the PC9, linked with the Hawk advanced trainer, will form a package that could provide major export orders?

Mr. Butler: There is no reason in theory why there should not be a package that involves the Hawk with another aeroplane.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Is the Minister aware that there is already a company in the light aircraft industry that has a worldwide reputation? Will he assure us that Shorts Tucano will also be considered?

Mr. Butler: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that we really need an aeroplane that meets the requirements of the RAF? The RAF has undertaken an extensive review of the technical merits of all of the aeroplanes at Boscombe Down. Does he agree that what is wrong in this procedure is the fact that the air staff target has set a speed that is far too low for the RAF's requirements?

Mr. Butler: I agree that the operational requirements of the RAF must have priority, but, as I have made clear today and previously, there are many other considerations. I hope that we shall be able to make a decision reasonably soon, and preferably before the next round of Defence questions.

Mr. McNamara: The whole House agrees that we require an aircraft that most meets the RAF's requirements. I understand that the overwhelming support for that comes from the PC9. Will the Minister confirm that, among the weighty considerations to be taken into account, there is not the fact that if Shorts get the order it will be made more attractive for privatisation? Secondly, will he confirm that if, for some strange reason, we have the RAF flying a Brazilian aircraft, thus becoming the laughing stock of NATO, that will not be done to enable us to have facilities to get down to the Falklands because of the Fortress Falklands policy?

Mr. Butler: I hope that the RAF will not be the laughing stock of anybody, whether it has an aeroplane that is designed in Brazil, Switzerland, Australia or the United Kingdom. There are many considerations to take into account. Relations with Brazil are important to Britain, as are relations with Switzerland, Australia and many other countries.

Trident Missile

9. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost in pounds sterling of Trident.

Mr. Heseltine: As I indicated in the answer that I gave to my hon. Friends the Members for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) and for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 13 November, the Trident estimate is currently being reviewed as part of the annual recosting of the defence programme. I hope to be able to announce a revised estimate to the House early in the new year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Have not the Government been patently negligent in failing to negotiate with America an offset agreement guaranteeing work to British defence contractors? Is it true that, apart from the submarine and the warheads, British contractors have won only £12 million-worth of contracts out of a multi-million pound contract and that Britain is retaining less than half of the total capital cost? What will the Government now do to defend the interests of British defence contractors?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman touches on an important issue which is of concern to me. When we decided to purchase the Trident D5 system, it was an existing system with existing contractors in the United States. That makes it especially hard for British industrialists to break into the bidding process. However, substantial opportunities are available and I hope that British industry will take advantage of them. I shall be looking to ensure that, wherever reasonable, without raising undue hopes, we are pursuing such opportunities as exist.

Mr. Leigh: Does my right hon. Friend see any significance in the announcement by Sir Charles Pringle, director of the Society of British Aerospace Companies, that the Ministry should look at the possibility of a home-grown Polaris system to replace the existing system?

Mr. Heseltine: It would be quite wrong to leave any doubt. There is no question of the Government's reviewing the Trident programme.

Mr. Strang: Does not the right hon. Gentleman's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) contrast sharply with the assurances that he and his predecessor gave to British contractors? Is it not now clear that about half the colossal expenditure on Trident will go on American technology and jobs? How many hundreds of thousands of jobs might be created in this country if that £5,000 million or thereabouts were spent in Britain?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that this decision was taken for defence reasons. The technology that we are purchasing is available in the United States, and it was considered that that technology gave Britain the best possible independent nuclear capability. That was the object of the decision. I shall do what I can to secure proper job opportunities in this country, but there is a limitation, for the reasons that I have given. The House will realise that virtually half of the Trident programme will be spent in Britain, and consequently very large numbers of jobs will be associated with it.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that deterrence vitally depends on our ability to inflict an unacceptable level of damage on a would-be aggressor, and that the important aspect of Trident D5 is that, for the next 30 years, it will possess just that capability, while many of the alternatives on offer do not?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The alternatives were set out and discussed in the open government document. As my hon. Friend rightly said, the Government took the view that this is the system most likely to create the deterrence upon which our ultimate peace depends. We believe that we took the right decision, and there is no prospect of changing it.

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the right hon. Gentleman expect the total cost of Trident to be in excess of £10 billion? Will he confirm that that is double the original estimate? Will not the most likely consequence be that this will put increased pressure on the level of our conventional defence expenditure? Does the right hon. Gentleman not accept that the result of that will be to heighten the nuclear threshold, thereby making nuclear war more, rather than less, likely?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will remember the open government document, which I have with me, which refers to the cost as £7·5 billion. Therefore, his arithmetic does not stand up even if his figures are correct. The House will appreciate that most of the change about which we are talking is based on changes in the exchange rates at today's money values carried forward over the next 10 to 15 years, when the House is not capable of reaching an informed judgment about exactly what the exchange rates will be.

Mr. Franks: In considering the Trident programme, will my hon. Friend take account of the necessity of ensuring that when the Vickers shipyards are privatised, control of those shipyards remains firmly in British hands?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that my hon. Friend's question will be drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has responsibility for that matter.

Mr. Denzil Davies: If, as the Secretary of State rightly said, no one knows what the exchange rate will be in the next 10 years, how on earth can he trot out these spurious estimates of the cost of Trident? Given the present state of the British economy, the likelihood is that exchange rates will go down rather than up. Even more important, will he confirm what he said earlier—that he has no intention of looking at the suggestion of a Polaris Mk II to try to get him off the hook of paying for Trident?

Mr. Heseltine: I can confirm that we are not reviewing any other alternatives. We did so at the time of the review of the options and arrived at our decision. The right hon. Gentleman asks how I can trot out spurious calculations to give costings to the defence Estimates. The answer is simple. I inherited much precedent from the previous Government, to which I have slavishly stuck.

Nuclear Weapons (Transportation)

10. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence to which chief constables and to which fire officers general guidance has been given concerning safety aspects of movements of nuclear weapons; and when such guidance was last issued.

Mr. Stanley: Guidance is issued to those chief constables and fire officers who have a need to know, and is kept up to date. For security reasons I cannot give details.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that this morning I received a letter on this matter from the Prime Minister, who says that guidance is given to chief constables and fire officers about the transport of nuclear weapons through their areas, "where necessary"? For the benefit of those who live in Leicester and other cities through which Chevaline and other missiles are transported, will he say whether the words "where necessary" mean that chief constables and fire officers are or are not told when such weapons pass through their areas?

Mr. Stanley: We are not willing to disclose which chief officers are notified, as that would involve disclosing routes and methods of transport.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the people of Leicester will welcome the news that such information is to remain confidential? Does he further accept that they are grateful for what has been done by the chief constable, the police and the fire services, and that any attack on them is completely unwarranted and undeserved? It ill-becomes the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) to behave like that and scare the people of Leicester in such a way.

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his responsible attitude.

Animals (Experiments)

11. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the types of animal experiments carried out by his Department.

Mr. Lee: Experiments involving the use of animals conducted by the Ministry of Defence are mainly directed at developing defensive measures against chemical attack. The Soviet Union maintains substantial stocks of chemical weapons and it is essential that our forces are protected. It is also necessary to ensure protection against biological warfare. Other work includes medical studies, including the study of wounding, and the diagnosis of disease.

The use of live animals for experiments is governed by the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876. It has been the consistent policy of the Ministry of Defence to comply fully with the Act.

Mr. Cox: Is the Minister aware of the ever-increasing anxiety of the general public about the barbaric experiments on animals that the Department allows to be conducted? Is he further aware that it seems that it is only by persistent questioning in the House that he will begin to outline the experiments that are allowed? What efforts is his Department making to find alternative methods of experimentation, if he claims that it is so necessary, rather than using defenceless animals?

Mr. Lee: Porton Down takes the lead in considering alternatives. The vast majority of the population, and of hon. Members, and all our service men and women recognise the necessary work that is done at Porton Down.

Mr. Key: Does my hon. Friend agree that, despite the comments of Opposition Members, there is no equivocation on this subject, and that the growth of non-animal-based toxicity tests has been rapid in recent years and months? Does he further agree that the tragic incident in India has highlighted the need for toxicity tests on cyanide, which are paralleled by the work at Porton Down?

Mr. Lee: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend and am grateful for his support. We resent some of the innuendo, abuse and exaggeration about the work of Porton Down.

Exercise Autumn Train

12. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the official reports on Exercise Autumn Train which took place in the Atlantic in November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Exercise Autumn Train 84 was this year's Fleet weapons training exercise. Some 20 Royal Navy and other NATO ships and submarines took part, as well as RAF Buccaneers, Nimrods and Phantoms. All participating units achieved considerable training value from the exercise.

Mr. Duffy: Will the Minister assure the House that the operational effectiveness of the Fleet and its aircraft was not seriously affected by a shortage of spare parts, notably for the Sea King helicopters which embarked with 814 squadron on the carrier Illustrious?

Mr. Stanley: There has been some difficulty in the supply of engine components for Sea King helicopters. That is partly a manufacturing problem. The overall stock of the Royal Navy is in pretty good shape.

Mr. Porter: Does my hon. Friend believe that the operational effectiveness of the Fleet was affected by the delay in ordering the type 22 destroyers? Does he accept that it is about time that the order went to Cammell Laird at Birkenhead?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend has introduced a difficult issue. As was made clear in the debate on the Navy, we shall try to resolve this matter quickly.

Defence Procurement (Memorandum of Understanding)

13. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the balance of advantage to the United Kingdom of the effects of the memorandum of understanding between the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy on defence procurement.

Mr. Butler: I assume that the hon. Gentleman has in mind the memorandum of understanding relating to the FH 70 and Tornado programmes. The answer is yes.

Mr. McWilliam: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer, but how can he be so complacent as to be satisfied with collaboration with companies such as Rheinmetall, when that company is now in court for supplying arms to Argentina via Spain—arms that were used against our men—and when that company is putting people in Britain out of work?

Mr. Butler: The memoranda of understanding and present circumstances show that for different reasons the balance of advantage lies with the United Kingdom in respect of both the FH 70 and Tornado programmes at the moment.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Fisher: When considering whether a pit should close for economic reasons, does the Prime Minister think it sensible or reasonable that costs such as surface damage, which may continue for many years, whether that pit closes or not, should be included? Given the interest in, not to say controversy about, the National Coal Board's accountancy system that has been stirred up, would it not be helpful and constructive if the Prime Minister were to set up a full review now to look into the accounting basis for pit closures?

The Prime Minister: No, the board fully accepts that management decisions on pit closures should not be based on a single accounting document, and that has never been its practice.

Mr. Haselhurst: Could my right hon. Friend find time today to consider how far my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has infringed his quasi-judicial capacity on airport policies by proceeding with the Civil Aviation Bill? Does she understand that there is grave concern among many hon. Members on both sides of the House that a fair decision on this matter is being prejudiced by the way in which matters are being handled?

The Prime Minister: I could not possibly accept my hon. Friend's strictures on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I am aware of what happened this morning, but the future meetings of that Committee is a matter for the Chairman of that Committee.

Q2. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 11 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cunliffe: Will the right hon. Lady reconsider her Government's mean and niggardly decision to cut old people's heating allowances for those on supplementary benefit by £1? Does she understand that this has caused considerable anxiety and concern in all parts of the House — a concern equal to that about student grants? Furthermore, will she resist any attempts by her Chancellor of the Exchequer to put 15 per cent. VAT on fuel prices, which will again cause severe hardship for pensioners and others?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman does less than justice to the Government's excellent record on fuel allowances. The Government are spending £400 million this year on help with fuel bills, and £200 million of this goes to pensioners. The level of the heating allowances has risen by 40 per cent. more than the increase in fuel prices.

Mr. McCrindle: Is my right hon. Friend as concernd as I am about the activities of the drug companies, which are suggesting that the very limited movement into generic prescribing is calculated to create two levels of health service? Will she place on record the fact that there is no reason why any patient should be disturbed, because the efficacy of those drugs being recommended is at least as good as those with brand names? Will she also express surprise that general practitioners and the British Medical Association are prepared to lend their names to this campaign?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I fully endorse what my hon. Friend has said. The House would have cause to criticise the Government if we did not get the best value for money spent on drugs in the NHS.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister aware that the youth training board of the Manpower Services Commission is recommending to the MSC that the pay of young people on youth training schemes should be increased to £34 next year? Is the Prime Minister willing to endorse that recommendation and so give assistance to young people on training schemes and their families, much as she did last week to deserving young people and their families involved in higher education?

The Prime Minister: No. I think that it is more important to get the maximum number of young people on the youth training scheme—[Interruption.] No. I think that it is much more preferable to get the maximum number of young people on the training scheme, to enable them to get jobs for which higher skills are necessary; jobs which would not be available to them but for that training.

Mr. Kinnock: There seems to be confusion in the Prime Minister's mind. There is no conflict between the quality of training, the numbers involved and the payment of at least acceptable rates of pay to young people. If the Prime Minister is interested in these matters, will she acknowledge that the youth training board is also interested in involving the maximum number of youngsters, but that it still recommends £34 a week? Will the right hon. Lady also accept that, because of the anticipated underspend in the next year, the MSC could pay £40 a week and still not exceed its budget?

The Prime Minister: If increases were to be made, resources would have to be found. The right hon. Gentleman talked about anticipated underspend. Precisely because of that anticipated underspend we increased other training services. The money has already been spent on other training projects.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister saying that after offering a guarantee to all young people—of which she boasts—that they will have education or training, she has been expanding other schemes by filching money from the funds that she was offering under that solemn guarantee to those young people? Will the right hon. Lady now answer the question? Does she think that young people should be properly paid, by the amount recommended by the youth training board—£34 a week—or does she think that they should continue to be underpaid?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman's last question was inconsistent with his previous question. In his previous question he said that an increase was justified because of an anticipated underspend. In his last question he said that we had spent the anticipated underspend that he proposed to spend on increasing the payment—[Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman said that we should increase the amount because of the anticipated underspend. I was telling him that because of the anticipated underspend we had already increased the spending. I am concerned about increasing the numbers of young people who are trained. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal is impossible without imposing extra tax.

Q3. Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Knight: Is the Prime Minister aware that claims made last week by an Opposition Member based on an article published in Accountancy that NCB accounts were a flawed instrument have been totally invalidated by the article being withdrawn—[Interruption]. The article's authors have admitted that they did not properly understand the accounting or decision-making procedures employed by the NCB and that they included factual inaccuracies in their article.

The Prime Minister: I understand from a press statement issued by the National Coal Board on 7 December that the NCB's members and its director general of finance yesterday met the authors of an article in Accountancy. The statement said:

"The board . . . explained how the authors had misunderstood the board's accounting and decision making procedures and drew attention to factual inaccuracies. The authors, who regretted that the orginal article had been circulated by the magazine before the board had an opportunity to discuss it with them, readily agreed to review the contents of their article.

The board . . . expressed their willingness to discuss with the authors their revised article."

Mr. Steel: Can the Prime Minister confirm that the £10 Christmas bonus for pensioners introduced by a previous Conservative Government in 1972 is now worth only £2.80 in real terms? Is the right hon. Lady continuing to refuse to uprate the bonus? Does she realise that comparisons between her and Mr. Scrooge are wholly unfair, because he was prepared to see the error of his ways?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that this Government have paid the Christmas bonus every year—unlike the last Labour Government, whom the right hon. Gentleman helped to keep in power. This Government will continue to pay the Christmas bonus. If the right hon. Gentleman wants more, will he tell the House where the resources should come from?

Q4. Mrs. Rumbold asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Rumbold: Although many people agree that the laws on Sunday trading need to be reviewed, does my right hon. Friend agree that the traders who opened last Sunday should be roundly condemned for opening illegally? Would it not have been preferable for those traders not to have opened illegally on Sunday but to have left the matter for Parliament to consider and reach a decision?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that the law must be obeyed until it is changed by Parliament.

Q5. Mr. Barron asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Barron: The Prime Minister said earlier that the National Coal Board does not use any one set of accounting figures in relation to colliery closures. Will the right hon. Lady tell the House why she stood at the Dispatch Box last Thursday and tried to defend the NCB's practice of using a single set of figures? What was said in the article about those figures has not yet been withdrawn. Have not those figures been described as a mine of misinformation?

The Prime Minister: I have made the position perfectly clear. The NCB fully accepts that management decisions on pit closures should not be based on a single accounting document. That has never been its practice. What I said last week still obtains—that, whatever the accounting procedures, the taxpayer has paid £1·3 billion subsidy to the NCB. That is a matter, not of accounting procedure, but of fact.

Q6. Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stern: Will my right hon. Friend take time during her busy day to study the recent conclusion of Professor Patrick Minford that the best possible way to reduce unemployment is to raise tax thresholds?

The Prime Minister: I accept the implication behind my hon. Friend's question that there is an unemployment trap because there is virtually no gap between the level of what a person can receive on supplementary benefit and some of the levels of pay, and because of the difficulties that occur when withdrawing certain means-tested benefits. It is vital to raise the thresholds. Under Conservative Government, thresholds have been raised by 16 per cent. in real terms, compared with a fall under the last Labour Government.

Mr. John David Taylor: Does the Prime Minister recall her assurance to the House last month that the United Kingdom would not pass on to the European Community super levy payments unless other countries were seen to be complying with the milk quota scheme? What is her reaction to the strange decision of the Commission last night to withhold from the United Kingdom's regular agriculture payments an amount equivalent to what it assumes to be the super levy due by the United Kingdom to the EEC?

The Prime Minister: This matter will be dealt with in the normal way, by representations to the Commission. What I said will hold.

Q7. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 11 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Forsyth: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the Wang factory which will be opened next week in my constituency by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and of the news today that Hughes Microelectronics has announced a £25 million expansion scheme in Glenrothes, creating some 500 jobs? Is it not a tragedy that the Labour-controlled local authorities which represent those areas are adding to the costs of these new businesses by squandering more than £1 million of ratepayers' money in support of striking miners?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I was very glad to hear the news about Hughes Microelectronics setting up in Glenrothes, which means some 500 new jobs. I agree with my hon. Friend that when local councils put heavy rates on business, ultimately it will drive away business from that area. Also, I agree with the implication of my hon. Friend's question that the strike is doing untold damage to the repuation of this country for value for money and speedy delivery.

Mr. Ewing: On a point of order——

Mr. Speaker: I will take points of order afterwards, unless they are directly related to questions.

Mr. Ewing: Yes. It is directly related to questions.

Mr. Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Ewing: I apologise for raising a point of order, Mr. Speaker, but I noticed that during defence questions when my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) raised a question you called the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) to give, quite rightly, a contrary point of view. I do not complain about that, but the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) has just made a scurrilous and untrue allegation against—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman had been watching the clock, he would have seen the reason why it was not possible to call another hon. Member.

M25 Motorway (Accident)

3.32 pm

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the serious motorway accident this morning which resulted in death and injury.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): A multiple accident occurred in thick fog over a length of some 40 yd on the westbound carriageway of the M25 at 6.15 am today near the Kent boundary with Surrey. I understand that 22 vehicles were involved. Wreckage has not yet been cleared and it is feared that at least nine deaths have occurred, but this figure may not be the final total. The total number of injured is not yet known.

The westbound carriageway is completely blocked and is not expected to be opened until tomorrow, Wednesday, at the earliest. The eastbound carriageway has been closed except for use by the emergency services. The police have set up an emergency telephone service for news of casualties. I thank all the emergency services involved in dealing with this motorway tragedy.

I am sure that the House will wish to join me in expressing condolences to the relatives and friends of those so tragically killed and in sending the injured our best wishes for a speedy recovery.

Mr. Adley: I thank my hon. Friend for her statement. I join in her thanks to the emergency services for yet again turning out at short notice in awful conditions and in expressing condolences to the relatives of those who were killed and to those who were injured, so near to Christmas, but may I ask her a number of questions? First, will there be a specific——

Mr. Speaker: Order. One question.

Mr. Adley: May I ask my hon. Friend whether a specific inquiry will be set up into this accident, as is done with other modes of transport, and whether the police have powers to close motorways in certain weather conditions to prevent similar accidents from occurring in the future? Will my hon. Friend now examine the attitude of her Department, which seeks to increase rather than to reduce the speed of heavy lorries?

Mrs. Chalker: In the event of a road accident, it is up to the police to decide whether to prosecute as a result of their inquiries, but I assure my hon. Friend that my Department will examine all the data, using all the relevant resources, to see what we can learn from this terrible tragedy. I can tell my hon. Friend that a 30 mph limit had been in operation for all vehicles throughout the night, in an effort by the police to prevent such an accident.

Mr. George Gardiner (Reigate): How regularly is this section of the M25 vulnerable to fog, and has it any previous record of accidents as a result of fog? Is my hon. Friend satisfied with the lighting arrangements along substantial sections of this motorway?

Mrs. Chalker: I cannot tell my hon. Friend how regularly fog will fall on any section of the motorway. To my knowledge, there have been no major accidents on this stretch of motorway, but I shall check and write to him about that. Motorway lighting, which may be helpful in some cases, is not necessarily helpful in fog; it depends on the height of the fog. I cannot say that the lack of lighting at the point of the accident was necessarily unhelpful until we know the prime cause of the original and subsequent crashes.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): Will the hon. Lady undertake to look into speed restrictions and their observance on motorways? Does not this accident show the Department of Transport's wisdom in resisting the pressure to increase the speed limit from 70 to 80 mph? The public do not generally understand that an amber flashing light warning of the necessity for a reduction in speed is only a recommended limit. Will the hon. Lady try to ensure that the law is changed to make that limit enforceable?

Mrs. Chalker: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman has just said. I thank him for his comment on the Government's common sense in retaining the 70 mph speed limit in good weather conditions. I am aware that the amber flashing lights are switched on by the police only when they believe that speed should be reduced to the level shown on the matrix signals. All drivers should heed that warning. In this case it was 30 mph, but it may be even less. Drivers should seek, not only to slow down, but to keep a sensible distance from and as far behind the vehicle in front as possible, so that they have room to pull up in bad weather conditions. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall look fully at all the evidence in the case.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I thank my hon. Friend for making a statement on this tragic accident. It gives the House the opportunity to express our condolences to all the victims. I support what she has said, but will she re-emphasise that on the motorways each driver depends for his life and that of others on the responsible driving of other people? It is only by keeping a safe distance and driving at speeds which suit the weather conditions at the time that safety can be increased and ensured. Too fast and too close is all too often the cause of this kind of tragedy.

Mrs. Chalker: I thank my hon. Friend for what he has said. He is right in the guidance that he gives. I would add that every driver should consider whether it is necessary to go onto the road in bad conditions, and, if so, to ensure that all his lights are in safe and working order and well cleaned so that he may be seen as well as see others. I recommend all motorists to look at paragraph 50 of the "Highway Code" entitled "The Fog Code", which contains sensible advice.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I do not wish to prejudge the cause of the accident, but will the Minister accept that many such accidents are caused by motorists going too fast? Will she urge the police to crack down on these law-breakers, especially those who travel at more than 70 mph?

Mrs. Chalker: I understand what the hon. Gentleman says. I do not yet know the cause of the accident, but there is no doubt that to drive faster than is safe in bad weather conditions, or in any other conditions, is motorway madness, as it has been dubbed. I very much hope that motorists will learn from this terrible tragedy that, whatever the weather conditions, they should obey the law, which lays down a maximum of 70 mph in good weather conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Will my hon. Friend consider the design of this motorway, about which she will remember I have had extensive correspondence with her? The problem is as much that of a traffic jam building up eastwards for many miles as anything else, as it is impossible to leave the motorway for a distance of about 20 miles. If there were only an interchange capability where the motorway meets the A21, many hundreds of drivers could have been eased out of the traffic jam which caused so much chaos for so many hours.

Mrs. Chalker: I do not think that any change in the distance between junctions would have made any difference to this tragic accident. I shall consider what my hon. Friend has said, but if drivers would obey the "Highway Code" and take notice of police advice we would not be dealing with a private notice question about a tragedy of the sort that took place this morning.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): In view of what my hon. Friend has said, will she seek the consent of the House to give the amber lights the full force of law?

Mrs. Chalker: As I said to the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell), I shall be examining the matter.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): The whole House will join the Minister in sending condolences to the unfortunate relatives of those who have been killed and injured. Will she consider closely the history of the lighting along this stretch of motorway, where several accidents have occurred, as there may be some connection between accidents and the lack of lighting? Will she bear in mind that there is no point in giving advice to motorists if it is constantly ignored? Will she satisfy herself that the police can impose restrictions where motorists consistently break the speed limit that is imposed in bad conditions?

Finally, will she tell the Secretaries of State for Social Services and the Home Department that it is not only on occasions such as this that we should remember the worth of the emergency services? The ambulance, fire and police services are increasingly under attack while doing their jobs. They need the support of a proper budget and the ability to provide proper cover at all times.

Mrs. Chalker: On the information so far given to me, I am content that the police will impose all necessary restrictions on a motorway when this is necessary. I am considering lighting on motorways. I cannot say that the absence of lighting was necessarily a good or bad thing in this instance.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will note what the hon. Lady said about the emergency services. I know of no circumstances where our emergency services have been anything but first class. They have been on the spot immediately. That should be said, whatever the political background to the hon. Lady's question.

Rate Support Grant (England)

3.43 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the rate support grant settlement in England for 1985-86.

In my statement to the House on 24 July I set out my proposals for the main elements of the rate support grant settlement for next year and listed the 18 authorities which I was designating for rate limitation. I have today laid before the House the main Rate Support Grant report for 1985-86 and I am sending rate-capped authorities notices advising them of the rate or precept limit proposed for them. Copies of all the material being sent to local authorities today are available in the Library and the Vote Office.

I have also laid today two Rate Support Grant supplementary reports. The third supplementary report for 1983-84 adjusts authorities' grant entitlements in the light of the latest information on outturn expenditure for the year. The second supplementary report for 1984-85 implements grant abatement for Liverpool city council, whose budget was received too late to be taken into account when I implemented grant abatement for all other authorities in July. Both reports also contain other technical adjustments to grant.

I now turn to the main report for next year. For 1985-86, for the first time, the Rates Act 1984 enables me to influence directly the spending levels of the worst overspenders by imposing limits on their rates. As we promised throughout the passage of the Rates Bill in Parliament, this means that rate limitation will benefit not only the ratepayers of the selected authorities but low-spending authorities, since I am no longer obliged to ask them to make cuts because of the excesses of the high-spending minority.

I have decided to confirm the targets that I proposed in July with two important changes. The first allows most low-spending authorities an increase over this year's budgets of 4·5 per cent. instead of the 4·25 per cent. I previously announced. This reflects the slight increase in the forecast inflation rate over the period. For the first time, targets for the lowest spenders imply spending increases in line with inflation, or, in other words, no further cuts in real terms, the second change relates to a particular group among those low spenders—namely, authorities such as Berkshire budgeting this year to spend not only below grant-related expenditure but at or very close to target. They will be allowed a further relaxation of targets so that they may increase spending by up to 4·625 per cent.—a little more than inflation—without incurring penalties. With these changes, the targets for low-spending authorities fulfil to the letter the undertakings that I gave to the House last January.

I have decided to confirm the stringent holdback tariff which I announced in July at the rate of 7p in the pound for the first percentage point of overspend, 8p for the second, and 9p for each point thereafter. I believe that it is only fair to match realistic targets with a strong incentive that they should be met. I propose, however, to continue to exempt from penalty increases in certain urban programme and civil defence expenditure and increases in expenditure on schemes jointly financed with health authorities. Aggregate Exchequer grant will be £11·764 billion. That is slightly higher than the figure which I proposed in July. The grant percentage is 48·7 per cent.

Following consultation with local government, I have decided on some limited but important changes to GRE assessments, affecting primarily the GREs for passenger transport support, highway maintenance, rate fund contributions to council housing and recreation. I have also increased the slope of the block grant poundage schedule. This increases the importance of spending in relation to GRE as a factor in grant entitlements and increases the marginal cost of spending about GRE for all authorities. Again, this helps low-spending authorities, since it gives more of the available grant to authorities spending at or below GRE.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): May we have a translation?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend may take it that it is good news because it gives more of the available grant to authorities spending at or below GRE.

In the light of this RSG settlement, I am issuing maximum rate or precept limits for the 18 selected authorities. Since July, when I announced expenditure levels for these authorities, it has been open to each of them to apply for a redetermination of its expenditure level at a higher level, but none has done so.

Rate or precept limits for 1985-86 are therefore based on the July expenditure levels. I am today sending out statutory notices informing each authority of the limit that is proposed for them. A list of these limits has been placed in the Library and is available in the Vote Office. In calculating the rate or precept limits, I have taken account of the expenditure levels set and the authorities' block grant entitlements next year. I have had regard also to the level of financial reserves available to each authority, making assumptions as necessary.

Authorities now have until 15 January to comment on the rate or precept limits proposed and to draw my attention to any relevant information of which I may not be currently aware. Unless I have comments by 15 January, it will, in the absence of agreement, be necessary to move on to the next stage of asking the House to confirm the rate limits by affirmative order.

The proposed rate and precept limits that I am announcing today will be warmly welcomed by ratepayers in the areas concerned.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Tell us what they are.

Mr. Jenkin: For 13 of the 18 authorities I have set rate or precept limits which are lower than the rates or precepts being charged this year. In the five remaining cases, however, the rate or precept will be lower than it would have been without rate-capping.

This year's average rate increase was the lowest for 10 years. If authorities budget to meet their targets next year, the average rate increase next year should be even lower. the first stage of rate limitation will at long last bring relief to ratepayers in the rate-capped areas. Moreover, rate-capping has allowed me to set much fairer targets for low-spending authorities. This settlement has meant increasing the provision for local authority current spending next year by £820 million above the provision in last February's public expenditure White Paper. In present economic circumstances, this is a reasonable and fair settlement, and I commend it to the House.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The House will be aware that if the Secretary of State had been bringing good news today, he would have announced it in language that we could all understand. Is not the irony of it the fact that he makes a statement in which he continues the trend which has currently, under this Administration, removed £9,000 million from rate support grant and placed increasing burdens on the ratepayer, when his colleagues in the Treasury are publishing a report which shows that, because of almost six years of Government inefficiency, almost £1 billion is being wasted through Government purchasing policy? That is far in excess of any alleged overspending by local authorities.

Is it not also significant that in the five pages of his statement, the Secretary of State never once mentioned the quality of services or the impact of the settlement on employment? The reality is that the provision for expenditure, despite the right hon. Gentleman's protestations, is 5 per cent. below what is required just to maintain existing services across the country. Have not the local authorities made that clear to the right hon. Gentleman in their discussions with him? Are not local authorities being aided for spending below the assessment of what is required of them for the proper provision of services?

How can the right hon. Gentleman believe that an increase of one eighth of 1 per cent. in targets—that is only for some authorities—will make up for the fact that the aggregate Exchequer grant next year is to be £110 million less in cash terms, which equates to £600 million in real terms? That is the measure of the reduction.

Will the Secretary of State say how many councils spending at target will receive less grant in real terms next year than they received in the present year, after taking into account his changes in transport supplementary grant? Will not most major spending councils receive less in real terms as a result of this settlement? When does the right hon. Gentleman expect to make his announcement about housing investment programmes and other capital allocations?

Is it not a fact that for 1 per cent. expenditure over target, authorities will be fined treble the amount taken away from them in the current year? That is, for every £1 in excess, they will have to pay £10 to the Treasury. Paradoxically, the Treasury has gained from authorities spending above target in the current financial year to the tune of over £500 million. That is how perverse the Government's financial arrangements are.

May I also ask the Secretary of State — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] If the Secretary of State insists on making two statements, one on rate support grant and one on the Rates Act, he can expect two lots of questions. He will recall saying on 24 July:

> "Rate-capping does not therefore mean that services must be slashed. The spending limits that I am setting are reasonable and should be perfectly attainable".

Is he aware that one of the most impoverished boroughs in England is being asked for a cut of 28 per cent., the city of Leicester for a cut of between 15 and 16 per cent., the London borough of Brent more than 13 per cent., Merseyside almost 18 per cent., the London borough of Haringey almost 14 per cent. and the city of Sheffield 12·5 per cent. Does he accept that that is the reality of the cuts in local authority budgets that he seeks?

It is idle to claim, as the Secretary of State does, that the derogation process somehow offers a way out. Is the Secretary of State aware that on derogation the Conservative leader of Portsmouth city council said:

"The thing about the redetermination is that it could come with strings attached that my council could not possibly accept".

That is the view of Conservatives in local government. [HON. MEMBERS: "One."]

Is the Secretary of State aware that in engineering rate decreases at the expense of the shire counties through lower grants being made available to them and at the expense of the Exchequer he has at last admitted what many Members and people outside have put to him—that because of the increase of more than £800 million in public expenditure that he has just announced under the rates Act he is spending £800 million to save £100 million?

May I say, finally——

Hon. Members: No.

Hon. Members: Yes.

Dr. Cunningham: Is not the Government's message to ratepayers the same old recipe—pay more and get less? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that people are increasingly realising that the Government are determined to prevent local democracy from working and to prevent elected councils from meeting their statutory obligations?

Mr. Jenkin: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman spoke a great deal of nonsense, but I will try to answer his specific questions.

Of course there is a reduction in the percentage of expenditure met by the aggregate Exchequer grant—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] That continues the trend of many years, including the period of the Labour Government of which the hon. Gentleman was a member. In 1976 the percentage was 66 per cent.——

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Here we go.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman may not like it, but he is going to hear the truth. The percentage fell to 61 per cent. under the Labour Government and it has continued to fall. Many people in local government, and the Association of County Councils in particular, support that development because they recognise that a higher proportion of expenditure being paid by ratepayers enhances local accountability.

The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) went on to ask how many councils spending at target would receive less grant. I can only advise him to look at the totals. There are a number of changes in grant-related expenditure assessment. A number of councils will receive more grant, but most, of course, will receive less because of the reduction in the percentage. That is perfectly clear. The hon. Gentleman persists in confusing the real savings that will be made with the necessary adjustment in the public expenditure White Paper figures to achieve realistic targets.

The figure that we expect to save this year through the operation of rate-capping, based on what the rate-capped authorities have shown that they would otherwise have spent, is about £400 million. Because of that £400 million, I have now been able to offer much fairer targets to the shire counties and to fulfil our undertakings of last January.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman asked when we expect to make a statement on capital spending. I know that authorities are anxious to know where they stand on capital, so that they can make their plans. I am sorry that we have not managed to make the announcements coincide, as they usually do, with the rate support grant settlement. I cannot yet give a firm date—we are still sorting out some of the details—but I hope to make an announcement quite shortly.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): If I understood my right hon. Friend's answer correctly as meaning that the Exchequer proportion of local authority expenditure is further to be reduced, how does that equate with the intention to reduce the rates burden? In particular, how does it equate with the effect on small businesses, on which the employment prospects of many people depend?

Mr. Jenkin: I can assure my right hon. and learned Friend that in each of the past four years the proportion of expenditure met by the rate support grant has fallen and that in each of those four years the percentage increase in rates has fallen as well. There is no necessary connection between the level of rates that a local authority levies and the proportion of its expenditure met by grant. What matters is the level of an authority's spending. By increasing their accountability, we are bringing greater pressure on local authorities to keep their spending firmly under control and to keep their rates down with a lower increase each year. I confidently expect that to happen next year.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): On the point referred to by the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), will the Secretary of State confirm that—leaving aside the cruel effect on many households—the extra burden on commerce and industry is £4,000 million? Does the right hon. Gentleman consider that the Prime Minister was entitled to make the remarks that she made at Question Time today? Does he accept that the arrangements that he has proposed this afternoon will further increase unemployment, and that many areas cannot stand any further increase?

Mr. Jenkin: On the contrary, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely wrong. High rates cost jobs. In many of the areas of highest unemployment, the rate reductions made possible by rate-capping will help to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): What persuades my right hon. Friend that the present system of rates is a more just form of taxation than central Government taxation? If, like me, he is not satisfied that the rating system is a just form of taxation, why does he increase the percentage of local government expenditure borne by that unjust system?

Mr. Jenkin: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's views on the rating system. I am sure that he will have taken comfort from my announcement in October that I have asked my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government to undertake a series of thorough studies into the whole system of local government finance. I hope that that process will produce a fairer and more robust system of financing local authorities and will enhance local authority accountability. I am sure that we would all welcome such an enhancement.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Does the Secretary of State believe that, by those figures, he can justify taking away over £2,000 million of grant from London in the past four years, because that has been the result? My borough has lost over £70 million in grant. Can the right hon. Gentleman justify the fact that, on the figures now announced, if Southwark spends the maximum that it is allowed to spend under the rate-capping legislation, it will none the less be over £1·5 million over the target above which it will be penalised? Is that logical? If it is logical, where does that logic lead us?

Mr. Jenkin: The ratepayers of Southwark expect to benefit from a reduction of about 25 per cent. in their rates.

Mr. Hughes: Thirty-three per cent.

Mr. Jenkin: The figure on which the rate limit is based is 25·74 per cent. Had Southwark been free to spend in accordance with the intentions that it had disclosed, the domestic and business ratepayers of Southwark would have faced an increase of 30 per cent. rather than a cut of 25 per cent. The hon. Gentleman would do well to keep quiet about the matter for a time.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): My constituents will welcome the fact that the three authorities to which they pay rates have all been rate-capped. However, will my right hon. Friend explain the justification for continuing the target and penalty system for rate-capped authorities, and for continuing the grant calculation system under which the GLC and the Inner London education authority will continue to receive no rate support grant? Is that not extremely unfair on Londoners? Could not my right hon. Friend arrange matters so that rate-capped authorities receive their fair share of the rate support grant?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend must recognise that it would be wildly unfair as between rate-capped authorities and those which fell just below the criteria for rate-capping, to impose penalties on the latter for exceeding their targets but not on the former. That distinction would be completely indefensible.

On this basis, the GLC will recover a marginal entitlement to rate support grant. However, both the GLC and ILEA spend so much more than their grant-related expenditure assessment that they remove themselves almost completely from entitlement to rate support grant. Were that not so, there would be less grant for everyone else.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): How can the Secretary of State argue that local accountability is improved by reducing the rate support grant to 80 per cent. of expenditure when that reduction is accompanied by fictitious penalties, targets, GREs and rate-capping? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his diktat to Merseyside county council will mean the loss of 3,000 local government jobs and the abandonment of statutory obligations? Can the right hon. Gentleman tell Merseyside county council which laws it should break and which statutory obligations it should renege upon?

Mr. Jenkin: There is no question whatever that any local authority faced with a rate limit is likely even to approach the level at which it would be obliged to break its statutory obligations. The authorities concerned are all high-spending authorities, which spend at least 20 per cent.——

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): On what?

Mr. Jenkin: —more than their GREA and at least 4 per cent. more than their target. The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) is quite wrong. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should study the precept limit that I have set for Merseyside. As the legislation requires, I have had to take account of the use of balances in the authority's accounts. Merseyside will still face a substantial precept increase next year, but it will be very much lower than it might have been. If the authority had continued to spend at the level at which it made clear earlier this year it intended to spend, the increase might have been as much as 100 per cent. Merseysiders must be grateful for small mercies.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): I welcome my right hon. Friend's proposals for target increases in those shire counties which have been most hard hit by targets after reacting responsibly and diligently to the Government's requests that they should reduce or contain expenditure. However, is my right hon. Friend aware that low rate increases in the shire counties are not the sole objective of a large proportion of the electorate and the ratepayers? People are equally concerned about the provision of adequate services. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the worst of all worlds is a high rate increase coupled with a cut in services?

Looking even further ahead than 1985-86, will my right hon. Friend give a commitment now to relax or preferably to abolish targets for shire counties in 1986-87?

Mr. Jenkin: I am glad to confirm to my hon. Friend that the increase in target for Wiltshire, at 4·625 per cent., is the highest for any authority. I am grateful for his welcome recognition of the steps that we have taken to acknowledge the efforts made by low-spending authorities. I entirely agree that ratepayers are concerned about standards of services. One of the advantages of the present rate support grant settlement, compared with all those that have preceded it, is that any economies that an authority is able to make and any extra efficiencies that it is able to achieve, instead of being clawed back under the penalty system, may be spent on improving and enhancing the quality of services given to the ratepayers. That is a perfectly fair outcome of the consideration that we have given to the matter in the past two months.

Mr. Janner: Does the Secretary of State not understand that it is undemocratic, unreasonable and unfair to penalise a well-run city, such as Leicester, for building up reserves under Conservative and Labour Administrations, precisely as a good businesslike operation would do? How can he expect a reduction of 56·61 per cent. in rates to be absorbed without destroying and causing chaos in services which all citizens need?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. and learned Gentleman has obviously not studied the figure of Leicester city council's reserves, which, on the information available to us, were astronomically high. It is unreasonable that ratepayers should be expected to add to such reserves. On the contrary, any sensible council with such massive reserves can reasonably be expected to charge ratepayers a lower rate. That is the basis on which we have approached the setting of a rate limit for Leicester. If Leicester believes that we have got it wrong, it has until 15 January to come and give us the true figures.

Mr. Janner: I shall tell the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jenkin: It is for the council to come in. I believe that the ratepayers of Leicester will cheer mightily at the prospect of a 56 per cent. reduction in rates.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be welcomed in areas which have suffered because of high-spending authorities elsewhere? Will Buckinghamshire be among the low spenders that will benefit from a permitted increase in target spending of 4·625 per cent.? Has my right hon. Friend been able to make any progress on the problem relating to Buckinghamshire's population?

Mr. Jenkin: The target increase for Buckinghamshire is not 4·625 per cent., but a full 4·5 per cent. because it has been budgeting this year marginally over the target. The highest increase in the target goes to authorities which have budgeted below GRE and target. I am well aware of the case of Buckinghamshire and several other authorities which have expanding populations. I am not convinced that the system works as unfairly in their case as they claim, but I am always prepared to listen to arguments about whether further adjustments and refinements of GREs are necessary to reflect that phenomenon.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many rate-capped authorities are planning to spend more rather than less next year? Does he agree that a sudden slamming on of severe cuts will produce chaos, confusion and real hardship for people who depend on local authority services and for local authority employees? Whatever the Secretary of State's argument with councillors might be, will he take steps to limit the impact of rate-capping on innocent bystanders who are not involved in this battle?

Mr. Jenkin: The local authority is responsible for the level of its expenditure. I believe that many ratepayers in Greenwich will welcome an 18 per cent. cut in the rates. Greenwich is that London borough the expenditure and rates of which have increased among the fastest in the country. It has become a byword for extravagance. It is for the council to decide how to live within the level that we have set. I am sure that Greenwich ratepayers will welcome an 18·9 per cent. reduction in rates.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): By how much would the ILEA precept have increased next year without rate-capping? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that further reductions could be made to bring the ILEA target nearer to its GRE?

Mr. Jenkin: The proposals for the ILEA precept will result in a reduction of 7·25 per cent. ILEA has published for next year a bogus budget of what it would have liked to spend. If it spent that amount, there would be a 12 per cent. increase in the ILEA precept. My hon. Friend is right. ILEA is notoriously extravagant and can make savings which would enable it to come closer to the GRE and so begin to be entitled to rate support grant. Several proposals have been made by the Conservative minority on ILEA.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): The Secretary of State referred several times in his statement to low-spending authorities. Is he aware that the average rate level in the London borough of Greenwich is the fourth lowest in inner London—way below that for Chelsea and Kensington and for Westminster? Is he aware that that is the case in spite of the fact that Greenwich has lost or had stolen by by the Government a larger—[Interruption.] Will the Secretary of State listen?—a larger proportion of its rate support grant than any other authority in Britain? Is he aware that his proposals will lead to the imminent loss of no fewer than 1,000 council jobs and a slashing of services to the elderly, the disabled and the poor? The Secretary of State's Audit Commission described those services as efficient and well run. Is the Secretary of State surprised that my constituents regard his attitude, and that of the Government, towards Greenwich as nothing short of unjust and vindictive?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. Greenwich's rates have increased by 112 per cent. since 1981-82. It has a high GRE because it scores high on several of the inner-city deprivation indicators, and therefore its base entitlement to grant is fairly high. That is as it should be, but it does not absolve Greenwich from running services effectively and economically. I shall believe the hon. Gentleman's cries of woe when I see Greenwich cutting out a lot of its nonsensical spending on advertising, police committees and the rest, rather than on services. By their works we shall know them. We shall watch carefully where Greenwich makes its savings.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to take into account the fact that there is another statement and then an important debate. I shall take questions until 4.30 pm. I hope that, if hon. Members ask their questions briefly, I might be able to call them all.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, as a ratepayer in the Lambeth area, I am delighted at his tough approach towards high-spending authorities and at his decision to abolish the GLC? Is he further aware that, as a ratepayer in Warwickshire, I am rather less enchanted with the news that he has given us, although it is a move in the right direction? Will he give a pledge that well-run low-spending authorities will continue to be looked on with the greatest favour in view of sacrifices that they have made in the past?

Mr. Jenkin: I thoroughly endorse what my hon. Friend said about Lambeth. I wonder whether he has noticed that Lambeth has decided that, for local authority tenants who owe more than £1,000 in rent arrears, for every £1 that the tenant pays off, he will be let off £4? I should have thought that the ratepayers of Lambeth would have something to say about that.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Housing benefits.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is quite right to mention housing benefits. These tenants are able to pay their rents but are simply allowed to go month after month without paying them. That is a scandal, and Lambeth ought to be thoroughly ashamed of itself.

Warwickshire gets the full 4·5 per cent. increase in target this year. It budgeted marginally above target for the current year and therefore qualifies for a 4·5 per cent. increase of next year's target over this year's budget. With regard to grant entitlement, Warwicksire loses probably less grant in percentage terms than many other counties. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah—less."] Of course, it will lose some because we are clearly reducing the percentage of the aggregate Exchequer grant. That is in accordance with decisions taken by the Government and our predecessors.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Is the Secretary of State aware that people came from all over the world to observe Sheffield's post-war housing take shape? Now in my constituency there is dilapidated and decayed housing, lengthy waiting lists and appalling repair problems. In view of his confirmed stringency and vindictiveness towards Sheffield, will he tell the House how far and on what timescale he expects to correct that regression?

Mr. Jenkin: I think that Sheffield should follow the example of some of its Labour-controlled neighbours and make arrangements for some housing to be modernised with the help and support of the private sector. The hon. Gentleman should look across the Pennines and see what has been going on in Salford, Oldham and other authorities there. They have achieved a substantial upgrading of the quality of life for the people who live there, and it is being done substantially at the cost of the private sector.

The ratepayers of Sheffield, who have been paying through the nose for years because of the extravagance of the council, will welcome the virtual rate standstill next year. It certainly would not have been so if Sheffield had been free to continue spending as it has been doing in recent years.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. Friend agree that Governments tend to lose the confidence of people when they speak in a language which people cannot readily understand? Does he know of any system of local government finance in the Western world which is more confusing and confused than this one?

Mr. Jenkin: I shall send my hon. Friend, together with a number of hon. Members, what I hope will not unkindly be called "A child's guide to the rate support grant system".

Mr. Cormack indicated assent.

Mr. Jenkin: I share his concern about its complexity.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Has it been helpful to the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Jenkin: Yes, it has been very helpful to me. It has helped me to understand the system, and I am not ashamed to admit it. I think that I now understand most of it. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) will feel that it is a helpful step. It is important that people should understand the system, which is not as illogical as it is sometimes made out to be. Obviously it is complex, but my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government is studying its complexity.

Mr. Corbett: Is the Secretary of State aware that in the city of Birmingham we are presently discussing rate increases of up to 100 per cent. merely to stand still, not to carry out any of the policies on which we won control of the council? In the light of his statement how does he propose that the first city outside the capital should deal with urban decay and a genuine crisis in housing?

Mr. Jenkin: Luckily for the present Labour-controlled authority of Birmingham, the previous administration budgeted economically. Birmingham is not spending in excess of its target and it is spending below its GRE. Birmingham will qualify for the 4·625 per cent.—the maximum increase in target. I recognise that Birmingham, as a major city, has financial problems, but they are not as serious as the hon. Gentleman tries to pretend.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I welcome any increase in grant support for responsible authorities, such as Havering, but is my right hon. Friend aware that until we have a reformed system of local government finance —he has only recently announced the inquiry—many of us will be concerned about the ever-increasing reduction in the amounts met by the Government and the consequent increases now carried by an inadequate local rating system?

Mr. Jenkin: I certainly understand my hon. Friend's concern. When I spoke about the studies that are being undertaken, I made it clear that a central problem that we need to examine is the balance between central and local government of bearing the cost of local government services. Clearly one wishes to achieve maximum accountability of local authorities to those who enjoy their services for the discretionary spending which rests with them. That is one of the points at the heart of my right hon. Friend's study. We want to ensure that we achieve a better, more robust and defensible system.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Has not the Secretary of State shown that he has no understanding of local government in metropolitan areas, such as Greater Manchester? Will he explain to my constituents who poorer and fewer services, higher rates and increasing unemployment are in their interests?

Mr. Jenkin: Greater Manchester and Manchester city have both been fairly high-spending councils. They have not yet gone above the level that we designated this year for rate-capping. I have no doubt that both authorities can make significant savings without seriously impinging on the level of services, if they are prepared to budget hard and economically. The ratepayers of Manchester would welcome the level of reduction that such action would bring.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Will my right hon. Friend accept my warm support for his statement that civil defence will not count in grant-related expenditure? Does he agree that the financing of old capital expenditure by local authorities should not prejudice the rate support grant, especially where it has led to greater prosperity? Is he aware that Harroate borough council will be affected considerably to its detriment by his statement?

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As he said, civil defence expenditure will be disregarded in line with what has happened in earlier years. Where authorities have in the past incurred large capital spending, run up large debts and therefore have interest charges, it would be extremely difficult to disregard those interest charges for the purpose of targets and block grants because they form part of each authority's expenditure. However, each authority must manage its capital expenditure so that the revenue costs can be borne within the guidelines laid down by Parliament.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Does the Secretary of State recall, when he made his statement in the House on 24 July, that in my question about the alleged high spending of South Yorkshire county council I said that I had not received any letter of complaint about the rates levied by the council? In answer, he said that he had received many letters from ratepayers in South Yorkshire complaining about rates. I then wrote to his Department asking how many letters had been received from people in Rother Valley, and he wrote back that he had received none in the past nine months. Has he received any since 24 July?

Mr. Jenkin: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that if South Yorkshire had spent at the level of the proposals which have been discussed within the council, the precept increase next year would have been more than 50 per cent. In those circumstances, we would have received a flood of complaints. As it is, South Yorkshire's precept will show a 2 per cent. reduction, which will be welcomed.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Has my right hon. Friend taken a look at rate-capping authorities, such as Derbyshire, which think that shoving up rates as fast as possible is part of their duty to their ratepayers and whose services in essenial work, such as education, are worse than those of neighbouring local authorities, such as Nottinghamshire and Birmingham? Incidentally, in Birmingham the Tory council cut the rates twice, yet managed, to find £1 million this year to promote its services in advance of a local election. When can we expect my right hon. Friend's strong right arm to be fully recovered to put a stop to such practices?

Mr. Jenkin: Next May the ratepayers of Derbyshire will have their opportunity to pass judgment on the extravagance of Derbyshire county council. No doubt my hon. Friend will lend her considerable talents to the same end. We are giving urgent attention to the question of spending on advertising. It will also come within the purview of the abuses inquiry, on which I hope to make a statement to the House fairly soon. The huge sums of ratepayers' money which local authorities are spending on what is nothing more or less than blatant political propoganda are an almighty scandal and cause great outrage among many ratepayers who, for the information of the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), write to me about it frequently.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Will the Secretary of State now admit that by continuing to reduce the grant he will either force up rates or slash services? Is he aware that in my area, which is one of the most deprived in the country, there is male unemployment of 26 per cent., and that we can afford neither? He is heaping burdens on the backs of those who are least able to bear them.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. Obviously he did not hear what I said earlier. In each of the past four years when the grant has been reduced, the average increase in rates charged by local authorities has also decreased. This year, the increase in rates and precepts will be the lowest on average for the past 10 years.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I realise the importance of the statement. Therefore, exceptionally, I shall allow another five minutes for questions, although I remind hon. Members that long questions lead to long answers.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that Leicester city council is well able to comply with the limits that he has set, because it has so much money in the kitty that it has been able to indulge in a massive anti-rate-capping campaign?

Mr. Janner: So it should.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. and learned Friend is right. He will welcome the 56 per cent. rate-cap that this limit implies.

Mr. Tony Banks: Surely the Secretary of State is aware that he is forcing Labour-controlled local authorities into illegality if they are to defend services——

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Question.

Mr. Banks: I said, "Surely the Secretary of State is aware" that he is forcing such authorities into illegality. Does the right hon. Gentleman relish the confrontation that he will undoubtedly have with Labour-controlled authorities in London? If the GLC does not raise a precept, which I would recommend it so to do, does the Secretary of State plan to introduce a Bill to allow the boroughs to raise a precept next year?

Mr. Jenkin: I am glad to read in the press that several of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues on the GLC have made it abundantly clear that they will have nothing to do with illegal action and that they will urge the GLC to precept lawfully, as it must do, by 10 March. If the GLC does not raise a lawful precept in line with the limit that I have announced today, or as may be approved by the House, it will be open to any London borough, which will incur extra costs because of the GLC's action, to take the necessary proceedings in the courts. I have no doubt that one or more will do so.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the residential and commercial ratepayers of London, especially those of the London borough of Enfield, will welcome his statement warmly? Were it not for rate-capping, what would the GLC precept have been?

Mr. Jenkin: Had the GLC been free to precept in line with what it was saying, it would have increased rates by at least 20 per cent., or from 36·5p in the pound to 43·8p in the pound. There is no reason why there should be a large increase in Enfield's rates next year, and Enfield ratepayers will benefit from the GLC rate standstill.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that his statement is wholly consistant with the Government's policy of reducing the standard of living of those least able to look after themselves and of reducing jobs? Would it not have been more honest for him to have told us haw many jobs he expects will be lost and about the deterioration in local government services?

Mr. Jenkin: I expect the significant rate reductions in many of the highest-rated areas to be a considerable encouragement to the private sector to expand its businesses and increase employment. The reverse has happened as rates have increased. There is no reason why jobs should not increase as rates decreased.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Bearing in mind the complexity of the child's guide which my right hon. Friend will circulate, may I ask him to produce a simpler child's guide? What are the implications of his statement for salary increases for local government workers, teachers and others?

Mr. Jenkin: We have made no assumption about that. The Treasury has estimated the GDP deflator for next year to be 4·5 per cent. That is why we have allowed an increase of at least 4·5 per cent. in the targets of low-spending authorities. I shall do my best to provide what my hon. Friend wishes. Perhaps a pre-natal guide would be the answer. It is a complex system, and if one is to do it justice and my hon. Friends are to understand it, the explanation must be reasonably full and, therefore, complex. My hon. Friend will probably find the paper that I have circulated to be interesting.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Is not the Secretary of State disregarding absolutely areas with high unemployment, aging populations and the need for more, not fewer, local government services? When my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) said that the statement would mean the loss of 1,000 jobs, the "Hear, hears" that we heard from Conservative Members were the real voice of the Tory party.

Mr. Jenkin: The points made by the hon. Gentleman about the unemployed, the elderly and other deprived groups are taken into account, through the GREs, in assessing the grant to which an authority is entitled.

Mr. Loyden indicated dissent.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I am telling him nothing less than the truth. If Liverpool city council is prepared to spend irrespective of its financial resources, it is bound to get into serious difficulties. I hope that even now the city council will see sense and not drag the city of Liverpool, as it seems bent on doing, closer to the brink of chaos.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, until the Conservative party takes control of Cleveland next May, there will be considerable rejoicing among Cleveland ratepayers about the action that he has taken? Not least among those rejoicing will be the members of Teesside chamber of commerce, which announced recently that if Cleveland county council continued to spend money as it has at least 3,000 jobs in the private sector would be lost during the next 12 months. He has saved those 3,000 jobs, and probably many more.

Mr. Jenkin: I understand that, but Cleveland is a high-spending shire county, and its target for next year will be lower than its budget this year. Cleveland must bring its expenditure firmly under control, or it will impose severe burdens on its ratepayers. However, the ratepayers will wreak their revenge next May.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall bear in mind those hon. Members whom I have not been able to call today, and will give them preference in the debate on the rate support grant settlement.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker—I am sure that I express the view of the House—for extending the time for questions on the statement.

Is it not disgraceful that the central message of the settlement—that grants to local authorities will be cut—had to be wrung from the Secretary of State in questions rather than being made clear by him in his statement? As he has now admitted that most authorities will receive less grant, does that not mean that rates in many Conservative-controlled areas will increase as a direct result of his cuts in rate support grant? Does that not mean in turn that the Secretary of State has failed completely to fulfil the solemn undertakings that he gave to the House on 23 January?

Is it not a fact that rates have increased twice as fast as the rate of inflation since 1979, and that the Conservative-controlled Association of County Councils said that excessive increase in rates was entirely attributable to the Government's action?

When the Secretary of State publishes his child's guide, will he ensure that it explains that if Labour overspenders reduce their spending to the level dictated by grant-related expenditure assessments, it will lead to less for the Treasury and for Tory authorities? To give one example, if this year all authorities had spent at their GRE limit, Tory Norfolk would get not £90 million in grant but only £56 million, and its rates would be 20 per cent. higher.

The Secretary of State said that he would sort out some of the details on capital. Is it not true that he is having a major row with the Treasury about the use of capital receipts? When will that row end? Given the screams of private companies about the potential loss of building orders from the public sector, will not the cuts over which the Secretary of State is presiding lead to a loss of jobs not only in the public sector but in the private sector?

Mr. Jenkin: I cannot add to what I said earlier, in reply to the hon. Member for Copeland, about the capital statement. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is wrong. I gave the percentage of AEG in my statement. The hon. Gentleman knows that the grant this year was 51·9 per cent., so when I announced that it would be 48·7 per cent. for next year I obviously meant that there would be a reduction. To say that this was wrung from me is absurd.

The hon. Gentleman also has it wrong about the holdback, which is the penalty suffered by those authorities which exceed the targets that have been laid down. The money goes to the Treasury, but the Treasury has made it abundantly clear, both in public and in private, that it would far rather forfeit that holdback and have authorities spending in line with the Government's guidelines, which are approved by the House, than have the penalty money going into its coffers.

I do not accept the figures about which the hon. Gentleman talks. What would be set would depend entirely upon the circumstances. I do not expect a large number of authorities spending well above GREA to come down to GREA overnight. Of course they could not do that.

National Union of Mineworkers (Sequestrators)

4.40 pm

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement concerning the indemnity that I gave, on behalf of the Government, to the sequestrators of the assets of the National Union of Mineworkers.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Why?

The Attorney-General: As the House will know, on 28 September this year, Mr. Justice Nicholls gave judgment on an application that had been made in an action by two working miners, Mr. Taylor and Mr. Foulstone, against the NUM. In his judgment, Mr. Justice Nicholls restrained the NUM from, among other things, describing the strike in the Yorkshire area as official, as it had not been called in accordance with the rules of the NUM.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Yes it was—under rule 41.

The Attorney-General: Despite that order, and in full knowledge of it——

Mr. Barron: This is sub judice.

The Attorney-General: It cannot be sub judice— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Attorney-General is only just beginning to make his statement. If hon. Members are patient, they may be called to question him.

The Attorney-General: Despite that order, and in full knowledge of it, the national executive committee of the NUM and its senior officials made statements that affirmed the strike as official. This was a deliberate contempt by the union and on 10 October, Mr. Justice Nicholls fined the union £200,000 and ordered the fine to be paid within 14 days.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that, if a matter is before the courts, it is sub judice. Is the Attorney-General correct to speak on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that this matter is not before the courts.

Mr. Barron: It is before the courts.

The Attorney-General rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Attorney-General is not talking about the judgment. I ask hon. Members to bear in mind that he is the Law Officer.

The Attorney-General: I am citing a matter of record of the court.

This was a deliberate contempt of court by the union and, on 10 October, Mr. Justice Nicholls fined the union £200,000 and ordered the fine to be paid within 14 days. He made it clear that if the fine were not paid, the union risked having its assets sequestrated. In imposing the fine, the judge said:

"A great and powerful trade union, with a large membership affected by the court orders in question, has decided to regard itself as above the law, and to make this plain repeatedly, emphatically and publicly on a nationwide basis."

The fine was not paid within 14 days and Mr. Justice Nicholls therefore appointed sequestrators, as he had warned the union that he would, on 26 October. The sequestrators accordingly set about taking possession of the assets of the union. However, by about 11 November, they had been able to seize assets only to the value of some £8,500. The vast majority of the remaining assets of the union, amounting to many millions of pounds, had apparently been transferred by the union to banks in various countries abroad, apparently in a deliberate attempt to put them out of reach of the court.

Mr. Skinner: Why not? Your lot do it all the time. There are gangs of them on the Tory Benches sending money abroad.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Attorney-General: The sequestrators, as was their duty——

Mr. Skinner: Have you got any?

The Attorney-General: The sequestrators, as was their duty, took steps in the countries in question to obtain possession of the funds that had been spirited away, and in particular instituted proceedings in the High Court in Dublin where they had traced a substantial deposit of funds. For the purposes of these proceedings, it seemed likely that the sequestrators might be required to incur considerable financial liability themselves, including having to give a financial—[Interruption.] Oh, do shut up.

Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the Attorney-General was referring to me. It would be helpful to the House if the Attorney-General could complete his statement, as hon. Gentlemen would then have an opportunity to question him. Interruptions from a sedentary position delay the proceedings.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): He is barracking the audience from the rostrum.

The Attorney-General: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker. I was not intending to refer to you, and I regret what I said. Sometimes, the temptation is difficult to resist.

In those circumstances, I understand that the sequestrators inquired — [Interruption.] This is really quite important. I have been asked particularly to come to the House and make a statement, and I hope the House will let me finish it.

In these circumstances, I understand that the sequestrators inquired from the High Court in this country whether this potential liability could be covered by funds at the disposal of the court. They were told that there were no funds available to the court for that purpose. There was no communication at any time between Mr. Justice Nicholls and my Department.

When I learned of this situation, it seemed to me to be contrary to the public interest to allow the risk of the sequestration being frustrated in this way. On the one hand, it was not right to expect sequestrators to incur this increasing substantial financial liability themselves, even though, at the end of the day, they could look for reimbursement out of the union funds. On the other hand, it was totally unacceptable that the order of the court, made following the non-payment of a fine imposed for deliberate contempt of court, should be defeated by the union's tactics of transferring its assets abroad and keeping them abroad. I therefore sought and obtained authority to give the sequestrators, on behalf of the Government, an undertaking to indemnify them against the costs and expenses that were reasonably and properly incurred by them in carrying out their duties in pursuance of their appointment by the court. In the knowledge that that undertaking is available, they are now pursuing actions in various jurisdictions abroad to recover the assets which were surreptitiously removed from this country. The contempt of court committed by the NUM will therefore be punished and the law will be properly upheld.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I thank the Attorney-General for responding to the Opposition's request for a statement. However, would it not have been better for him to volunteer the information himself, rather than entrusting the matter to the press spokesman at No. 10, presumably after he had been briefed on the law by the Attorney-General's Office? Given the Attorney-General's frequent incantations about his independence, does not this politically incestuous handling of the issue dent his claim more than a little, as his high office is not seen to be independent?

What is the Attorney-General's power under common law to give this indemnity? As the common law is developed through precedents, what precedents are there for this indemnity? As a matter of policy, have the Government decided to reinforce the law of contempt? What evidence was there of the risk of the public interest being frustrated, as the senior partner of Price Waterhouse and Co. is quoted on the tape as saying that the firm did not ask for this help, and it was unsolicited? As Price Waterhouse did not ask for the indemnity, does intend to use it, does not the Attorney-General feel that a hypothetical, or even real, need to protect the courts is outweighed by the disadvantages of his being seen to be intervening in civil litigation? Whatever his motives, is not the cherished impression of the independence of his high office tarnished?

The Attorney-General: I find it absolutely astonishing that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who is one of Her Majesty's counsel and sits from time to time as a recorder, does not seek from the Dispatch Box to support the enforcement of a High Court order.

If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had read the statement that I made to the House with the care that I should expect of him, he would have appreciated that the purpose is to ensure that the law is upheld and for the High Court's orders to be successfully carried out. By that I mean that the orders of the court should not be frustrated. We heard not a single word about that from the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. John Morris rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) again at the end.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Is it not a principle of the common law that where there is a grievance there should be an effective remedy? Would it not be a blot on the fair face of British justice if a plaintiff were debarred through lack of means from effectively obtaining this remedy?

The Attorney-General: I would always agree with that proposition, but the sequestration was not ordered to enforce the judgment in favour of one of the parties to the action. It was ordered following the non-payment of a fine imposed for deliberate contempt of court by the National Union of Mineworkers. Not only did the NUM make it clear that it would not obey the court's order, but it tried to defeat the order by transferring assets abroad.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Has this ever been done before? Is this an innovation which seems to many to have occurred, not because of the honour of the Attorney-General, which I respect, but because the Government are involved in the dispute? That is the impression in the country. I repeat the question: Is this the first time that this has been done? Is it not being done because the Government are heavily involved in the mining dispute?

The Attorney-General: This is the first time that it has been done. My researches show that this is the first time that when an order for sequestration has been made—[Interruption.] Such an order is made only when the court is satisfied that the person against whom the order is made has the funds to satisfy it. It is known that as long ago as last March the NUM had taken the money out of the country.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Do not the Law Officers of the Crown have a duty to the Crown to ensure that orders made by Her Majesty's judges on behalf of the Crown are not frustrated because those who are instructed by the court to carry out those orders do not have the means to do so? Is not the precedent the fact that never before has any body such as the NUM sought so perniciously to frustrate the workings of the common law of England?

The Attorney-General: With respect, I agree. It is important to remember that the sequestrators went back to Mr. Justice Nicholls and spoke of the difficulties they were having in being required either to find a bond or to give a personal undertaking about any damages that might be awarded against them in the action in Dublin if that action failed. They were not doing this for fun. They had been asked by the court to carry out this onerous duty. One can understand why they went to the court to seek assistance and to find out whether any funds could indemnify or guarantee them against the ever-increasing costs. The judge said that no funds were available which he could direct to be awarded to them.

Mr. Barron: They said that they did not want the money.

The Attorney-General: I am speaking of how the indemnity came about. After that, there was a real risk that the sequestrators, Price Waterhouse, might withdraw—[Interruption.] They have said only that they did not seek funds from me. They sought assistance from the court and the court was unable to give it. I, as the guardian of the public interest, have no alternative but to give it.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): But is the Attorney-General not aware that, by paying the hounds after the NUM's money, the Government are directly participating in the strike because they are trying to cripple the union financially? Does he agree that this is an act without parallel and that it should now be stopped? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman further aware that in the end the Government and those hounds whom he is paying will not pay the cost because the Government will force it from the miners who will pay in the end?

The Attorney-General: I regret very much that the right hon. Gentleman, for whom I have great regard and respect, should fail to make the distinction between the Government and the courts.

Mr. Mason: The Government are directly involved.

The Attorney-General: Everything that has happened, from the first action—brought by two working miners, not by the Government—to the injunction to the union and the executive that they should not call the strike official, to the imposing of the fine of £200,000 and to the entry of the sequestrators, has nothing to do with the Government. They have been carried out by an independent High Court judge. — [Interruption]. The only thing that I have done—it is so simple—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is simple all right."]—and so self-evident — is that I have said that if the sequestrators were unable to go on because they were not in funds, the Government would indemnify them. That was done so that the court's orders would not be frustrated.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the contempt by the NUM leadership strikes at the very root of the rule of law? Does he agree that, if such contempt is allowed to continue, it will undermine the basis on which our society exists and that his action in providing an indemnity will be widely welcomed throughout the country, since he has correctly identified a matter of great national interest?

The Attorney-General: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Does the Attorney-General accept that there is a fine dividing line between the province of the judiciary and the province of the Executive? Is he aware that it appears to many people that such a blatant act by the Attorney-General oversteps that line? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he sought authority to give the indemnity. From who did he seek that authority? Were the Prime Minister and other Cabinet members involved in giving that authority?

The Attorney-General: I consulted relevant Ministers. That is all that I shall say about that. It is important to remember—[Interruption]—that there are two alternatives. One was that the sequestrators did not manage to obtain any money and had to give a financial undertaking to the court in Dublin—[Interruption.] I am trying to make a sensible and important point to the House.

Mr. Flannery: You are not doing it very well.

The Attorney-General: I shall start again. There were two alternatives. One was that the sequestrators would be advised by their lawyers that they could not accept an open-ended financial commitment in the case in Dublin and would therefore withdraw. The other alternative was for them to be supported, if possible by the court. They went to the court and were told that the court did not have the funds to do that. It seems so simple that an order of the High Court should be enforced. As guardian of the public interest, I was the only person who could do that.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the argument presented against his action is absolutely bogus, that the country will learn the attitude of Opposition Members, which is to uphold contempt for the rule of law, that the law would be an ass if the orders of the court could not be enforced and that the country is wholeheartedly behind my right hon. and learned Friend in taking seriously his position as the protector of the public interest in this matter?

The Attorney-General: That is put as well as, if not better than, I put it myself.

Mr. Michael Welsh (Doncaster, North): Some individuals—wrongly, in my opinion—have taken civil action against the NUM in the courts. What does that have to do with the Attorney-General?

The Attorney-General: Again, the hon. Gentleman is completely missing the point. I am not concerned in the matter and never have been. It has always been a case of two working miners against senior officials. The Government are neither concerned nor involved. There is no Government counsel or advice.

At the end of the day, the court made an order which was deliberately and flagrantly ignored. The court then imposed a fine of £200,000, which was ignored. The court then put in the sequestrators, who are liable to run out of money——

Mr. Flannery: What—Price Waterhouse?

The Attorney-General: There is no reason why Price Waterhouse should involve its partners in ever-increasing financial risk. That cannot be the responsibility of any ordinary commercial firm.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is it not a sad day for the Labour party when there is a deliberate contempt of court by a major union that regards itself as above the law and says so, but no Opposition Member is prepared to uphold or support the enforcement of the law?

The Attorney-General: After the intervention by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), I sought to say that we would have liked to hear an Opposition Member say that he wanted the order of the court to be enforced. We have not heard that from one Opposition Member.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does not the Attorney-General agree that, as this precedent has been created, any future plaintiff who finds—as many have over the years—that the defendant has moved his assets can now receive an indemnity from the Government while tracing takes place? Does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that this unique precedent has been created for purely political purposes?

The Attorney-General: I can just envisage the hon. Gentleman, who is a solicitor, seriously advising his clients in that way.

Hon. Members: You have done it.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): Assuming that the Attorney-General has much unprecedented power, is it not the case that he has had that power for centuries? Have there not been cases of contempt involving sequestration over the centuries? Why has he chosen to use this power now, in this particular case and at this particular time? Should not the right hon. and learned Gentleman answer that question to avoid the charge that he has acted not as an officer of the Crown but as a servant of the Government?

The Attorney-General: Sequestration can apply in a number of cases. It can be applied for on behalf of one party to an action who has succeeded against the other party. But this is sequestration not on behalf of either of the two plaintiffs, but because it is a contempt of court and a fine was imposed by the court. It would not go to the benefit of either of the plaintiffs. It is an attempt by the sequestrators to enforce the order of the court. There was a real likelihood that that order would be frustrated——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): That is the court's province, not yours.

The Attorney-General: In answer to that I must tell the House that the court was powerless because it had no funds.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that his explanation is anything but satisfactory? Indeed, he shot himself in the foot two or three times. A serious aspect of the matter is that his legal impartiality is now under question. How can he tell the House that, since the order was imposed by the courts, Price Waterhouse could not fund the carrying out of the duty placed on it by the courts? Indeed, suggesting that is, to some extent, a slander on Price Waterhouse, which can easily afford the funds. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that the money will be obtained and the miners will have to pay for all the legal proceedings. Therefore, his statement is most unsatisfactory.

The Attorney-General: The problem is that, if someone is determined to approach the matter with such prejudice — in the way that the hon. Gentleman has demonstrated—there is no point in my seeking to make him see the ordinary, straightforward, honest approach that needs to be taken. I, as guardian of the public interest, have a duty to ensure that the orders of the courts are enforced.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the vast majority of people in this country will fully understand the very clear explanation that he has given for his actions——

Mr. Flannery: Speak for yourself.

Sir Ian Percival: The people will have great respect for my right hon. and learned Friend's courage in taking his action and will share the view that it is a sad day when not a single voice is heard from the Opposition Benches upholding the rule of law. Will they not see it for what it is — an attempt by the Opposition to make cheap political capital out of my right hon. and learned Friend's determination to ensure that the rule of law prevails?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend. That was the reason—and the only reason—that I granted the indemnity.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): As the Attorney-General is the protector of the public interest, where in law does he have the right to involve political Ministers in advice on and discussions about such an extremely sensitive matter?

The Attorney-General: It is not a matter of whether someone is to be prosecuted, where the law imposes a single duty upon me, but with a right — as Lord Shawcross said clearly in 1946 — to consult, although not to be bound by advice. This is an entirely different position. There was a risk that the law would be frustrated. I therefore consulted certain Ministers and drew to their attention what had happened, especially in Dublin, and gave advice on what I thought was the proper course to adopt, and in the end was authorised to grant indemnity.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that this House has the responsibility of Supply. Will he tell us under which Vote he has made these moneys available?

The Attorney-General: That is entirely a matter for the Treasury. The necessary documents were laid before the House yesterday by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is clearly contrary to the public interest that the NUM should defeat the court's orders by salting away money outside the jurisdiction? Does he further agree that he is doing no more than his public duty in granting the indemnity? Is it not almost certainly in the interests of the ordinary miners within the NUM that the money is brought back into this country with all possible speed?

The Attorney-General: That appears to be the view of the judge who ordered the appointment of a receiver. The House must realise—however unpalatable it may be to Opposition Members, especially the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who never stops intervening from a sedentary position — that the courts are the Crown courts and that the pubic interest requires that their orders should not be defied.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Is the Attorney-General aware that it is absolutely right that the sequestrators should be enabled to carry out their job, but as the High Court has made this judgment, is it not right that it should will the means to carry out that judgment? If it cannot do so, will the Attorney-General make a statement about the situation and look into the possibility of finding the means for its judgment to be carried out? If there was no consultation between the judge and the Attorney-General, could the Attorney-General tell the House from whom he understood that Price Waterhouse had approached the court?

The Attorney-General: As for willing the means—that is the reason why the sequestrators went back to Mr. Justice Nicholls—it was hoped that he would have the means. But he does not. The High Court has the means to pay witnesses, and small items like that, but not to provide the sort of funds that might be necessary in this case. As for the information which was obtained, it was obtained partly from the registrar as a result of inquiry and partly from the newspapers, because the Dublin case was quite widely reported. I am not sure whether Clifford Turner, the solicitors, provided information.

Mr. Barron: May I thank the Attorney-General for at least being honest enough to admit to the House that the action which he has supposedly taken was not asked for by the sequestrators? Would it not be more truthful if he went on to say that the person who brought the action to bear was the very person from whose office Mr. Bernard Ingham yesterday gave a press conference before this House knew anything about it—namely, the right hon. Lady the Prime Minister? That is where the political involvement relating to this court action came from. It would be more honest for the Attorney-General to stand up and admit that to this House than to try to hide behind this obnoxious way of saying in effect that he knew that he had to pay it but that nobody had asked for it to be paid.

The Attorney-General: The entire initiative came when the matters were put before me.

Mr. Tony Banks: By whom?

The Attorney-General: Nothing came from No. 10. [Interruption.] I am speaking of the time when I first looked into the matter and the matters were put before me. As a result, I consulted certain colleagues, informed them of the position and obtained the authority to give the indemnity about which I have told the House.

Mr. Redmond: Will you confirm that by your actions you are seeking to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not me.

Mr. Redmond: Will the Attorney-General confirm that, by the actions which have been taken, he is seeking to influence matters which are now before the courts? Will the Attorney-General be honest enough to tell the House when this idea first entered his head and who put it there?

The Attorney-General: The matter was put before me within 48 hours, if not a day, of the failure of the sequestrators to persuade the judge to will the means, to use the words of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), because he did not have any means that he could will. It was thereafter, as a result of further inquiries, that I realised that there was an appreciable risk that the sequestrators might say that they could not go on.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): How did you know?

The Attorney-General: I spoke to them.

Mr. Orme: They did not answer.

The Attorney-General: After I had obtained the authority, I spoke to the sequestrators and was told that in their own minds they had set a limit beyond which they would not go. They had not reached the limit, but they were not far from it.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): If the matter was as simple as the Attorney-General keeps saying, why is it that nobody else who has held his office from either party, for very many years, has discovered this simple way of dealing with matters? My impression is that the Attorney-General has been incapable of explaining the matter simply to the House. In fact, he has had a tottering time. The Attorney-General ought to know that the sequestrators could get hold of £200,000 quite easily, because £200,000 is to be found in those areas where miners are working. That money has not gone to the national office. If the sequestrators wanted to get their hands on £200,000 they would only have to go to Nottingham, Leicester, South Derby. All the money is there. Is not the truth of the matter that what the Attorney-General and in particular the Prime Minister are up to is using the judges, the police and all the echelons of the establishment in order to smash the NUM? They hope that if they get away with that, the result will be that the rest of the trade union movement will fall like a pack of dominoes. It is a political decision from beginning to end and the country, thank God, is beginning to see just how much this lousy, rotten Government are involved.

The Attorney-General: I think that the country has now heard that broken record so much that they are fed up to the back teeth with it.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the Attorney-General tell the House whether or not Price Waterhouse would have pulled out of their duties if he had not given this guarantee to them?

The Attorney-General: I cannot say that. All I can say is that there must be a limit to how much an ordinary firm is prepared, at the request of the court, to take on in a duty of this kind without being able in the end to be absolutely satisfied that it will recover its money. It is the partners' money and other people's money. It is not just the firm's money.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Is the Attorney-General aware that there is as much sorrow as there is anger on this side of the House that the Government, having brought the police into disrepute, during the course of this dispute, now appear to be bringing the courts and the law into disrepute? Will the Attorney-General reflect on the political nature of the decision and now answer the specific question which was put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) on whether or not an important precedent is being set?

The Attorney-General: No precedent is being set, because I do not think there has ever been a case in which an order for sequestration has been made in which it was discovered, when the sequestrators went about their duties, that £8,250,000 had been squirreled out of the country and had to be obtained from places as far apart as Dublin, Luxembourg and Switzerland.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there are some rebellious and politically unmanageable elements to be found on his Back Benches but that, when he upholds the due processes of law and facilitates their implementation, there is unequivocal support for what he does?

The Attorney-General: I shall not comment on the first part of my hon. Friend's question, but I am very grateful to him for what he said subsequently.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): We know of the attitude of the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) towards what happened at Grunwick, but is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that today he has lost a great deal of credibility? The reason is that he has acted as a pawn of the Government in trying to undermine the strike of the National Union of Mineworkers.

The Attorney-General: I could not have believed that not a single Member of the Opposition would be prepared to speak in support of the law.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that on the issue the Government, and in particular the Attorney-General, who has fought with his back to the wall, who has not properly answered a single question today and who has repeatedly lost his temper, are impailed upon the horns of a dilemma because they have been asked questions this afternoon to which they have no answer? Will the Attorney-General tell us which law of this country allows the Attorney-General and the Government to come forward with moneys which could not be obtained by the two scabs who were getting money from business men all over the country, and which sets a precedent that he has been unable to explain to the House in any acceptable way? Is it not a fact that during the last half hour his personal credibility has been totally destroyed?

The Attorney-General: Every Minister has a power to give an indemnity in the right circumstances. I gave an indemnity for one reason only; that is, that I believe that the rule of law——

Mr. Flannery: Which law?

The Attorney-General: —and the orders of our courts should be enforced.

Mr. Flannery: The right hon. and learned Gentleman still has not answered.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does not the Attorney-General now appreciate that for him to have acted in an unprecedented and highly politically partisan manner has compounded the grave dismay which he caused earlier this year when he seemed to be offering advice to judges in advance of court proceedings concerning the miners' dispute? Will he now confirm to the House that the Prime Minister was consulted and agreed before he gave the indemnity that he has given? Will he also confirm that the expenses of court receivers who have been appointed, including active members of the Conservative party, are also covered by the indemnity?

The Attorney-General: The hon. Gentleman knows that that last comment is ridiculous. I confirm that I consulted the appropriate Ministers; that includes a Treasury Minister because Treasury approval for the payment, if it were ever called up to be made, would have to be given. That is as far as I am prepared to go.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does the Attorney-General accept that Price Waterhouse received special treatment? Is that treatment now to be the normal course of events in similar cases?

The Attorney-General: I have said many times to the House that, despite constant references to similar cases, this is a unique case so far as the NUM is concerned. It is a unique case, in which the NUM has deliberately sought to put beyond the reach of the courts over £8 million. That is unique.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Attorney-General and several of his hon. Friends seem to be suggesting that somehow the NUM has acted illegally in moving money abroad. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not accept that that money was moved abroad lawfully largely because the Government removed exchange controls? If those exchange controls had not been removed, the money could not have been shifted. As that was the Government's action, would it not be more appropriate for the Conservative party, rather than the present Administration, to pay the sequestrators' expenses?

The Attorney-General: One of the problems is that the sequestrators' expenses have been grossly inflated by the money having been moved abroad because action has had to be taken in the Isle of Man, Dublin, Switzerland and Luxembourg in addition to the ordinary costs here. Therefore, that has amounted to a great deal of money. That is one of the reasons why it is a much higher figure than it otherwise would be.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): After the exchanges over the past 40 minutes, would my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the one fact which the Opposition appear to be determined to ignore is that the sequestrators were appointed by the court for the purpose of enforcing the order of the court? Is it not right that, if my right hon. and learned Friend did not support the court in that action, that would be an attack on the rule of law in Britain which hon. Members opposite might well come to regret?

The Attorney-General: I am very grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend. I have sought to say that in a variety of words. I am grateful to him for the clear way in which he has expressed it.

Mr. John Morris: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman realise that he has failed to answer a single one of my questions, but instead sought to question my integrity? He may not be aware that on the Floor of the House in a debate in May, and on radio and television, I have repeatedly said that the law must be upheld and that whoever is in breach of it must be punished. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may wish to reflect on that and reconsider his comment.

Why does the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that the court is powerless? Mr. Justice Nicholls did not ask for his help and Price Waterhouse did not solicit his help. When he tells the House that there must be a limit for ordinary firms, what evidence is there for that and for the decision that he has taken? Will he be good enough to place that evidence in the Library?

Lastly, why does the right hon. and learned Gentleman arrogate to himself the decision on the gravity of the offence? Is that his role? Is that not for the courts themselves? Given that he has revealed that there is no precedent at all for this, now that he says that he is the guardian of the public interest, what precisely is his authority at common law for his decision?

The Attorney-General: The right hon. and learned Gentleman asks why I say that the court is powerless. The judge made it clear that there was no way in which he could assist when Price Waterhouse sought assistance for its case in Dublin. I should have thought that a fine of £200,000 for a deliberate contempt of court was in anybody's eyes a serious offence. Nothing more needs to be said about that. [Interruption.] It is a matter of opinion. Hon. Members do not have to agree with me. I happen to think that it a serious offence.

I have said many times that there is no precedent of which I know in which, when an order for sequestration has been made, it has been found that a large sum of money, in excess of £8 million, has been put, so far as possible, beyond the reach of the courts. The authority for the indemnity is the authority under which any Minister has the right to grant one as long as it is put before the House at the necessary time, as this one was.

Statements by Ministers

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that last week at Scottish Question Time there was considerable debate on teachers' pay. That matter has been raised on a number of occasions since and there is to be an Adjournment debate tonight. I am advised that at approximately 4.10 pm the Secretary of State for Scotland put in the Library the answer to a written question from the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth). I am equally advised that he held a briefing beforehand with the Lobby to advise it of his written answer. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you do not have the power to make a Minister make a statement, but is it courteous to the House and within the procedures of the House for a Secretary of State to discuss that matter with the press before his written answer is available to hon. Members in the Library?

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The reply that the Secretary of State gave and placed in the Library is not worth wasting the time of the House on. The whole thing is a lot of rubbish. It is not worth wasting the time of the House by making a statement.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I first dissent from the view taken by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing)? The answer given by the Secretary of State for Scotland was full of ambiguities and could be considered by many to be a bit of a con trick. Nevertheless, it would have been advantageous for Scotland if that answer had been given in the House so that we could have put many important questions to him. Last week, Scots Members were placed in a difficult situation, as indeed you were, Mr. Speaker, by the lack of a statement. Something must be done in future to make the Secretary of State for Scotland answer for his important decisions to Members representing Scottish constituencies.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. When Ministers of the Crown are constantly and continuously making fairly important decisions that will involve widespread disruption in classrooms in Scotland in the form of written answers rather than statements on which they can be cross-examined, it must surely be within the power of the Chair to protect the rights of Back Benchers and somehow to bring influence to bear to stop that practice in future.

Mr. Speaker: The House well knows my view. I stated it yesterday and I state it again today. The House of Commons should always be told before the press. If there is an embargo on those matters they should be held up until the statement has been made, if a statement is to be made. Whether written answers are given is not a matter for me. There is an Adjournment debate tonight and no doubt those matters willl be aired then.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. Skinner: This is a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been drawn to my attention that there is more than a little controversy over Stansted airport. I am not involved in any way, but I listen to what is going on and I know that representations have been made for statements to be made by the Government and for leave to table private notice questions, for example. However we shall not go into that because—[AN HON. MEMBER: "What is the point of order?"] Mr. Speaker decides whether there will be private notice questions.

We understand, Mr. Speaker, that you are placed in a difficult and sensitive position. However, the Secretary of State for the Environment is involved in the Stansted issue. Apparently he has said that he is not having anything to do with the decision-making and that has been given to his No. 2, "Supergrass" — the Minister for Housing and Construction. It is reported that Mrs. Jenkin has said on behalf of her husband and for herself, "We do not want the airport here." I should like to know who will make the decision. I think that you should call the Secretary of State to account, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter on which I cannot, and perhaps should not, rule.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Further to your previous reply, Mr. Speaker. On previous occasions when I have raised with you the issue of the Secretary of State for Scotland making statements to the press before he has issued them to the House, you have said that you disapprove of the practice and that it should not happen. May I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker? What sanction does the House have when the Secretary of State, in spite of your ruling, continues to flout the advice and continues to treat hon. Members with contempt?

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. An important debate is to follow points of order and in fairness to those who wish to take part in it, I shall deal only with this issue. I shall take that course unless the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) has something vital to raise with me. It is not a matter for me whether written answers are given or are not. If a written question is tabled, it will receive an answer. That cannot be a matter for me, and I cannot offer any advice on it.

Entry Certificates

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I apologise for delaying the House, Mr. Speaker. My point of order relates to a point of order that I raised yesterday. I have made further inquiries since asking you yesterday about the procedures that the Government intended to pursue to implement a decision announced on 22 November to impose a charge for entry certificates. I have discovered that the imposition of the charge was implemented by statutory instrument on 22 November by the Foreign Office. As there is widespread concern about the legality of this procedure, it seems that the Government are guilty of sharp practice. I should like your advice, Mr. Speaker, on the remedies that are available to hon. Members and others who question the legality of the Government's decision, bearing in mind that the statutory instrument was introduced on the day that it was said by the Minister responsible that the charge was to be imposed.

Mr. Speaker: I shall look into that matter and communicate with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you know, Sir, I have a profound interest in these matters. The issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) involves many of my constituents and possibly dependent relatives overseas. For the first time in our history, we are charging Commonwealth citizens a certain sum for entry certificates—in other words, visas—when they have a lawful right to come here. This will be a controversial matter. I wish to tell the Leader of the House to think about the matter because I shall be raising it on Thursday during business questions and drawing attention to early-day motion No. 200.

[That this House requests a reconsideration of a proposal made on 22 November to introduce, for the first time, a charge for entry certificates for Commonwealth citizens; and points out that refusal of an entrance certificate, simply because the fee cannot be paid, would not be lawful under the Immigration Act 1971.]

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take note because——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is only Tuesday. The hon. Gentleman should not raise with me today what he wishes to talk about on Thursday.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I take another point of order, I shall deal with the statutory instrument.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the Statutory Sick Pay Up-rating Order 1984 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

European Community Budgets

[Relevant Document: "Developments in the European Community, January—June 1984", Cmnd. 9348.]

5.35 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before we proceed with the main debate I seek your guidance on the main document that we shall be considering, which is Cmnd. 9348. I am sure that hon. Members who have studied the document will have found what appears to be a serious arithmetical error on the final page, which will place the House in total confusion in its approach to the debate.

One of the fundamental issues which I am sure will be debated is the trading balance. The figures set out in the final column tell us that exports of £3·6 billion and imports of £12·6 billion produce a balance of minus £3·9 billion. Obviously, that cannot be correct. I do not know the precise figures, but the trade balance and the consequent loss of jobs will be a fundamental issue in the debate. I appreciate that those in the Foreign Office are not always as good at sums as those in the Treasury, but I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to state the real figures. Alternatively, could we adjourn the debate until we know the real position?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has drawn attention to what appears to be a slight error. However, I am not very good at arithmetic either. Perhaps the best thing would be for the Government Front Bench to investigate the matter. I am sure that it will be dealt with during the debate. Perhaps we should now get on with the debate.

5.37 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8322/84, Preliminary draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 for 1984; 8879/84, Letter of amendment to preliminary draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 for 1984; the unnumbered document, Draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 for 1984; Document No. 10222/84, European Parliament's proposed amendments and modifications to the draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 of the European Communities for 1984; the unnumbered document, Draft general budget of the European Communities for the financial year 1985; Documents Nos. 9482/84, Letter of amendment to preliminary draft budget of the European Communities for 1985; 10690/84, European Parliament's amendments and modifications to the Draft budget of the European Communities for 1985; 8454/84, Amended proposal for a Council decision on the Communities' system of Own Resources; 8445/84, Commission proposal for a Council regulation introducing reserve measures to cover requirements in 1985; 8514/84, Commission's communication on the budgetary requirements of the Community in 1984 and 1985; 5899/84, Amended proposal for a Council regulation amending the Financial Regulation of 21st December 1977 applicable to the general budget of the European Communities; and the unnumbered document, Budgetary discipline: common position of the Council of Ministers; and welcomes the agreement on budgetary discipline providing for the firm control of agricultural and other expenditure.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the names of the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and some of his hon. Friends.

Mr. Rifkind: The debate takes place in the aftermath of the Dublin summit, where a number of important matters were considered by the Heads of Government. The Heads of Government discussed and endorsed the annual economic report prepared by the Commission on economic development in the Community. I am sure that both sides of the House will be delighted that the Heads of Government endorsed the report, which showed that the growth expected in the United Kingdom was likely to be greater than that in any other European Community country in the forthcoming year.

It is of interest that the economic policy that was proposed and endorsed by the Heads of Government was one that emphasised the importance of keeping inflation low, controlling public expenditure and pursuing an economic policy very close to that of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West) rose——

Mr. Rifkind: I shall give way later to my hon. Friend. I ask him to be patient. I am dealing with matters that are of importance to the House. It was of significance that a summit which dealt with a wide range of issues was able positively to endorse an economic strategy which was identical in all important essentials to that of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I am happy to agree with the Minister that an important document was placed before the Council. I draw his attention to the section on page 31 which observes that programmes of public investment should be strengthened, especially in countries where the construction industry is under-utilised. As one worker in four in Britain's construction industry is idle, how does he square that observation in the report, which he so warmly endorsed, with the simultaneous decision of the Government to lop £500 million off the construction investment?

Mr. Rifkind: That is because the main conclusion of the report to which the hon. Gentleman refers observes that the overriding consideration must be to keep the maximum constraint on expenditure, to reduce it where possible and to concentrate available resources on the reduction of taxation.

I shall concentrate on budgetary discipline, but before doing so I shall make further comments on some of the important issues that were discussed at the Dublin summit. Increasing emphasis is being placed on the completion of the internal market. That is something to which the Government have given enormous importance in recent years. We were delighted when Lord Cockfield was given responsibility in the recent announcement by the President Elect of the Commission to take responsibility for that matter.

In the early 1950s the European Community decided to complete within 10 years the elimination of all tariff barriers within the Community. It succeeded in fulfilling that target. We hope that it will now be possible to achieve by 1990 the completion of the elimination of non-tariff barriers within the Community. That is a short, although not unreasonable, period, especially when we consider that we are seeking to implement the commitments entered into by the Community when the original treaty was signed.

The proposed enlargement of the Community is important to the House and relevant to budgetary discipline. Enlargement is at a crucial stage and the United Kingdom has some strong views on the matter. The Government have stated their great belief that it would be in the Community's interests to come to an early and successful conclusion on the current negotiations on enlargement, enabling Spain and Portugal to join the Community. A wide range of issues are involved, some of which are of less importance to the United Kingdom than to other countries. The negotiations on fruit and vegetables, olive oil and wine are more significant to existing Community members from the Mediterranean area, for whom the accession of Spain and Portugal will mean important competition, than they are to the United Kingdom.

The United Kingdom considers other parts of the negotiations to be equally crucial; for example, the fisheries' negotiations, which are of particular interest to hon. Members on both sides of the House. We have emphasised that the common fisheries policy, which was agreed only after many years of anxious negotiation, should not be jeopardised by the accession of a country with the largest fishing fleet in Europe. The Community has adopted a negotiating mandate with Spain, and we should insist on the Community protecting the interests of British fishermen and fishermen from other members of the existing Community. That aspect is crucial in the negotiations.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Bearing in mind that there are about 17,000 Spanish fishing vessels — more fishing vessels than Britain has fishermen—is it likely that the negotiations will result in a diminution of that Spanish fishing fleet in the years immediately following accession?

Mr. Rifkind: As I understand it, the bulk of the Spanish fishermen fish in various parts of the world in waters far from Europe. That results from bilateral arrangements between Spain and various other countries, primarily in the Third world. It is primarily for Spain to decide the future size of her fleet. We are determined to ensure that that fishing fleet does not pose a threat to the already precarious livelihood enjoyed by many fishermen in the United Kingdom and other existing member states.

Industrial tariffs are also important to the United Kingdom. We are all conscious of the fact that in recent years there has been a substantial disproportion between the tariff that must be met by British manufacturers on exports to Spain and the tariff enjoyed by Spain when exporting to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Budgen: For how long has this problem existed? How long will it be before the problem is resolved?

Mr. Rifkind: The problem has existed since the conclusion of the agreement in 1970 between Spain and the European Community, at a time when Spain's industrial structure, especially its vehicle industry, was much weaker and smaller than now. It is important and, indeed, essential, when considering the transitional arrangements on industrial tariffs which Spain will properly enjoy, that special attention is given to a form of accelerated reduction of the high tariffs on industry, of which the motor vehicle industry is perhaps the most important category for the United Kingdom. I assure the House that that aspect will pre-occupy the United Kingdom and other Community countries.

I have said that competition from Spanish and Portuguese fruit and vegetables, olive oil and wine is of less direct significance to the United Kingdom, but we are concerned about the financial implications of accession. When the Community is beginning to control the agricultural expenditure of its northern members, it is essential that we should not agree to the accession of new Community members if that will create comparable problems for southern members of the Community. Recent agreements on olive oil and wine will help to safeguard the position.

Much of the discussion has concentrated on economic questions, but I emphasise that the United Kingdom remains convinced that the political dimension of assisting Spain and Portugal, which not long ago emerged from a dictatorial form of government, to entrench their new democratic institutions is important to Spain and Portugal and to western Europe as a whole.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I understand, although I do not agree with, the Government's obsession with bringing Spain and Portugal into the Community. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that if we do not obtain satisfactory arrangements on fishing, trade and all the other matters which bear directly on United Kingdom interests we shall not agree to Spain coming into the EEC?

Mr. Rifkind: The Community has taken a long time to come to a decision about Spain, because the United Kingdom and certain other countries with a particular interest in fisheries and the other matters to which my hon. Friend referred have attached great importance to those issues. Having spent so many months reaching a satisfactory Community position, we have no intention of abandoning that stand in the subsequent discussions with Spain. The conclusions must be satisfactory to the interests of those affected by the common fisheries policy.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I assume that my hon. Friend the Minister is saying to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) that the Government are satisfied with the conditions and that the conditions have now been met. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that, if Spain and Portugal come into the Community, there will be no average increase in the cost of the common agricultural policy; in other words, that by bringing Spain and Portugal into the Community, their share of the cost of the agriculture policy will not lead to the cost of that policy overall becoming pro rata greater than it is at the moment?

I believe that the Government's policy was that they would not agree to an increase in Community own resources except in respect of policies which the United Kingdom wished to support. One of those policies concerned the accession of Spain and Portugal. The Government have justified no other policies in terms of an increase in own resources. May we take it as read that, if it is not agreed that Spain and Portugal should join the Community, there will be no requirement to increase own resources?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend will be aware that I did not intend addressing the matter of own resources during this debate, because it goes beyond the pure question of enlargement. Enlargement is undoubtedly an important component in these discussions. We maintain that, because of the various reforms introduced at the present time, the cost of the CAP will lead to agriculture representing a smaller share of Community expenditure, notwithstanding the enlargement of the Community.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend has made a profound philosophical point. He has said that by entering the Community the nature of the people in both Spain and Portugal will change and that they will have a continued interest in a particular form of internal government. My hon. Friend stated that as though it were a self-evident truth which any sensible person should understand immediately. Will he explain it a little further?

Mr. Rifkind: I did not put it in quite the way so helpfully suggested by my hon. Friend. Having assumed democratic institutions, the Spanish and Portuguese Governments — as did the Greek Government before them — I believe it is important for the development of their democratic identity that they acquire membership of a community that is entirely democratic, in the sense hon. Members understand democracy, and consists entirely of parliamentary democracies.

We believe that the full integration of Spain and Portugal within the family of the democratic countries of western Europe will be assisted by their membership of the European Community. That is not just the British view. It is the view held by every Government within the Community as well as the Governments of the applicant countries. I accept the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) that that does not necessarily make it the correct view, but it is the view that we hold, and as yet we have heard no convincing reasons to suggest otherwise.

I mentioned the political considerations a few moments ago. It is interesting to note that the country which recently suggested that it would deliberately delay the accession of Spain and Portugal if certain other conditions were not fulfilled was Greece, the most recent member of the Community. Its position has been influenced by its determination to obtain substantial extra resources through the system of what is referred to as the "integrated Mediterranean programmes".

The British Government's view on that is clear. With the other member states of the Community we have endorsed a policy which accepts that those countries which will be most directly affected by enlargement are entitled to some assistance through integrated Mediterranean programmes, but we have insisted that those programmes must be integrated into the structural funds which currently exist.

Mr. Budgen: What does that mean?

Mr. Rifkind: I mean the regional, social and other such funds. It is not acceptable to create a separate new fund for that purpose. We have also said that the sums that can be made available in the foreseeable future can only be modest, taking into account the financial pressures that exist on the Community as a whole.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Is the Minister saying that in the view of Her Majesty's Government regional and social funds, for as far ahead as we can see, will be entirely cosmetic?

Mr. Rifkind: No, on the contrary. The regional and social funds already represent substantial sums, and all the Heads of Government have agreed that there should be a significant increase in the size of those funds.

Mr. Budgen: Why? We are reducing them.

Mr. Rifkind: I assure my hon. Friend that I have not suddenly announced a new statement of policy. My hon. Friends have been aware for some months that that is the position which has been agreed by the Community. If my hon. Friends are anxious to see agriculture represent a smaller and smaller share of Community expenditure, it is not unreasonable that other forms of expenditure should increase.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Rifkind: I must be allowed to continue. I am sure that my hon. Friend will have an opportunity to intervene in the debate.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The Minister is clearly not giving way.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Rifkind: I should prefer not to at this stage.

I come to another matter which relates to budgetary discipline. It is the supplementary finance that has been requested for the current year. The House will recall that on 10 July, when asked about the matter in the House, I said that the Government's view would be that only when we were satisfied that the likely overspend during the course of the current year had been reduced to the current minimum would we be prepared to consider whether, and if so to what extent, it was appropriate to produce supplementary finance to assist the Community.

That examination has not been cursory; it has been extremely rigorous. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has been fully involved with other Finance Ministers in the Community to ensure that those sums are reduced to the absolute minimum. As a result of their efforts the original sums proposed by the Commission have been reduced by more than half. We believe that they have now reached a level which is the irreducible minimum, given the obligations which the Community has under its existing rules.

We also said earlier this year that our attitude towards supplementary finance would depend upon two further conditions being satisfied. One was the payment of the refund to which the United Kingdom was entitled during the current year, and the House will be aware that that sum has now been released and been paid to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Budgen: We have paid for it.

Mr. Rifkind: We have not paid to receive the refund. My hon. Friend is wrong about that. The refund was provided for in the original budget, and through payments out of the original budget. The supplementary finance about which we are talking is not connected to the refund which the United Kingdom has already received. I can give my hon. Friend a complete assurance on that.

The second matter to which hon. Members will be aware the Government attached considerable importance was satisfactory conclusions on budgetary discipline. I should like to deal with the conclusions on budgetary discipline which were endorsed by the Heads of Government at the Dublin summit.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Before the Minister moves on to the disciplinary mechanism, can he reassure us about the repayments of the 1984 reimbursable loan, which is the subject of Cmnd. 9395 and another procedure? Is there provision in the 1985 budget for the repayment of that loan? He may not be able to answer now, but perhaps he could arrange for an answer to be included in the reply to the debate. There is some disagreement about the liability for the loan and the authority under which any such loan is repayable.

Mr. Rifkind: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has heard the question and will seek to respond to it in due course.

Mr. Robin Cook: I wish to ask a question about procedure, and it may give advance notice to the Economic Secretary. I understand that the final appeal in the case ex parte Smedley will not be heard until tomorrow and that there will be no judgment until Thursday. That will make it difficult for the Government to table an order for debate next week. In the event that the House cannot debate and therefore condescend on the order next week, may we have an assurance that no moneys will be paid to the EEC in advance of the House returning from the recess? Where does that leave the EEC budget, which runs out on 31 December?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is as aware as I am that we do not know when the judgment in the case to which he has referred will be announced. I cannot anticipate the business for next week which my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House may wish to consider. It goes without saying that if we are required to receive the authority of the House before supplementary finance can be provided, until that authority has been obtained we cannot provide it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman can accept that that is the position.

I shall return to the main subject which I wish to raise, which is budgetary discipline and the conclusions which were endorsed by the Heads of Government at the Dublin summit. We must study the background to the subject and realise that for most of the life of the Community there has been nothing that could properly be referred to as budgetary discipline. Over the years that the Community has operated, decisions have been taken on expenditure, and only once they have been reached has it been thought necessary to ensure that the revenue is available to provide for the resulting costs.

It was that provision which the United Kingdom Government first identified as being unacceptable and which we have striven over the past few years — successfully I believe — to persuade our fellow Community Governments to agree was unacceptable as a way in which the Community deals with its economic affairs.

The first important milestone was reached when the Community Heads of Government some months ago endorsed the principle that in future revenue should determine expenditure, and not the other way around. It was crucial that that principle be endorsed, because it was a denial of the Community's recent history. It was appropriate that that should be made clear.

The conclusions that were endorsed by the Heads of Government last week provide for a reference framework that will identify the Community's total expenditure in a given year, and, within that reference framework, provide that there should be a financial guideline which will control agricultural expenditure. It also provides that, should there be growth in agricultural expenditure, that growth must be less than the growth in the own resources base of the Community as a whole. The effect of that when implemented will be that agriculture will increasingly represent a smaller and smaller share of total Community expenditure.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend share my anxiety that among the budget discipline documents we see such phrases as "exceptional circumstances in article 2"; in article 5 "barring aberrant circumstances"; and in article 6 "amend the reference framework", and that those words can mean—as they usually do in European Community jargon—that while the Community starts out with good intentions, they are infinitely variable afterwards, depending upon those rather ill-defined circumstances?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend asks a perfectly reasonable question. I shall be coming to the points that he has raised. I have explained the general way in which it is proposed that budgetary discipline should apply.

Essentially, three criticisms have been levelled at the proposals. First, it has been suggested that as the proposals are not in the form of a regulation they are not legally enforceable and are thus of limited value. Secondly, it is argued that because decisions will be taken by a qualified majority United Kingdom interests may not be properly protected. Thirdly, there has been criticism of the provision for exceptional circumstances to alter decisions already reached. Those are reasonable concerns, and I intend to deal with each of them in turn. Before doing so, however, I wish to make two general points.

First, the United Kingdom objective has always been to ensure that Community expenditure is dealt with on more or less the same basis as national expenditure. In other words, we have never sought to suggest that there must be an absolute straitjacket on expenditure, but simply that Community expenditure should not be handled according to rules which no national Government would consider appropriate for their own national circumstances.

Secondly, we have been the initiators, as it were, of most of the concern about this in the Community and I freely accept that the position that we have reached is not perfect in every respect. If it had been left entirely to us, further improvements could have been made, and still could be made, to certain proposals to make budgetary discipline more effective. We see this as a dynamic process. [Interruption.] I wish to be completely honest with the House. We have never suggested that the solution was perfect. As the motion states, it provides "for the firm control of agricultural and other expenditure."

That is the position to which we adhere. There may well be ways of making that control even more effective in years to come.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that under article 1 of this so-called strict budgetary discipline the Council of Ministers could agree by a majority to spend any amount that it wishes, without any limit at all? In other words, even if we think that the Council of Ministers is crazy and spending money like water, there is nothing to stop it deciding by a majority to spend double the amount that we consider necessary.

Mr. Rifkind: I said that I would deal with the specific criticisms, of which that is one. If my hon. Friend will also allow me to continue, he will have the answer to his question.

First, there was the criticism that the absence of a regulation meant that the proposals were not legally enforceable. If there were a regulation or a treaty amendment there could be no question but that the rules for budgetary discipline would be completely enforceable, but the opposite does not necessarily apply. The mere fact that there is not a regulation does not mean that the European Court would not find the rules to be enforceable.

Mr. Marlow: What is the disadvantage of a regulation? Why not make it a regulation, to be on the safe side?

Mr. Rifkind: For the United Kingdom there would be no disadvantage in a regulation. As I have said, there were proposals which we regarded as preferable. It is no secret that we should have preferred a regulation.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clywd, North-West): Is it not a trifle ironic that those now pressing most strongly for enforceable regulations are always the first to demand that we retain a national veto to be used whenever we feel that we are being inconvenienced?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to emphasise the paradox and inconsistency of some of the interventions.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rifkind: No. I have been very generous about interventions. Many hon. Members wish to participate in the debate, so perhaps they will keep their comments for their own contributions.

The Council of Ministers itself has identified these conclusions as binding upon it. Whether they are legally enforceable can be determined in the last resort by the European Court. We believe that they are binding, and all the Heads of Government have endorsed them as such. The European Commission, too, has accepted that it will be bound by them in its proposals to the Council.

Mr. Budgen: If all the other countries have the political will to curb excess agricultural expenditure, why did they not agree to a regulation?

Mr. Rifkind: The attractions of budgetary discipline were received by the various states with varying enthusiasm. Some Governments are less enthusiastic than others. Nevertheless, to the best of my recollection, when the Council of Ministers endorsed the proposals only two of the 10 states entered any reservation to the effect that they did not regard the conclusions as binding on the Council as a whole.

The second criticism, that the requirement for a qualified majority constitutes a major flaw in the proposals, does not hold water. First, it ignores the important fact that the Commission has said that it will regard itself as bound to put forward proposals consistent with the rules of budgetary discipline. Under article 149 of the treaty, when the Commission puts forward proposals a decision not to comply with them requires unanimity on the part of the Council. Secondly, even in a situation in which a qualified majority would be relevant, even in the enlarged Community any combination of two large states and one small state could prevent the qualified majority being obtained in the Council.

Mr. Marlow: What security is that?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend's question implies that only the United Kingdom has any interest in budgetary discipline, but that is not remotely the case. In considering any increases in Community expenditure which may be proposed in years to come we must consider also where the burden of financing them will fall in the light of the Fontainebleau conclusions, which provide for a two thirds refund to the United Kingdom of any new expenditure. That means that the maximum proportion of funding for new expenditure that will fall on this country is not the original 21 per cent., but 7 per cent. For France it will remain 27 per cent., and for Germany 32 per cent.

That being so, the suggestion that Britain will invariably be more concerned about budgetary discipline while France and Germany have no interest in the matter flies in the face of common sense. Indeed, a number of smaller countries have an equal and increasing interest in budgetary discipline and can be expected to support us in rejecting any unreasonable proposals. Therefore, notwithstanding article 149 and the need for unanimity when the Commission puts forward proposals with which certain people disagree, even when a qualified majority is appropriate there is reason to assume that in the vast majority of cases any unreasonable proposal will rightly be dismissed.

The third criticism was about the reference to exceptional circumstances, and related matters. Not just in the Community, but in any national Government, a budget that has been fixed may have to be altered during the year because of exceptional circumstances. That in itself is not an unreasonable proposition. The main safeguard, however, has not been mentioned. Within the conclusions that have been adopted, although exceptional circumstances may result in increased expenditure, the provisions also require that that additional expenditure should be clawed back in the following years. Therefore, the overall requirement to control expenditure is safeguarded.

Mr. Budgen: "May be" clawed back.

Mr. Rifkind: Not "may be". Under the conclusions adopted, additional expenditure is required to be clawed back.

Mr. Forth: Following that line of logic, what would happen if there were three consecutive years of fine harvest?

Mr. Rifkind: The Community cannot in future assume that the interests of the farming community are the only considerations to be borne in mind. In the circumstances envisaged by my hon. Friend, we would have to consider the overall interests of the Community and the expenditure that would have to be incurred to meet that situation.

Given that the overwhelming part — some 93 per cent. — of any new expenditure will not fall on the United Kingdom, it is reasonable to assume that other member Governments would be as concerned as Her Majesty's Government about the implications of such expenditure.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: May I refer my hon. Friend to article 5? He says that the money would be clawed back. Will he tell us what is meant by the reference to "barring aberrant developments"? That phrase seems to me to imply that the money will be clawed back unless the Council considers that there have been what it would call aberrant developments.

Mr. Rifkind: We are seeking to ensure that any proposal to provide for unreasonable increases in expenditure can be blocked in the various ways to which I have referred. We have never sought to impose a rigid straitjacket on Community expenditure. What we have sought to ensure, and what I believe the conclusions adequately represent, is effective control of expenditure.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: What about article 5?

Mr. Rifkind: I refer those who doubt what I have said to various reactions to the proposals and the conclusions on budgetary discipline. Dr. Stoltenberg, the Federal German Finance Minister, stated in a debate on these matters in the Bundestag:

"I believe that we now have, for the first time, an effective instrument to bring about a sensible control of expenditure".

The French Permanent Association of Chambers of Agriculture — a body with a great interest in these matters—said:

"Heads of State and Government have just decided a real financial straitjacket for the CAP".

The president of the Italian farmers association said that the proposals that had been agreed represented a "complete change in direction of the CAP."

Hon. Members: What about Mr. Rocard?

Mr. Rifkind: The French Minister of Agriculture was at one stage quoted as being hostile to the proposals, precisely because he was concerned about how effective they would be. The French Government and Mr. Mitterrand have emphasised that their primary objective is to ensure proper budgetary discipline. We welcome the fact that the French Government share with us the belief that that must be the supreme consideration. That is why, despite the no doubt understandable reservations of Mr. Rocard, the French Government remain absolutely committed to the proposals.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend give way on one final point? I give an undertaking, binding in Community law, that barring either exceptional circumstances or aberrant developments, this will be my final intervention. Does my hon. Friend agree that the imposition of the milk quota was the first tentative attempt to control agricultural expenditure? Will he tell us how those milk quotas have been applied in each state?

Mr. Rifkind: On the basis that this is to be my hon. Friend's final intervention, I shall be delighted to comply with his request. As a result of the quotas, the United Kingdom has experienced a significant reduction in milk production. Belgium was required to cut production by 2·7 per cent., but the latest information suggests a cut of 3·7 per cent. Denmark was required to reduce production by 5·6 per cent. but so far has reduced production by 6·3 per cent. Neither Greece nor Ireland, which under the original proposal were permitted an increase, has increased production by anything like the amount proposed.

Mr. Rocard has recently made it clear that French milk production this year is expected to be significantly below the quota.

Mr. Budgen: What about Italy?

Mr. Rifkind: I have given my hon. Friend a certain amount of detailed information. He may be disappointed to hear that most member states are carrying out their obligations. I suspect that that was not the answer that he expected to get and that it was not his intention to assist the Government in their hour of need.

My hon. Friend rightly mentions Italy. Italy is the one country which has not so far made any serious attempt to carry out its obligations under the agreement. In consequence, the European Commission has begun infraction proceedings against Italy in the European Court. The United Kingdom and many other countries have made it clear that it is essential that if any country is expected to carry out its obligations, all countries must do so. That is the only way in which the system can operate effectively.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): I entirely accept all that the Minister has said about milk quotas. However, he has told us only how the national quota has operated in each nation. Who decided that there should be regional quotas within nations? Was that a national responsibility, or a Community decision? In either case, what is the legal basis for it?

Mr. Rifkind: I cannot answer that specific point in detail. However, our main concern must be to achieve a substantial reduction in overall milk production. We would also expect that the detailed provisions agreed upon by the Heads of Government have to be accepted and implemented according to the details agreed. There would be no basis for a system of implementation different from that orginally endorsed by the Council of Ministers. Nearly all member states have substantially reduced production. Italy is the one main exception to that general principle, and we are pleased that the Commission has begun infraction proceedings.

Mr. John David Taylor: Most nations, including the United Kingdom, are now below their national quotas. However, for some reason, we still have to pay super levies to the EEC. Indeed, our British super levy was seized last night.

Mr. Rifkind: No, that is not quite correct. I understand that as a precautionary measure the Commission has taken a decision which applies to all Community countries, in part because we have made it clear that our attitude towards the payment of the super levy will be influenced by whether other countries also carry out their obligations. However, no specific action such as the right hon. Gentleman has referred to is being taken.

We believe that the proposals on budgetary discipline should commend themselves to the House. As I have sought to explain, they provide effective——

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Rifkind: I am sorry, I shall not give way. The proposals provide effective and appropriate ways of controlling expenditure within the Community.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way? I will give the same undertaking as that given by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

Mr. Rifkind: If my hon. Friend will give that undertaking, I shall be happy to give way.

Mr. Marlow: We are all most grateful to my hon. Friend for his courtesy in answering all our interventions. However, as he has explained the budgetary discipline, it will, in legal terms, hold as much water as a leaky sieve. We are concerned, therefore, about people's intentions.

We understand that next year the Community will spend £1,000 million more than it is entitled to raise. How can we at this stage have any reassurance about the intentions of the nations that make up the Community and that they will behave in this way?

Mr. Rifkind: Precisely because one of the reasons why the Council of Ministers is in conflict with the European Parliament is that the Council of Ministers has insisted on putting a draft budget to the Parliament which is within the 1 per cent. ceiling. If the Council of Ministers had not been determined to insist on that, no doubt my hon. Friend would have complained that that showed a lack of willingness to observe the rules of budgetary discipline.

Way back in 1979, curiously enough also at a Dublin summit, the Government initiated what we believe to be necessary reforms in the EEC. Since then there has been a major transformation in the rules which are applied and in the thinking of all Governments in the Community on this matter. The issue was perhaps best summed up in an article which appeared in the French newspaper Le Figaro on 1 December 1984. It said:

"It is true that she"— meaning the Prime Minister—

"has every reason to be pleased with the outstanding diplomatic victory she won this year, after five years of hard struggle. For it was in November, 1979, at the Dublin European Council, that she entered on the battle to obtain a reduction in the British contribution to the EEC budget, a drop in the EEC budgetary expenditure and, in particular, in the Common Agricultural Policy. She has won on all fronts, and it is understandable that yesterday she should have termed 1984 'A very important year' for the Community."

I endorse those comments and, on that basis, invite the House to accept the motion.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I wondered for a moment whether I had entered into an agreement with the Minister that, if he gave way to me twice, I should not attempt to speak in the debate. I am relieved that I still reserve the right to speak.

The Minister, in conclusion, painted a glowing picture of the past 18 months as a progress of triumph, suggesting that the EEC has retired to a succession of summits for meditation and negotiation and has emerged from that process strenghtened, purified and with a new commitment to relaunch the Community and its objectives. I find it extremely difficult to recognise that picture in the documents that litter the Table from which I am speaking. Those documents paint a picture of an institution that is in financial shambles. It is stumbling towards the end of 1984 grasping for temporary expedients to keep the cash flow. The expedient on which it has hit to get to the end of this year is a whip-round of member states. It is not clear whether that whip-round is a loan or a grant. When he spoke to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury described it as a reimbursable advance. As the Committee elicited from the Economic Secretary, it is an advance, but it is by no means clear whether it is reimbursable. However it is described, it is clear that there is a large gap in the budget for 1984 which has been plugged only by payments from sources outwith the resources of the treaty and by a special arrangement.

It is difficult not to agree with the Court of Auditors' statement that the Commission's estimate of a shortfall of more than £1·6 billion in its original calculations is evidence of "the need for greater accuracy in the preparation of original budget estimates".

We do not find such "greater accuracy" in the 1985 budget. The draft budget provides sufficient revenue to meet expenditure for the first 10 months of the financial year. A letter, attached to the draft budget, expresses the hope that, on arrival at the last two months of the year, some way will have been found of meeting expenditure. It is extraordinary that a responsible public institution should enter the financial year on such a basis. If Hackney or Islington borough council introduced such a budget for the forthcoming year, Treasury Ministers would be the first to denounce them as introducing an illegal and irresponsible deficit budget.

In these documents we see an institution that is wallowing in a financial crisis that is deeper than anything that it has experienced since the relaunch of the Community in Stuttgart 18 months ago. Against that background we must judge the wider issues, to some of which the Minister addressed himself. The Minister did not address himself to one document. That perplexed me, as the document was before the Government at the summit only last week and it received the attention of the Council when it met in Dublin. As the Minister failed to refer to it, perhaps I can help to redress the balance. I refer, of course, to the document prepared by the Dooge committee. It prepares the way for European unity. It is impossible to take exception to elements of that report. Section 2, for example, has a chapter headed,

"The Promotion of the Common Values of Civilisation."

I do not think that even the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) would take exception to such a document. However, it is clear that the document tends towards European union. That is made clear in chapter 4, which consists of only two paragraphs and calls on the European Council to agree to an intergovernmental conference to negotiate a draft European union treaty. The report is studded with footnotes bearing the name of the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who, I understand, is a member of the committee. There is a footnote attached to chapter 4. I looked down the page eagerly to see what reservations the Minister had entered against the proposal, only to discover that his reserve is founded on the ground that the proposal is premature in an interim report. I had expected a more substantive reservation about a provision for European union. I do not know about the Minister, but I am not entirely confident that such a proposal would find a majority in the House. If we were to take a snap vote of those right hon. and hon. Members who are present, the Minister might be in some difficulty.

Mr. Budgen: But what about the Whips?

Mr. Cook: I welcome the insight offered by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

At no stage have Treasury Ministers come to the House to justify entering a European union. If they have no serious intention of entering such a union, they should at the very minimum tell their colleagues on the Dooge committee rather than hide behind the subterfuge that the conclusions are preliminary and that the report is only interim.

Sir Anthony Meyer: It would probably not be worth while taking a snap vote in view of the utter failure of Labour Members, apart from two conscientious exceptions, to attend the debate.

Mr. Cook: The numbers of Labour Members present make up precisely the same proportion of the parliamentary Labour party as do the numbers of Conservative Members present of the parliamentary Conservative party. I should naturally welcome a larger attendance to hear my pearls of wisdom, but we are represented equally.

Other items in this report are worth singling out for the attention of the House. The Dooge report contains a provision to limit the veto and to provide for more majority voting. Again, the Minister has entered a reservation on this item of the text, but he is quoted as having "accepted the principle of a more frequent use of majority voting".

If that is the case, the House is entitled to know on what issues he is prepared to accept more frequent majority voting. On what issues is he prepared to abandon the use of the British veto?

Similarly, there is a provision for the European Parliament to have control over the revenue side of the budget. At any rate, I believe that is what the committee is recommending, because it is not immediately apparent from the language used. It wants to give the European Parliament

"responsibility in decisions on revenue as the coping stone of the establishment of a new basic institutional balance"— whatever that means. The Government have entered no reservation on that proposal. Does the Minister accept that the European Parliament should have control over the revenue side of the budget and in what way?

Mr. Rifkind: If the hon. Gentleman has properly read the report, he will see that the United Kingdom reserve, which I introduced, refers to that whole chapter. We have not accepted the recommendations of the majority of the committee to increase the powers of the Parliament. The only point we wished to put forward was that there should be an improved conciliation procedure on the basis that has been discussed by the Council of Ministers, but blocked by one country up to now.

Mr. Cook: I am satisfied with that response and happy to accept the Minister's explanation. However, if he has entered a reservation against the whole of that chapter, it becomes even more meaningless to me why the Government are prepared even to temporise on the question of having an inter-governmental conference to render all this into a treaty of European union.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend both for giving way and for drawing the attention of the House to these proposals which have not yet been to the Scrutiny Committee. These proposals are fundamental and relate to the constitution and treaties of the EEC. Can he say more about the vires and authority of the committee to which he has referred? Was it not formed after the Fontainebleau summit and was not that meeting outside the terms of the treaty? Will he invite the Government to tell us what authority this committee, which is suggesting changes to the treaty, has and with what authority the Minister sits on it?

Mr. Cook: I am not entirely sure that it lies in my mouth to answer for the Government, but my hon. Friend has given me an opportunity to refresh my memory of the text. The reservation to which the Minister referred applies to section B. No reservation has been entered by the British Government to any part of section C which deals with the increased revenue powers of the European Parliament.

Mr. Rifkind indicated dissent.

Mr. Cook: I am going only by the text which was placed in my hand by the Library. The Minister may, if he wishes, check the text and make appropriate corrections, but the only reservation entered on section C is by the Greek Government.

Mr. Rifkind indicated dissent.

Mr. Cook: The Minister shakes his head and says that it is not true. I take exception to that observation. I can only go on what is in the text as published, in which—and he is welcome to check it—there is no British reservation.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman implies that the reservation applies to one particular page. It refers not to section C or D, but to the whole chapter dealing with the powers of the European Parliament. As I sat on the committee, I can give the hon. Gentleman a categorical assurance that the reservation applies to the whole section on the powers of the European Parliament, including the proposal to provide it with powers over revenue.

Mr. Cook: I can only suggest that the Minister takes this matter up with whoever drafted the presentation of the text, because it is quite clear that footnote II refers to section B and that the reservation entered in respect of section C was entered by the Greeks. I should have thought that had the British Government wished to enter a reservation to section C as well as to section B, they would have entered the footnote on both occasions. However, the Minister may wish to consider the matter.

Mr. Budgen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in general the powers of the Council are set out in the written constitution of the EEC? Was not the Luxembourg agreement a significant derogation from that, because after France had left for a period it became necessary to introduce the practice of allowing a nation state to exercise a veto when it said that its essential national interests were at stake? What has now happened is a promise to use the Luxembourg veto less generously.

Mr. Cook: It is plain from the text that the British Government appear to have committed themselves to accepting majority voting on more frequent occasions, and that implies a more restrained and less regular use of the British veto. There is a school of thought, of which the hon. Gentleman is a distinguished exponent, which takes the view that that is entirely desirable. If so, that case should be argued in the House by the Government. They should clearly tell us the occasions on which they wish to restrict the use of the veto and the occasions on which they would be happier to see an issue resolved by majority voting.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is implying that somehow this is a new development. The Government have made clear on numerous previous occasions their belief that, in those areas where the treaty does not require unanimity, all member Governments should ensure that the veto be used only in a genuuine case when vital national interests are affected. Of course there have been occasions when various Governments have applied the veto when it would have been difficult to substantiate the view that a vital national interest was at stake. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and other British Ministers have said that we believe that it is in the interests of the Community as a whole for the use of the veto to be kept to a minimum where vital national interests can be said to apply.

Mr. Cook: I am grateful that we have had this exchange, because it is becoming clear that the Government have moved some way down the road of the Dooge committee to an extent that I had not previously observed. It may be remiss of me, but I do not recall the Prime Minister's clear statement that she is willing to contemplate more majority voting.

Mr. Rifkind: I undertake that this will be my last intervention. The hon. Gentleman is remiss. If he looks at the document "Europe—The Future", produced by the Prime Minister for the last summit, and which has since been made available publicly, he will see in it an explicit reference to the need for the veto to be used only as a last resort. There is a suggestion that when it is used, an explanation might be useful as to why the issue is a vital national interest. In that way we could seek to minimise the use of the veto and not allow it to be used unreasonably. Those matters have been aired publicly on many occasions.

Mr. Cook: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says, and I must apologise to the House for having let pass underneath my nose one of the many documents relating to Europe which come before the House. I accept that on this occasion I have been remiss. However, if the Government are willing to entertain a position in which they are more reluctant to use the British veto, it would be nice to know how they define the occasions on which they believe British use to be justified.

There is a considerable amount of merit in the idea of enlargement. I believe that there is something in the Minister's point that, by bringing in Spain and Portugal, enlargement would give added strength to the democratic institutions which are still taking root in those countries. I also believe that enlargement would bring an element of fluidity to the Common Market, which would be welcome to those of us who believe that the Common Market stands in need of substantial change. Yet, if the Community is serious about enlargement, it should put its house in order before inviting the Spaniards and Portuguese to share our present problems and, thus, to complicate them.

The Minister was censorious about the Greeks. It would be unrealistic to imagine that only the Greeks stand in the way of Spain's and Portugal's membership of the Community. If the Greeks had not objected, the French or the Italians would have done. If the Greek objections were met, I should be surprised if one or other of the Mediterranean countries did not raise an objection. Be that as it may, it is now obvious that there are two question marks over enlargement.

Will it happen at all, and will it happen by 1 January 1986? The retiring President of the Commission, Mr. Gaston Thorn, has made it clear that he does not expect enlargement to be completed by 1 January 1986. The Minister did not condescend to speak about the implications of that. What does the shift in enlargement mean for the decision on an increase in own resources? Conservative Back-Bench Members asked the Minister about that, and I wish to press the point.

The Government's position on the increase in own resources has gone through many phases. In February 1983 the Government took the view that there was enough money in the kitty, even if enlargement took place. They now believe that there is not enough money in the kitty, even if enlargement does not take place, and they want an increase in own resources to take place in advance of enlargement. Between them, there was a flitting phase in which the question of the increase in own resources was tied to enlargement of the Community. Even now the Minister still partly justifies an increase in own resources by reference to enlargement.

I invite the Economic Secretary to the Treasury to answer several points when he replies. The House is entitled to greater clarity about where the Government stand should enlargement not take place on 1 January 1986 or should it recede into the indefinite future. If it is not going to take place, is it possible to defer an increase in own resources? If an increase in own resources is required, we are entitled to know how much less that increase need be, if enlargement has not occurred and the increase is required only to pay for the return of our rebate.

What will happen to our rebate for 1984, which is payable next year? The 1985 draft budget made no provision for our rebate. The Strasbourg assembly has included a provision for a rebate on the expenditure side. Its motivation, with which hon. Members will be wearily familiar, is that it wants a rod with which to hit the back of the Council, for reasons which have nothing to do with British contributions. I am sure that the House will be united in resisting that provision.

If we consider the draft budget, even without the amendments of the Strasbourg assembly, we find, curiously, that the Commission has not made provision for the British rebate payable in 1985 on the revenue side either. Will the Economic Secretary tell us where the rebate is? Is he confident that the Government will secure it? How will they do so? If they secure it by means of an abatement, when will he proceed to deduct our refund from our payments to the Community? Will it start in January? How much will he deduct from our contributions to take account of the refund to which we are entitled for 1984?

That naturally and logically brings me to the budgetary discipline package, which is the sister to the rebate agreement, to which the Minister referred at length. We shall presumably have an opportunity to debate the matter again when we eventually debate the order which is at present before the courts. I noted what the Minister said about the objections to the document on budgetary discipline. I noted that he said that, although it had no legal status, it did not necessarily mean that the courts could not found on it. That is doubtless the case, but it does not mean that the courts would necessarily found on it; even less does it mean that the Commission is likely to take any action before the courts in respect of that agreement.

The Minister did not respond adequately to the point raised by Conservative Members about the aberrant developments, in the event of which rebate — read "clawback" — would not operate. Agriculture, as Conservative Members are fond of reminding the House, is a chancy business. There are many changes with the seasons and with the harvest. It would be difficult to find a year when the CAP operated in which one could not find something to tag as an aberrant development to justify clawback not being stimulated.

A basic reason for not being over-persuaded by the Minister's arguments is the patent fact that he has failed to persuade the farming community that the impositions in the budgetary discipline document will bite. We do not need to search for quotations from the German Parliament or from Italian or French farmers. We need simply look at home. After the text on budget discipline was produced, Farmers Weekly stated:

"Farmers have nothing to fear from the EEC budget discipline agreement drawn up in Brussels to control the common agricultural policy because it is so full of escape clauses".

Michel Rocard's name has already been taken in vain. After the final agreement, he said that the French had agreed to it because it provided sufficient flexibility for the CAP to continue unimpaired.

There is another reason why we should be sceptical about the extent to which a common position would be sufficient to control expenditure on agriculture in future, and the extent to which we can rely on our Community partners to observe that voluntary undertaking. It is provided by the way our partners have operated recently. The Minister attempted to persuade us that milk levies and quotas were being observed by our partners. Michel Rocard assured the French nation, even if he did not mention this at the Council of Agriculture Ministers:

"No dairy farmer will have to pay super levy on over-production in 1984-85."

For the removal of doubt, Alain Clauzier, who is a principal agricultural commentator in the French press and a large farmer, said more bluntly:

"Delaying payment of the super levy didn't make any difference to us in France . . . We weren't going to pay it anyway, we're not worried about what anyone else in the Community thinks."

There is an entertaining footnote to that exchange in the dispute between the Strasbourg assembly and the Commission about the 1985 budget. The assembly provided for the insertion in the budget of revenue of 120 million ecu from payment of the milk super levy in November. The Commission has since deleted that insertion on the ground that it does not expect to receive any payments of the super levy. That speaks volumes for its confidence in the system which it set up.

However, we need not found our nervousness about the efficacy of the document on budgetary discipline on the milk quotas alone. Paragraph 11.7 of the White Paper is fascinating. It deals with infraction of Community law and cases referred by the Commission to the European Court. During the past five years, 173 cases have been taken to court, only seven of which involved the United Kingdom. We are almost at the bottom of the league, with only the Danes below us. Italy accounts for no fewer than 61 of the 173 cases, and France accounts for 27. In 1983, there was only one case against the United Kingdom, but 12 each against France and Italy. Some of us believe that it is a bit rich in those circumstances for the French and Italians to lecture the British about being non-communitaire.

What is even more striking is that, although the British are punctilious about agreements made in the Council, our partners take what might charitably be called a more creative attitude. Given their record of imaginative interpretation of Council agreements, one is bound to be sceptical about the extent to which the agreement on budgetary discipline, which does not even have the merit of the legal status that resulted in those infractions being brought before the courts, will bite. Its failure to bite is fairly clear from the 1985 draft budget, because there is a danger that the formula for budget discipline will make things worse next year. It provides that 1985 will be one of the two base years. Therefore, the agricultural community has every incentive to bid up expenditure to establish a high base rate for future years.

The draft budget proposed by the Commission includes a dramatic increase in the agriculture budget. In the draft budget sent to the Strasbourg assembly the proportion of expenditure on agriculture increased from 66 per cent. to 72 per cent. Since then the Strasbourg assembly has added 1·3 billion ecu to agricultural expenditure. I noted that 5 million ecu relate specifically to additional help to beekeepers. The money has been doled out carefully among different agricultural interests.

The Commission responded to the increases by advising the assembly that they were illegal, to which the assembly retorted that the draft budget was illegal anyway as it did not cover the full 12 months. There is some justice in the charge levied by the assembly against the budget, but that was not an elevated set of exchanges between the two bodies. This is not an institution trembling on the verge of relaunch.

It is worth noting what has been cut to make room for the additional agricultural expenditure. The 1985 aid budget has been cut, and the proportion for aid has been reduced from 3·5 per cent. to 3·2 per cent. For the first time, the EEC will be spending less on aid to the Third world than it will spend on the salaries of the bureaucrats in Brussels, who will now swallow 3·4 per cent. of the budget—[Interruption.] Those are the figures provided in the draft budget.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) rose——

Mr. Cook: I will happily give way to the hon. Gentleman if he will contain his impatience, but I should tell him that we have not yet reached a position in which hon. Members intervene by means of a megaphone.

The cut in aid is pertinent, because last week we heard a statement, in response to the Dublin summit, in which the Prime Minister referred to the Community's commitment, given at the European Council, to provide 1·2 million tonnes of grain to the countries of north Africa. In their innocence, the Opposition welcomed that commitment, because they imagined that if the European Council was to will the food, it would find the funds to pay for it. We were wrong. We learn now that the food aid budget will remain at a fixed ceiling. Even as we speak, according to The Guardian,

"Community officials are working against the clock—and in some cases against their own consciences—to divert food aid from countries such as Bangladesh", to Africa. We understand from the report that the Prime Minister was a main opponent of any increase in expenditure. In that she was at least consistent. She is imposing on the Community budget precisely the same strictures as she imposed on the British overseas aid budget, thus requiring any additional aid to Ethiopia to come from our overall aid budget.

Mr. Jackson: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for interrupting him earlier. He was wrong to say what he did. He should be aware that the Community has a separate budget for overseas aid in relation to the Lomé convention. He referred to food aid, which is only a small proportion of our total effort.

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman is correct, but I am referring to the appropriations included in the draft budget, which provides a reduction in the proportion for aid from 3·52 per cent. to 3·2 per cent. of the 1985 draft budget. The aid provision in the draft budget is less than the provision for expenditure on administration in Brussels. An institution that gets its priorities so markedly wrong is in severe need of outside advice to rethink its priorities.

In common with many hon. Members, I receive large volumes of mail from constituents who are deeply moved by what they see on their television screens about Ethiopia. A point that they raise repeatedly, and which plainly distresses them, is a simple equation. They see Europe stuffed to capacity with surplus grain—stuffed so much that the grain is overflowing into barns in Switzerland and Austria because the Community can no longer contain it—and they also see, not too far away from Europe, people perishing from hunger. They then make the reasonable equation that some of the surplus grain could be used to relieve the suffering and deaths that they have witnessed.

The 1·2 million tonnes of grain is not a large amount; it is less than one fifth of our intervention stocks and less than one tenth of the intervention stocks that we are likely to have next spring when they will reach their peak. It is less than the amount of wheat used by the Community for conversion into animal feedstuffs to feed the animals of the Community.

What happened, and what continues to happen, in Ethiopia is an appalling tragedy, but it was also an opportunity for the Community to redeem itself and to prove that there was some purpose, for the good of humanity, in the large surpluses produced by the CAP. The halting response of the European Community until the Dublin summit, and the hypocritical response given there, have knocked what last hope there might have been of the CAP redeeming itself by giving that necessary food aid to north Africa. Instead, the whole episode has sharpened the moral offensiveness of a system that extrudes ever-swelling surpluses in a world where two thirds of mankind go to bed hungry.

We are left with a draft budget for 1985 in which an offensive and extravagant agricultural system absorbs an even higher proportion of the budget than it did this year. Not only that, we have a document on budget discipline that cannot provide us with a guarantee that expenditure will not swell further. In the meantime, the trivial resources allocated to other projects are cut. The communiqué after Dublin called upon the European Council to implement without delay its commitment to transport policy. The Commission's draft budget cuts expenditure on transport. The communiqué after Dublin called upon the European Council to adopt further measures to strengthen the technological base of the Community. The draft budget presented by the Commission cuts expenditure on science and technology.

Had the Commission set out to confirm our prejudices about the mistaken priorities of the Community, it could not have done better than to present us with the 1985 draft budget. The House does not have the power to alter that budget. That is one of the unsatisfactory features of the position in which we find ourselves. However, we have one power. We can resolve that, in the light of the priorities displayed in this 1985 budget, it is inconceivable that there could be any rational and principled case or any consistent intellectual argument mounted to persuade the House that there is a basis for us to vote an increase in own resources to provide for even larger expenditure on the same priorities in 1986. I hope that the Minister, who is a rational and intellectual man, will take note of that, and will not put the House in the embarrassing position of having to vote down the increase.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "Council of Ministers" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"but regrets that the arrangements made at Fontainebleau and Dublin provide for a major increase in public expenditure and that the restraint mechanism on agricultural spending has no legal force and would, even if effective in practice, provide for substantial further increases in this area of spending."

My hon. Friend the Minister did not say whether my amendment would be acceptable to the Government, but I thank the Chair for selecting it for debate, because it enables us to focus our attention on the basic issue of budget discipline, the issue on which the Minister concentrated.

Although we have had a bit of fun this afternoon, the whole thing is deeply depressing. It is clear that we shall throw away the one chance that this country has had in over 12 years to achieve reforms in the Common Market, and the only chance that we shall probably ever have to secure budget discipline. My hon. Friend the Minister gave way several times, but whenever there was a specific issue about whether or not there was any substance in the budget discipline, he made it clear that all that we would rely on in the Common Market was the goodwill of those taking part in the meetings of the Council of Ministers. He quoted the paper Le Figaro, which said that it liked what was going on. He quoted Italian farmers, who said that they thought that it was a grand idea and he told us of the French Agriculture Minister who was hopeful that France might, some day, abide by the milk quotas. However, when we come down to the details of the budget discipline, it is obvious that it is nothing more than a sick joke.

I shall go through the specific questions that I put to my hon. Friend the Minister but which, sadly, he was not able to answer. We are told that there are strict financial guidelines. Was there anything in the guidelines that would prevent the Council of Ministers, by a majority, from increasing the total expenditure to any sum that it thought fit, whether by 20 per cent., 30 per cent. or 40 per cent.? Under article 1 of the new so-called budget discipline agreement, there is nothing whatsoever to stop such a thing happening.

Mr. Marlow: If there is a new limit on own resources of 1·4 per cent. VAT, will that not limit what the Council of Ministers may agree?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend may hope that that is the case, but I remind him that there is already a restriction for 1984 and there will be a restriction for 1985, as in both these cases there is a legal limit of 1 per cent. VAT. My hon. Friend is aware that, despite the attempts of that great British democrat Mr. Oliver Smedley to dissuade the Government from apparently abusing the law, we shall be giving more money to the Common Market this year above the legal limit. Next year, there is such a crazy budget that we shall obviously greatly exceed it.

I again put to the Minister and to the Treasury a simple question. Is it true that, despite all the talk of strict financial discipline, there is nothing in article 1 that will prevent Ministers from deciding to spend any sum that they might want, whether we like it or not?

There is then the question of the agricultural budget. What has been set as the basis for a major step forward is the principle that the Common Market will be able to increase the amount that it spends on agriculture only by roughly the amount of increase in own resources. There are severe problems here. First, the base on which we are working and on which we shall assess all the percentage increases is actual spending in the year 1984 and the envisaged spending for 1985. Surely Ministers are aware that 1984 was a year of horrendous over-production, a year in which mountains reached the most crazy levels. What is proposed now is that agricultural spending should be based on this year and on a prediction for next year, when agricultural spending is estimated to rise by about 15 per cent.

At the moment, the wheat mountain exceeds 4 million tonnes, the barley mountain is over 1 million tonnes, and the beef mountain, the height of which is continually soaring, is about 500,000 tonnes. We have all-time high mountains of food, expenditure on agricultual dumping and destruction of food. Despite that, the Government are asking us to regard it as an achievement that future agricultural spending will be based on this year and will not increase by more than Community own resources.

Even that has an escape clause, as the Minister is aware. In article 2 of the so-called binding agreement——

Sir John Farr (Harborough): My hon. Friend refers to horrendous over-production, but he will recognise—I am surprised that he has not done so already—that none of that over-production has been done by British farmers.

Mr. Taylor: How right my hon. Friend is. Britain does not have a problem of over-production, although we over-provide on some things—for example, marginally on dairy and cereals. However, if the Common Market were ever to do anything about the agricultural policy, British farmers would suffer. Sadly, that is why the Government have never proposed a reform of the CAP. We hear my right hon. and hon. Friends talking, year after year and month after month, about the need to reform the CAP, if only these wretched Continentals would agree. As we know, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) is well aware, at the Stuttgart summit we agreed that we would not seek any reforms in the basic structure or policies of the CAP and seek only modifications or adjustments in the CAP.

[Mr. Taylor]

The Government have said that they want to persuade the Continentals to reform the CAP but, sadly, there has been no sign, apart from the general broad sentiment, that the Government have any wish to reform the CAP. I do not believe they do, and I am sure that the Minister will accept that. Some people may think that there is a need to reform the CAP, but how do the Government intend to go about it? They have said that they want moderation in prices, but they know that that will not solve the problem and would not be acceptable to our colleagues. They say that change must be gradual, but they do not say in what direction the change will be. We are facing a crisis of over-production and all that the Government intend to do is to spend more.

Even if we were just to say, "Spend more from the increase in own resources," there is an escape clause in article 2 of the so-called solemn and binding agreement which says that account will be taken of "exceptional circumstances". Is there not something else in this binding agreement? The Minister said that we should not worry, because if the Community overspends one year, we can claw back the money the next. I asked him a specific question which, sadly, he did not answer. That concerns article 5, which says that, if there is overspending, even on top of the increase in own resources, we shall not claw back if there are what are called "aberrant developments". Nobody knows what those are, or what exceptional circumstances are.

Mr. Johnston: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he wants a solemn and binding agreement so rigid that no exceptional circumstances and no aberrant developments of any kind would affect it?

Mr. Taylor: I am almost a little impatient with the hon. Gentleman. He knows what the score is. There is no control in this so-called budget discipline. The Liberals have talked about the Common Market with much enthusiasm, but if they are that enthusiastic, they would grab the one and only chance that we have to achieve any reform of the CAP and the Common Market. The Community has run out of cash, and all that we shall do is give a lot more money to the Common Market so that it can spend much more on agriculture and other such things. In exchange, we have only a worthless piece of paper, which provides no protection.

These days we are accustomed to talking about the Common Market's great triumphs. The other day we talked about the great achievement of handing over 5 million people to red China with the assurance that the same would not happen to them as happened to the people of Tibet or Zimbabwe. This agreement is not an achievement in any sense. We are talking about a worthless piece of paper which gives no guarantees.

The Minister told us not to worry too much because he is confident that under the arrangement the percentage spent on agriculture will be down a little. That can be achieved only by spending more money on other things. For example, I might tell one of my hon. Friends that I am worried about the percentage of his income that he is spending on gin and whisky. He might come back and say that I should not worry because he was going to spend more on gin and whisky, but so much more on tobacco that the percentage total expenditure on gin and whisky would be reduced. That is what is happening. We are about to spend much more money on agriculture, on dumping and food destruction, and nothing in the agreement can prevent it.

My hon. Friends will have been receiving large numbers of letters from pharmacists and doctors who are worried about the change in the prescribing of drugs. The Government say that the change is vital and that it will save £100 million a year. University students were not happy about something that the Government planned to do and which we were told was vital because it would save £30 million. We hear talk of the need to reduce the pensioners' heating allowance, which could save us about £50 million.

How many of my hon. Friends are aware that every week — not every year — the Common Market spends £100 million on destroying, dumping or storing food? We are experiencing a crisis. What are we doing about it? The Government plan to give more money. The only protection that we have is the goodwill of Community members. We shall have to rely upon their solemn resolve to face up to their responsibilities and to try to reduce spending.

It is difficult for me to go back to my constituents and tell them that it is vital to reduce the pensioners' heating allowance, that it is vital to reduce the percentage of rate support grant and limit a doctor's right to prescribe whatever medicines he thinks fit because we must control public spending, when the Government are providing enormous additional sums which the Common Market will waste. It does not make much sense to cut spending on regional grants in Britain if we put more money into the crazy Common Market regional fund. It does not make much sense to cut out welfare payments if we put more money into the Common Market welfare fund.

Conservatives should unite on this fundamental issue. We should not bury our heads in the sand. The only way to achieve change is to control the money supply, say that there can be no increase in resources and that reform must come from within.

There is a strategic aspect. So long as this crazy spending on agricultural surpluses continues, we are providing a massive boost and subsidy to the Soviet Union and its immediate supporters. I do not think that people are fully aware of the immense boost that we are giving to the Soviet economy and war machine as a direct result of the CAP.

We were talking the other day about sending an extra £19 million to Ethiopia on the strict understanding that we cut aid to Bangladesh. How many people are aware that every week—not every month or every year—we send 164,000 tonnes of cheap, subsidised food from the Common Market to the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and other essential parts of the Soviet bloc. What price do we charge? A recent parliamentary answer gives the information. We are sending beef at the equivalent of 40p a pound, sugar at 7p a pound, flour at 5p a pound and wine at the unbelievable price of 7p a litre. At one time I thought that that was a secret plot by the Common Market's Right wing to spread alcoholism in Russia and so undermine the people's will.

If those prices were reflected in the Russian shops, it would not be so bad, but the Russian housewives, I am sad to say, do not gain advantage. The Soviet state machine shoves up the prices and keeps the difference. We are talking about a massive sum which is a direct aid or subsidy to the Soviet Union and others. I do not mind paying high taxes in Britain to provide an Army, Navy and Air Force to defend ourselves against Russian expansionism, but it is crazy and nutty that I should have to pay additional taxes to subsidise the Soviet Union, Bulgaria and the Soviet war machine.

Despite the ever-growing surpluses, the Common Market has begun a system of super-subsidies. A recent example is the special sale of butter to Russia at 17p a pound in blocks of 50,000 tonnes. Is there anything in the Government's proposals which will reduce those figures? There is not. The figures and the mountains will continue to rise and nothing will be done about it. We know that to be so in our heart of hearts.

If hon. Members are not worried about subsidising Russia they should, for God's sake, worry about what they are doing to the Third world. It makes me sick to hear some of my right hon. and hon. Friends talk all this Brandt nonsense and how they want to help the Third world, when they are the architects of the most vicious policy against the Third world—the common agricultural policy.

Why are Third world countries unable to provide food for themselves? Why are they unable to pay their debts? Why are they unable to buy British machines? The reason is that we are deliberately depriving the Third world of a fair price for its agricultural produce by dumping food on the world market.

If one produces sugar in the ideal place in the world for that purpose, one receives about £90 a tonne. A farmer in Norfolk producing sugar beet receives about £350 a tonne. The world price is so low because we are dumping. It is not just a question of what we dump because everything is comparable — wheat with rice, and so on. We are causing hardship and damage, distress, starvation and misery in the Third world as a direct consequence of the agricultural policy. The Government plan to do nothing about it. That is wrong and shameful.

I have been speaking for just over 15 minutes and many other hon. Members want to speak. I hope that the Government and my hon. Friends will be wary about what they are doing about relations with the United States of America. It is abundantly clear — it was one of my original reservations about the EEC — that if the Common Market is to have any meaning inevitably it will conflict with the United States. We are seeing more and more signs of that. We forget at our peril that the United States pays for most of western Europe's defence. It pays 52 per cent. of the total cost. The Americans are becoming a little fed up. Motions in the Senate stress the need to reduce spending by the United States in western Europe.

What worries me is that the Common Market seems to be going out of its way to make life difficult for America, to be unfair and unreasonable. A good example is the recent Common Market outrage about the export of steel pipes and tubes to the United States. Our friends in the Commission said that the Americans were imposing outrageous and illegal restrictions on Common Market imports. They said they would have to retaliate and impose restrictions on American goods.

The Common Market came to an agreement. In 1982 it was called an exchange of letters. We said that we would restrict our exports of pipes and tubes to the United States to 5·9 per cent. of the US total market. In fact, our exports were not kept to that figure but soared to 14 per cent.— more than double the share that had been agreed. I asked the Government why we did nothing about that. They said that, as the agreement did not establish a binding limit on EEC exports of steel pipes and tubes, there was no question of the Government or any other EEC member seeking to impose a limit. In effect, they were saying that the agreement into which they had entered did not matter a damn.

The Government objected strongly when the Americans stepped in and said, "Sorry, we are going to impose the 5·9 per cent. limit until we obtain an agreement that will work." I am sure that there is some way in which the Government could claim that that was not fair or right. The fact is that we reached what the Americans thought was an agreement on 5·9 per cent., yet we exported 14 per cent. and did nothing about that. Indeed, the Government said in Parliament that they were not prepared to do anything about it, but they then objected like crazy when the Americans wanted to do something about it.

The same applies to the dumping of food. There are informal agreements on which parts of the world countries can dump food in. We are moving into areas that the Americans have traditionally regarded as their dumping grounds. I am concerned that the activities of the Common Market, especially those of the Commission, are deliberately creating a conflict between Britain and the United States, and that that conflict will grow.

Of course, there is also the effect on our country. Let us consider what is happening to Britain's trade. The figures for manufacturing trade in the White Paper are wrong and do not add up. I pointed that out to the Minister during a point of order. The White Paper puts exports at £3·6 billion and imports at £12·6 billion, with the difference being £3·9 billion. That is not even——

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I have been advised that there is an error in the printing. The figure for exports should be £8·7 billion, not £3·6 billion. The figures will then be reconciled.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. However, I find it difficult to understand how the difference between £3·6 billion and £8·7 billion can be a printing error. I appreciate my hon. Friend's courtesy in intervening on that point.

We must ask ourselves about the implications. My worry has always been for the British economy. We have hooked ourselves on to an area of structural decline and become a peripheral part of it. We are in an area that is destined to have higher unemployment than the remainder of the world, and we are especially vulnerable. The trade factor shows exactly what is happening with the movement of decision-making and investment towards the centre of the Market.

Our amendment is about the budget discipline only. I know that the Minister is one of the most honest Ministers in the Government. He must accept that all we have in the discipline document is a form of words that means absolutely nothing and will give us no security. All we have to rely upon is the word and the goodwill of Ministers in the Common Market who have made spending a total nonsense. They have spent money like water — wastefully and irresponsibly. There is not the slightest sign of any solid common sense in the EEC.

We will do just as well without the discipline document as we will do with it. The real crunch will come when the House must decide whether to vote for more resources. Nothing that has been said today should make the House do anything other than say no on that occasion.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) is a populist doctrinaire. During these debates he repeatedly produces an effective and fluent blend of facts and prejudices which are difficult to tackle in an ordered manner. I wish to take up some of his points, which I have heard not for the first time.

These debates are important—something upon which, at least, the hon. Gentleman and I can agree. It is a great pity that they are conducted again and again before a practically empty Chamber and a virtually empty Press Gallery. That is, perhaps, a measure of the mistaken set of priorities on which we conduct a great deal of our political dialogue. We often ignore that which is of quite great importance in favour of the transient and sensational.

As a pro-Community Member, I admit that I find it depressing that those who consistently oppose the Common Market again and again appear in these debates and express their views. Those of us who do not take that position, who I believe to be the majority, are often absent.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Johnston: Before I give way, I must tell the hon. Gentleman that in doing so I am not setting a precedent.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I appreciate that he cannot see everything as it is. Those of us participating in the debate are concerned mainly to reform the Community. Just because we do not believe that the sun shines out of the back of the Community's head does not mean that we want to get out of it.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. Gentleman could have fooled me.

I want to direct my remarks to the Minister. I want to raise questions on a number of important issues. I hope that he can answer some of them when he replies to the debate and will correspond with me on the remainder. One asks questions in many of these debates, but receives no answers.

We did not hear that magic word "Spinelli". We did not hear the less onomatopaeic word Dooje, which was raised by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). There was no reference from the Government to the important development — whether or not we agree with it — in current Community thinking about the institutional change that may be required. When the Minister replies I hope that he will say something about the Government's thoughts: not necessarily that we must accept Spinelli hook line and sinker, but that he will address the basic question whether the Government think that the present treaty is adequate or whether it requires some change, and if so in what direction.

It is evident that the Government would agree with Spinelli on the tearing down of internal trade barriers and on having real freedom of movement. No doubt the Minister has seen the article in The Economist of 24 November, from which I shall quote briefly. It is entitled, "How Europe has failed". The thrust of the argument is not that advanced by the Minister for Southend, East, that the failure is to attempt to get together, but approaches the matter from the other side, namely that we have not got together sufficiently, and consequently our economic performance had been hindered.

The article states:

> "In producing the new generation of digital-telephone switches, North America relies on three companies, Japan on two. In western Europe nearly 10 companies produced these switches, at an R and D cost of $500 million—$1 billion per company, which they then could not sell anywhere in the EEC except their home countries because each government protected its own."

I want to know the Government's view on that sort of integration. There is no doubt that if, on a Community-wide level, we want to compete effectively with the United States and Japan, there will be some areas where firms will suffer and go to the wall. That is not an easy matter. It is a difficult issue. Let me quote again from this article:

> "Government procurement accounts for an immense market —equal to some 17 per cent. of European Community GDP. European Governments have wielded their purchasing power for ill in two ways. The first is by discriminating in favour of domestic producers. This has been most flagrant in telecommunications, but it happens with all high-tech products. In October the EEC Commission issued a declaration which feebly 'urged' member states to open 10 per cent. of their telecommunications purchasing to products from other EEC countries. The other discrimination in European public procurement is in favour of big companies. Government contracts can be a lifeline for small firms and new industries."

If the Government, as they are continually telling us, are in favour of breaking down all the non-tariff barriers, do they also recognise that the logic of that position means that both in Government support policy and in inter-governmental co-operation within the Community we shall have to look at ways in which competing firms within the different countries of the Community can be integrated in some way? In some cases it will mean that some firms will be forced to the wall. In forcing them to the wall, a more effectively competitive position will be created. That is not an easy matter, but it is part of the logic. So Spinelli, we would presume, is all right in certain respects.

May I also take the opportunity to remark that in the exchange between the hon. Gentleman the Member for Livingston and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), who has temporarily left us, about majority voting, it seemed to me that at least on the face of it the Government were moving in the proper direction.

Secondly, I wish to ask a few questions about the Parliament. The hon. Member for Livingston perfectly properly referred to the Dooge committee. It is much to his credit that he did. It is remarkable that the Government made no reference to it at all. The hon. Member for Livingston and the Minister had an exchange of words about what exactly the Government's position was on the potential budgetary powers of the Parliament. After some pressure from the hon. Member for Livingston, I understood the Minister to say that he had more or less reserved the whole chapter on the Parliament. This is very interesting, but it tells us nothing about the Government's view on what kind of changes, if any, there should be in the Parliament.

If there is to be greater integration, and if more is to be done trans-nationally, does this not mean a stronger Parliament? Or is it, contrary-wise, the Government's position—I suspect that it would be the position adopted by the hon. Member for Livingston — that democratic control is exerted, not through the Parliament, but through the Council of Ministers, and that therefore one has a route to the fabulous veto which everybody goes on and on about?

When a Parliament is elected on a Community-wide basis, it develops Community-wide attitudes. The Budget Committee met on 3 and 4 December and was unanimous in rejecting the budget. There was not a single voice, not even an abstention, against its rejection. That means something. [Interruption.] I did not quite catch what the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said. However, few Members of the European Parliament would be able to match the hon. Gentleman in that regard. There is no doubt that in the eyes of many Members of the European Parliament the conciliation procedure is farcical and not at all meaningful. The Council is not operating the treaty as it stands at present while there is any chance of change.

Mr. Robin Cook: I shall not detain the hon. Member for long, but he referred to the exchange that I had with the Minister. For the avoidance of doubt, perhaps I could confirm for him that it would appear that the reservation to which the Minister referred applies to the whole section on the European Parliament. There would appear—the Economic Secretary might wish to refer this to his officials—to be a misprint on page 20, by which footnote 2, which gives effect to this, appears at an earlier point in the text where it clearly intrudes upon section B. It was that which led me to the reasonable assumption that it referred to section B. But since footnote 2 appears to predate footnote 1, which comes later in the section, there has obviously been a misprint, which the Economic Secretary might wish to have corrected.

Mr. Johnston: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, on which there is really no need to comment any further.

What about the uniform electoral system, for example? Does the Minister envisage any change taking place there before the next European elections in approximately five years' time? We in the Liberal party and our Social Democratic colleagues remain politely bitter about the last result and about the fact that 2,591,652 people voted for the alliance in the United Kingdom and obtained no representation at all, while fewer than double that number voted Labour and obtained 32 seats. Obviously that has affected the political balance within the Parliament and distorted it in a way that is not reflective of the general position in the Community as a whole.

Turning, thirdly, to the Commission, we know that the Prime Minister is in favour of one commissioner per country. I suspect the reason why the Prime Minister agrees to this position, which, on the face of it, looks very fair, reasonable and rational. Why do we have two commissioners for the large countries and one commissioner for the small countries? In a sense, it was to protect the realistic political weight of the large country. If one then proceeds to the argument that Britain should have one commissioner and that Luxembourg should have one commissioner, I suspect that at the back of her mind the Prime Minister is also saying, "We want a weak Commission, anyway, do we not, so it will not make any real difference, will it?" [Interruption.] I did not quite catch what the hon. Member for Livingston said, but I am sure that it was quite helpful.

Do the Government have any views on the reform of the Commission, apart from that which we do know about? What about the idea of the President of the Commission, when he is chosen, having the opportunity or the power to select in some way or another his commissioners, his team, who are to work with him? It does great credit to the diplomatic skills of Mr. Delors that he managed so quickly to sort out the portfolios last weekend. Nevertheless, the power of the President is very much limited. Very often, for various reasons which have nothing to do with any kind of nationalism, he is lumbered with people whom he would not otherwise have chosen.

The staff of the Commission were referred to by the hon. Member for Livingston in various critical comparisons of cost, but it must be said that there is a fair amount of crisis in terms of staff pressure within the Commission. There is the problem of older people who are holding on to fairly key positions which were inherited some time ago. Beyond that, the plain fact is that the Commission is being asked by each member country to do more and more things and does not have any opportunity, through its staff, to be able effectively to do them properly.

My fourth question relates to economic initiative and economic convergence. This point has been touched on in previous exchanges. I had an exchange with the Prime Minister on 5 December, when the right hon. Lady said:

> "The hon. Gentleman mentioned convergent economic policies, but the Community is not meant to be a mechanical redistributive mechanism." — [Official Report, 5 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 359.]

What is it supposed to be? [Interruption.] I thought that the hon. Gentleman was interested in reform and improvement. The Community was established to provide the sort of cauldron within which economic activity could be more effectively pursued, but there was also, undoubtedly, the concept of redistribution. Why else have a regional fund? Why else have a social fund? There was the concept that the poorer countries would be lifted up and that wealth would be shared out, and an attempt was made—idealistic, perhaps too idealistic even, but a good idea—to create opportunity at a roughly equivalent level througout the Community.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the original intention was to bring up the peripheral areas of the Community. How does that balance with the argument for enlarging the Community yet again? Spain and Portugal—possibly others—now want to join the Ten. They are poor countries by industrial standards. When will we be able to cope with the peripheral regions of the existing Ten and still enlarge the Community?

Mr. Johnston: The hon. Gentleman was an effective chairman of the Regional Committee of the European Parliament. If he will wait one minute I shall come to his point, which is linked with the social and regional fund.

The hon. Member for Southend, East made much of mis-expenditure in the Community. He referred to the regional fund as a silly fund—or a word to that effect. The regional fund now is so small that it has a limited effect and certainly nothing like the remarkable effect that many of us hoped it would have when the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) and I were in the European Parliament, when George Thomson was in charge of establishing that fund.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Johnston: If the hon. Gentleman will permit me to finish my point I shall give way, despite what I said earlier about a precedent.

The total EEC budget that we are discussing is about 2 or 3 per cent. of the Community's GNP. The regional and social funds, taken together, are less than 10 per cent.

of that 2 per cent. That is tiny. How can one ever expect any convergence to be achieved using that sort of mechanism? It is not possible in a thousand years. No wonder Mr. Papandreou is making the point that he is making.

What is the Government's view on convergence? On page 18 of "Developments in the European Community January-June 1984" I find that the regional fund had £1,222 million in 1984, of which £1,157 million was what is called quota. In other words, it is already allocated between countries. It has very little to do with the central evaluation. Only £65 million was non-quota. There was a time when it was hoped that a much larger proportion of the regional fund would be non-quota and allocated by the Community according to the guidelines laid down by the Commission and advised upon by the Parliament, rather than simply as a result of a haggle between countries in a way that was most unsatisfactory.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in giving way a second time. I shall give the usual undertaking that, except in exceptional circumstances, I shall not interrupt him again.

The hon. Gentleman is putting the case for a regional fund. One way that he has suggested is that money could be moved from the richer to the poorer parts of the Community. Sadly, we are one of the poorer parts of the Community and are net contributors to the EEC budget. Therefore, the fund has not worked in that direction. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is as sad about that as I am.

The other way in which the fund could work would be to have a series of policies devised at the European level which would apply throughout the Community. We have a regional fund at the moment and various policies within that regional fund. The main one relates to industrial training. The Government have also said that they want to spend more money on regional policy. Why is money spent on training better allocated at the Brussels or Strasbourg level than by national Government?

Mr. Johnston: There are fairly obvious reasons for that. If guidelines are laid down which are agreed to by all the individual countries, I do not see why that should not be the basis of the distribution. In fact, it must be the basis of the distribution if one is to have a Community-wide policy.

I come next to the question of enlargement. I should have liked to see the date of 1 January 1986 achieved. I agree with what was said by the hon. Member for Livingston. He quoted Gaston Thorn. I spoke to him last weekend and he repeated that he was very doubtful whether it was possible, particularly as it was unlikely that Papandreou would withdraw his veto.

Why is Papandreou pressing that? It must seem to him that this is the last opportunity that he will have. He is using the same sort of tools to bring pressure to bear as the British Prime Minister used. The British Prime Minister used those tools to achieve budgetary discipline and a rebate for the United Kingdom. Papandreou is doing so in order to achieve greater expenditure from the regional and social funds within Greece. He knows that if he does not get it now it is unlikely that he will get it after enlargement. It would not be possible to deal effectively with the problem, not so much of Spain, but certainly of Portugal and Greece, unless there was a considerable increase of own resources. There is no balking that question.

I hope that everyone remembers that if Spain fails to get in that will have an effect not just on Gibraltar and negotiations there, but a direct effect on the referendum on Spain's membership of NATO. Therefore, those matters cannot just be put into compartments.

The question of political co-operation is dealt with in section IX. On Iran and Iraq it says:

"The Ten noted with concern the continuing conflict . . . They appealed to the two parties to look for a peaceful solution".

It is not a particularly good example of co-operation if Britain has so increased its trade with Iran that it is thereby able to obtain the necessary income to purchase weapons, as I suspect it in part does, and to obtain from Britain motor parts and vehicles which can be used in the war effort, while on the other hand France directly supplies weapons to Iraq. That is not a good example of political co-operation within the EC.

The paragraph on the Arab-Israeli dispute says:

"They called upon the Government of Israel to put an end to its policy of establishing settlements in the Occupied Territories."

Good. That is an essential pre-requisite to a settlement in the middle east. What pressure, as a consequence of that, has the Community put on the United States? UNESCO is not mentioned, but one wonders what the logic is when the Government argue in favour of political co-operation and yet refuse to observe the unanimous request of all the other members of the Community that we should not withdraw from UNESCO. Indeed, the Minister knows their views.

In conclusion, let me quote the Minister of State. As I noted it, he said that "of course there are certain proposals which, if we had been left to ourselves, we could have made better." There is a certain arrogance in that which is perhaps not typical of the Minister. He does have glimmerings of open-mindedness. However, it is rather redolent of speeches of the hon. Member for Southend, East. As the Americans and the Japanese streak ahead of us and our unemployment queues lengthen, I find it extraordinary that the House spends its time lauding itself and endlessly going on about the virtues of the British veto, irrespective of whether it is applied by a Right-wing Conservative Government with Right-wing views or a Left-wing Labour Government with Left-wing views. I sometimes feel that instead of being in the Chamber of the House of Commons I am in a neolithic political tomb.

Mr. Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Johnston: If the Community is to proceed, it must set aside national prejudices and develop a coherent, common will.

7.50 pm

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): This debate will be the last for some time in the long series which we have had on the reform of the framework of the European budget. It is an opportunity for us to take stock of what has been achieved and to consider future prospects.

There can be no doubt about the cost to Britain of the long dispute that we have had with our partners about the framework of the budget. I emphasise that the quarrel was not of our making. The problems flow from the budgetary arrangements which were agreed among the Six before we joined the Community, and they were anticipated by Britain in the negotiations for accession in 1972 and 1973, when we obtained assurances from the Community. Nevertheless, the cost of our efforts to get the Community to honour the commitments which it made in 1972 and 1973 has been high. There has been the disillusion among the British people, which is amply reflected in these debates. There has been the disillusion also of some of Britain's friends on the continent, who have never really understood what we have been worrying about. There has been the narrowing of the focus of our national vision of Europe. Perhaps most important of all, a series of concessions have been made and British interests have not pressed because of the overriding importance which the Government have rightly attached to making progress on the reform of the budget. Have we reached the end of this painful and debilitating argument, or will there be more to come? I must tell the House that in my opinion the answer to the question must be no.

In logic there are three possible solutions to the problem of imbalances in Britain's net contribution to the Community budget. First, there might be a corrective mechanism to reduce the gap between contributions and receipts. Second, there might be a reduction of spending on agriculture in the Community's budget. This is criminal because such spending falls most heavily on the United Kingdom with its relatively low share in European agriculture. Third, there is the idea of increasing Community spending on non-agricultural policies from which we are net beneficiaries. These three solutions are not mutually exclusive. Indeed, we have heard Ministers saying over the years that they expect all of them to play their part.

I wish to consider the implications of the Fontainebleau agreement and of the new text on budgetary discipline for those three solutions. Take first the Fontainebleau agreement, the essential feature of which is its provision of a new corrective mechanism to replace the temporary agreement of May 1980 and the failed mechanism negotiated at the Dublin summit in December 1974.

The Fontainebleau mechanism has been hailed as a permanent solution. Is it? Part of the agreement specifies:

"The corrective formulas will form part of the decision to increase the VAT ceiling to 1·4 per cent., their durations being linked."

There is no doubt that, from the British point of view, that formula represents a real achievement. We have obtained an abatement of two thirds of our net contribution over the period of the 1·4 per cent. ceiling, and we have succeeded in getting those arrangements embodied in new legal institutions and procedures which will become vested facts and will give us acquired rights. So much on the positive side. But what happens when the 1·4 per cent. ceiling is reached? Will the British abatement continue at two thirds of out net contribution at that time? Will we be able to retain that abatement while insisting on no increase in the 1·4 per cent. ceiling? If there is an increase over the ceiling, will our two thirds abatement be able to continue without challenge?

The answer to these questions is that no one knows. We are told that the abatement formula and the increase in own resources are linked. That is the phrase in the agreement. However, the character of the link is not specified. From close observation of the subject for some years, it is my belief that when the time comes there will be several different views about the nature of the link. We shall have the advantage of the principle of special treatment for Britain having been conceded and of the practice having become established, so I doubt whether we shall once again have to face fundamental arguments about whether or not we should have any rebates at all. However, I have no doubt that the idea of a two thirds reimbursement will come under heavy pressure in future.

In view of this prospect, Britain continues to have a special interest in the level of the Community's farm spending, which is the root cause of our special problem, and in the balance between that farm spending and spending on other policies.

What will be the impact on that balance of the new agreement on budgetary disciplines? Let us consider, first, the new discipline on farm spending. I do not quarrel with the Government for having been driven back from their original position that budget disciplines must be written into the treaty. Nor do I complain especially that it is envisaged that spending on agriculture will grow at a rate that is "no greater than" the rate of increase of own resources rather than the initial British phrase which called for a rate "markedly below" the growth of own resources.

However, nothing in the budget discipline agreement has changed the fact that the Community's spending on agriculture is determined essentially by external factors, especially by the state of harvests around the world and the movement of currency rates of exchange. Essentially, the new agreement introduces a new element into the Community's procedures for making decisions about agriculture. It provides that if there is evidence that the Commission is satisfied that the Agriculture Ministers are contemplating decisions that will cost more than is provided by the so-called "reference framework", Finance Ministers will be called in before any decision is made.

I have no doubt that this is a valuable innovation, and I am sure that the Finance Ministers, and my hon. Friend especially, will breathe heavily over the shoulders of their agriculture colleagues. But how likely is it that they will take a view that is radically different from that of colleagues in the same Governments who face the same political pressures? In my view, the physical presence of Finance Ministers around the Council table will constitute a factor of restraint, but no more. Therefore, I predict that until we have terminated the open-ended nature of CAP price supports—as we have now done in the milk sector — we shall continue to see spending on agriculture overshoot regularly. I must say that I find somewhat unconvincing the reasoning of my hon. Friend the Minister about the effect of majority voting.

What is to happen to the third possible solution to the British problem—that element in Community spending from which we might hope to make a net benefit? I refer to the non-farm spending — the so-called "non-obligatory" expenditure. My first fears were that the Government would lock Britain into a straitjacket in which non-farm spending would be bound to be as restrained as spending on agriculture. Happily, those fears have turned out to be mistaken. The budget discipline agreed for non-farm spending is essentially no different from the arrangements which already exist, by which the Council has sought always to stay within the maximum rate.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Why does my hon. Friend think it is good for the Common Market to increase its expenditure on non-agricultural items?

Mr. Jackson: I was about to explain that, because I expected that point. Briefly, I believe that it is in this area that we shall find a long-term solution to our problem of long-term imbalance.

Because the budget discipline for non-agricultural spending is no different from what we already have, the possibility remains that, from time to time, the Council may agree to spend more on non-agricultural policies than the amount prescribed by the maximum rate—although I note with regret that the Council will be able to do so only on the basis of unanimity. Therefore, in spite of my gloomy prognosis for the continuing growth of farm spending, the possibility remains that non-farm spending will grow just as fast, so the overall balance between farm spending and non-farm spending will not worsen—indeed, it may even get better. But if farm spending regularly overshoots, as I fear it will, that balance will turn ever further against us.

Where will that non-farm spending go? That is the $64,000 question. If I am right in saying that the Fontainebleau agreement does not solve our problem in perpetuity, and that the growth of agricultural spending is unlikely to be as constrained as we would like, the third solution—the growth of non-farm spending—will be very important to us in the long term. That is the answer to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). We know that heavy claims will be made by other member states, especially after enlargement. Will the British Government be in there fighting for the share of that new spending that we will need if we are to turn the balance of our net contributions permanently on to a more favourable basis? I must confess that I am concerned that the Government have not yet come fully to terms with the problem.

So great is our concern with budget discipline that we run the risk of overlooking opportunities for doing ourselves a good turn through Community spending. I shall give a simple and topical example. It is now becoming apparent that Britain is almost isolated on the exceedingly sensitive issue of acid rain. We face the possibility that we may be outvoted on this question, and the probability that, in due course, we shall have to find the money needed to deal with the problem.

If we were not so worried about budget discipline that we had almost given up ways of spending Community money to Britain's advantage, we might have anticipated that position, saying, "All right, we shall go along with the majority on acid rain, but, since there are so many coal-fired power stations in Britain, and because this is so self-evidently a Community-wide transfrontier problem, we are looking for substantial support from the Community budget for the adaptation of our power stations." I have no doubt that, if such a programme were agreed, it would involve spending well beyond the limits of the budget discipline agreement. I would not worry about that. My concern is rather that it would worry the Government. Indeed, I fear that that consideration would be uppermost in their mind. With regret, I must say that such an attitude could be simply described as cutting off one's nose to spite one's face.

8.3 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): My remarks will be confined to the sections in the draft budget and the White Paper on the fishing industry. I should like to concentrate on the issues of maritime inspection and controls, Community education and vocational training and the adjustments of capacity in the fisheries sector.

The fishing industries in the Community operate within the framework of a common fisheries policy. That framework may be altered, following the accession of Spain to the Community. Earlier this evening, the Minister assured the House that the outcome of the negotiations would be satisfactory to the British fishing industry, and I hope that events bear that out.

The EEC's fish police inspectors are beginning to make their weight felt. There have not yet been any convictions, but fishermen are certainly aware of their presence. The problems of foreign overfishing have been with us for many years, especially in the case of the fleets from Denmark, Holland and the Republic of Ireland. Where such vessels are involved, excess captures have reached absurdly high levels—so high that one can say that orders placed with Dutch yards for new and large vessels have been made on the basis of illegal fishing. That is absurd. It looks as though the EEC will take legal action following a report drawn up by the EEC's fisheries inspectorate. Similarly, the Danish Government have decided, at long last, to take action against the owners of some 70 vessels for illegal fishing.

In Lloyds List of Friday last week, Ian Strutt said:

> "The Danes were thought to have caught 150,000 tonnes of juvenile herring last year which would have matured into an adult stock of around 1 m tonnes.
> Catching of juvenile fish was thought to be continuing this year until the Danish Government decided, for the first time, to take mass action against the fleet."

The policing of the Community's fishing effort has had partial success, but much more needs to be done. I still believe that we need an expansion in the EEC's fisheries inspectorate. I should like to hear the Government's view on that matter.

Item 4300 in section III B of the draft budget refers to > "Measures establishing a Community education and vocational training policy in the fisheries sector."

Yet the sum of money to be committed to achieving that commendable objective is about £80,000. To say the least, that is a derisory figure. If the aim is to move towards a common training and educational programme for EEC fishermen, we shall not progress far on that pittance. One essential feature of such a programme is, or should be, the interchange of those directly involved in the training of fishermen. How on earth can that be achieved, given the miserly sum of £80,000? At the very least, that sum should be trebled.

Training programmes and financial assistance should not be confined to the established educational and training bodies. They do a good job training fishermen, but we must not lose sight of the fact that many of our fishermen, especially in Scotland, live in remote communities far removed from the technical and nautical colleges that provide that training. In those circumstances, the group training associations play an important role, and I hope that they are here to stay. They were created by the sea fisheries training council, which is now defunct, and I hope that they will continue to flourish under the umbrella of the Sea Fish Industries Authority.

I am bitterly disappointed that the draft budget contains no proposals for the payment of compensation for those fishermen made redundant by the EEC's fisheries policies. I refer to the document that mentioned the adjustment of capacity in the fisheries sector. No mention is made of the fishermen displaced by the pursuit of this policy. We must remember that many of those fishermen were placed in the nasty, brutal front line of the fisheries dispute in the 1970s between the United Kingdom and Iceland. Those fishermen have been badly served by both Conservative and Labour Governments. I go further, and say that they have been betrayed by successive Governments.

While for many of those fishermen it is desperately late in the day, natural justice demands that they be given some compensation. The EEC should examine forthwith the means by which redundancy payments could equate with the financial assistance offered to those vessel owners who tie up, scrap or effect a change in the use of their vessels.

The Commission should devise a financial scheme of income guarantees for redundant fishermen in line with some aspects of the provisions available to coal and steel workers. I do not believe that such payments should be derived from a levy on each tonne of fish landed at United Kingdom ports. Some other means will have to be found. Other means have been found to compensate vessel owners so why not for the fishermen who crew those vessels?

The Commission should also investigate the possibility of a common state retirement and pension policy for all fishermen aged 55. Fishing is the most dangerous industrial occupation in Britain today. It is far more dangerous and causes more injuries and death than coal mining. No fisherman in his late fifties should be forced to go to sea. We should be talking about compensation for fishermen along the lines of that offered to redundant steel workers.

I remind the House, if it needs such a reminder, that fishermen are almost always denied redundancy payments by their employers and the state. I can give an example of that from my family. A brother of mine was given the princely sum of £385 by his firm after 19 years of service with it. The firm received £400 per gross registered tonne for each vessel that it decommissioned. It seems that the European Community believes that GRT is more important than fishermen.

Many of the vessels for which decommissioning compensation is being given were built with the aid of generous grants and loans from the Treasury. In terms of employment rights, fishermen are second-class citizens. I can give an example of that. At a recent industrial tribunal hearing in Hull, when several fishermen were claiming redundancy payments because their firms had accepted decommissioning grants and tied up their vessels—case numbers 4227/84, 7760/84, 14443/84 and 2792/84 of 24, 25, 26 and 27 September 1984—the chairman said:

"These men were on individual contracts and when they finished the voyage, and settled up, and were off articles and off pay, they were not employed, they knew they were not employed, they knew they were unemployed when they signed on as being 'available to work'; for their own reasons the applicants chose to stay loyal to"

their firm and

"for their own reasons they chose not to work elsewhere, they chose to remain with this employer and did not seek to go elsewhere or leave the trade".

The chairman found that, as a result, those claimants could not be offered redundancy. I find that disgraceful. I only wish that those fishermen could be offered a measure of hope, but reality precludes that. The Community's recalcitrance on the important issue of compensation to the crews of fishing vessels is a matter of deep regret. It is a disgraceful state of affairs.

I believe that much more could and should be done for the fishermen who catch the fish that are so vital to our maritime communities.

8.14 pm

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) is not here because I wanted to refer to his remarks about the large surpluses of some products that are built up in the Community. Surpluses are bad, unwelcome and expensive. The two fashionable surpluses—wine and butter—are not produced by British agriculture. It is almost impossible to run farming anywhere in the world as an exact science because of the vagaries of the weather, which can make one year's surplus into a deficit the following year.

The point that my hon. Friend was making—it was a fair one—is that it is expensive to have large surpluses produced by the CAP. Homes have to be found for the surpluses. He cited the example of outrageously cheap butter and other commodities being sent to Russia. The EEC countries and others will not always be in surplus. Famine in Ethiopia has caught the headlines, but only three or four years ago central and south central Africa suffered from famine. There are now countries in Africa, including Ethiopia, that are importing food but which for years were net exporters.

We must look sensibly at surpluses and not condemn them out of hand as my hon. Friend would have us do. We need sensible surpluses. The excess must be available for despatch wherever in the world it is needed. Until a few weeks ago, that happened to be Russia. I am glad to see that large supplies of food are now reaching Ethiopia. In December, 100,000 tonnes of food, including 30,000 tonnes of corn from the EEC and 8,000 tonnes of corn from Britain, are going there. Next month, 150,000 tonnes of food will go to Ethiopia.

I should like to see the CAP, with all its imperfections, geared to maintaining—as far as the weather permits—the reasonable, healthy food surpluses that may be needed in other parts of the world. I do not regard as immoral or wrong a reasonable surplus of commodities that can be made available to countries which may be in need of food today and which are likely to be in need of food in the future.

My hon. Friend mentioned the enlargement of the EEC and the accession of Spain and Portugal. That was designed to be agreed by the end of this year. It has now been slightly postponed. We in Great Britain have a great deal to fear from the expansion of the Community. Its enlargement poses a threat to British horticulture. Hundreds of horticulturists in this country are likely to face the chop once Spain becomes a member of the Community unless long transitional arrangements for its membership are made.

Portugal and Spain are substantial manufacturers of footwear, and Portugal is also a substantial manufacturer of knitwear. The House may not realise—I hope that when it realises this it will care about it—that last year Portugal exported no fewer than 48 million pairs of ladies' tights to Britain. Exports of knitwear to this country are also increasing, resulting in substantial job losses in the British knitwear industry. In the past couple of years, between 5,000 and 6,000 jobs have been lost. In five categories alone, between 1982 and 1984, Portugal's exports of knitwear to Britain increased by 100 per cent.

[Sir John Farr]

In the last year for which figures are available, 48 million garments were imported from Portugal, equivalent to the loss of about 2,400 jobs. The United Kingdom knitwear industry is now losing 50 jobs per week. We must face those facts and recognise that, unless proper safeguards are established, the accession of countries such as Portugal to the EEC will greatly accelerate the loss of jobs in areas such as mine in the east midlands.

What kind of European Commission will be running our affairs in the future? We hear that there has been a big change and that we now have one of the most Leftward-looking as well as one of the most inexperienced Commissions in recent years. I believe that it includes two British Commissioners. In view of the inexperience and certainly the Socialist inclinations of the Commission, the Government should consider carefully several times any recommendation that it may make.

In the things that matter to my constituents the EEC seems to do its best to make itself unpopular. My constituents are neither anti-EEC nor pro-EEC, but they are not impressed by the ridiculous suggestions from the Commission that the Government and both sides of the House have to resist. The recent proposal for standardisation of the clock throughout the EEC was, I am glad to say, rejected by the Government, the Opposition, all the big unions and the CBI. Trivial suggestions of that kind to achieve some federal idealist dream help to bring the EEC into disrepute as a sensible and serious unit.

My constituents like their British passports and do not want mauve EEC passports. They also see no reason why we should join the European monetary system. We have managed very well without it for many years. My hon. Friend the Minister did not mention that, although pundits say that a decision is to be made very soon. I hope that before deciding whether Britain should join the EMS the Government will take careful soundings so that there is no repeat of what happened last week in relation to education. Although sterling is now of limited international consequence, many Members on both sides still believe that it has a role to play which is far better performed outside the EMS.

Another row is blowing up about milk quotas. Last spring, all member countries except Ireland agreed to reduce milk output. As Members on both sides have pointed out, however, some countries have implemented that agreement far more energetically than others. Strangely enough, a country that we have learned not to trust in international affairs — France — seems to have offered no sign of any intention to comply with the reduction in quotas. When this matter is next discussed in the Council of Agriculture Ministers, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will insist that a clear performance chart for member countries be made available and that countries which have fallen by the wayside and virtually ignored the reduction in quotas must be dealt with through the special penal levy to which my hon. Friend the Minister of State referred.

My constituents are also angered at the apparent decision by the outgoing Commission to take Britain to the international court in an attempt to dismantle our ban on imports of fresh milk. In the many debates on the subject at the time, it was clear that this was essential not only for the British dairy industry but to ensure continued doorstep deliveries of fresh, wholesome milk. Our overall trading deficit with the EEC is about £2·4 billion per annum, of which £2·1 billion is due to our deficiency in food, beverage and tobacco trading. Imports of fresh milk on top of that would not only threaten doorstep sales but cause many more redundancies in our industry as well as making it even more difficult for our farmers to meet their milk quotas, as they now do.

What about the future? I believe that the projected increase in VAT contribution to 1·4 per cent. in 1986 and 1·6 per cent. in 1988 is to be deplored and when the House debates that I shall seek to intervene to register my protest. I hope that the Government will comment on whether Britain's reservation about increasing our percentage quota has been raised energetically enough at EEC meetings.

It is transparently obvious to some of my hon. Friends that Britain is the largest net contributor to the EEC, and has the most to lose. The rest of the member states are, by and large, net beneficiaries — France, Greece and Italy, for instance — and they have the most to gain. We should have retained the 1 per cent. of VAT. Otherwise, it is so easy in the bottomless pit of European money for our hard-earned contributions to sink without trace. All that we will have left to remind us of what we have paid may be a European anthem and a common European currency with which to pay for it.

I suppose that, for the future, one must stay in.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Why?

Sir John Farr: That is a good question. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and develop that point.

My own view is that we must be much more selective. We must stay in only if we can see that to do so clearly benefits Britain and our electors. So far, our membership of the EEC has had some very unfortunate results. For instance, my constituents fail to understand why a student from the EEC should be allowed a privileged position compared with a student from the old Commonwealth. They fail to understand why a relation or friend from a Commonwealth country such as New Zealand or Australia cannot come here to stay or may have great difficulty in obtaining a work permit, while foreigners from the nine countries can walk in on privileged terms. Such matters make the EEC very unpopular with my constituents.

Britain pays a big levy in order to belong to this club. One of the arguments on which it was sold to us was that in unity there is strength. However, those who sold the package to us forgot to add that, in order to obtain that strength from unity, we would have to pay a very large annual subscription. My constituents have yet to be convinced that that subscription is worth while.

8.32 pm

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): The Order Paper shows that in this debate we are discussing many aspects of the EEC. We are discussing the details of the 1984 budget, the various stages of the 1985 budget, the Fontainebleau agreement, the White Paper and budgetary control—a wide variety of issues. That may be why the debate has become somewhat fragmented. It may also explain why so few hon. Members attend such debates. It is regrettable that we do not direct our attention to a specific EEC issue.

I wish to concentrate my mind on a crisis within the EEC which will be with us within 48 hours. I refer of course to the probable rejection of the 1985 budget by the European Assembly in Strasbourg on Thursday. We already know from this morning's newspapers that the budget committee of the European Parliament last night almost unanimously rejected the 1985 budget. Only two members voted against that decision—two memberss from Denmark who, it is said, oppose the Common Market. All the other members of the committee voted to reject the 1985 budget. Among them were British Labour Members of the European Parliament, and British Conservative Members. They all united to reject the budget approved by the members of the Council of Ministers, including our Government's representative. We know why that has happened. The meeting at Fontainebleau, to which the Minister referred in his excellent opening speech, has played a part.

The Minister concluded by praising the efforts of our Prime Minister at Fontainebleau. I should like to associate myself with his commendation of the role played by the Prime Minister in the past few years. The European Economic Community has treated the United Kingdom badly in budgetary affairs. We have had an unfair burden to carry. The Prime Minister has been in a difficult negotiating position but, for standing firm for our rights, she deserves our support.

However, we must also pay attention to the speech made by the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson). The hon. Gentleman and I have worked together in Strasbourg and later in this place for some six years. He is one of the great optimists of the European Community. Never until now has he been critical of the EEC. Never until now has he displayed pessimism. We must, therefore, now take his opinions seriously. As a former rapporteur of the EEC budget committee in Strasbourg, he knows what he is talking about. The hon. Gentleman says that the Fontainebleau agreement is not a long-term settlement, and that there is no real budgetary control. His speech will be well worth reading tomorrow in the Official Report.

The 1985 budget is likely to be rejected for various reasons. British Labour MEP's will vote against it because they wish to undermine the achievements of our Prime Minister at Fontainebleau. They wish to undo the settlement of the British rebate. They dislike that settlement. They wish to bring it back to the floor of the European Parliament.

Why do the Conservative MEP's also oppose the budget? Why do other Members from other countries oppose it? They do so because of the issue of the powers of the European Assembly. That is the kernel of the problem—the contest between the national Parliaments and the European Assembly. Until that key issue is clarified, there will be crisis after crisis over European bugetary affairs.

The situation is chronic. Under article 201 of the treaty of Rome, only the Council of Ministers has power to raise revenue. However, under article 203 of the treaty, responsibility for expenditure is shared by the Council of Ministers and the European Assembly. When there is an assembly with no responsibility for the raising of revenue which yet shares responsibility for expenditure, there is a chronic problem which will continue to breed political irresponsibility. That is the situation today.

The European Assembly Members are rejecting the 1985 budget in pique. They are piqued, first, because they were not involved in the settlement of the British rebate at the Council meeting at Fontainbleau and, secondly, because they wish to bring that matter back into the 1985 budget. There is another reason for their annoyance. They recognise that the budget as proposed by the Council of Ministers will not cover expenditure for 1985. Within the 1 per cent. own resources limit, the budget is legal; but the Members who reject the 1985 draft budget wish to proceed to exceed the 1 per cent. VAT limit and to go straight to the 1·4 per cent. figure for own resources.

Such a move would be illegal. It would pre-empt the general understanding that there would be discipline before we adopted the 1·4 per cent. VAT figure. That is the key issue—Members of the European Assembly are determined to rush the Community into 1·4 per cent. before discipline in the budget has been created. That can happen in two ways. Either the budget can be rejected or it can be amended, at which point it becomes a disputed budget. However, whether it is disputed or rejected, there will be no budget within a few weeks on 31 December.

Some of us know what all that means because, as Members of the European Parliament, we lived through such an experience years ago. It means the one-twelfth system by which the Commission is limited from 1 January to spend one twelfth per month of what it spent this year or of the draft budget for 1985, whichever is the smaller. The effect of that is serious for the United Kingdom. It must be spelled out that those who are opposing the 1985 budget are acting in pique because they have limited power and in support of an expanded budget which would be illegal because it would be over the 1 per cent. VAT limit. It would also be against the interests of the citizens of the United Kingdom because the one-twelfth system will result in reduced expenditure through the guarantee fund for the agriculture industry. That is serious for our farmers.

The United Kingdom has benefited more than any other country from the expansion of the European social fund, money from which goes to areas of high unemployment to provide training. The 50 per cent. of the fund which may be used by the end of March will not be available if the 1985 budget is thrown out. Moreover, there will be a reduction in EEC development aid to Third world countries if the budget is not accepted. That, too, will not be popular in the United Kingdom, where there has been much public interest in African countries, especially Ethiopia. The effect of rejecting the budget on fishing areas is more than likely a stop on FEOGA grants to the fishery section so that the money can be used in other ways.

Such limited expenditure, which would affect the United Kingdom as I have just described, could continue for many months. Last time, it nearly took until 12 July—an appropriate date for us in Northern Ireland—before the issue was resolved. The problem might not be resolved until 12 July 1985. By then, the United Kingdom will be suffering in many ways. However, United Kingdom people and United Kingdom interests will not be all that suffer. The European Parliament will be damaged. That Parliament has not caught the imagination of the United Kingdom electorate and many of its Members are elected by less than 10 per cent. of the electorate. That is not a tribute to democracy and it does nothing to enhance the status of the European Parliament. By next summer, the Strasbourg Parliament might have to crawl back and accept what the Council of Ministers has suggested. That happened last time. If that happens, far from strengthening the European Parliament and increasing its credibility, its standing will have been damaged even further.

It would be in the interests of the people of the United Kingdom and that of furthering the cause of the European Parliament for that Parliament to sit back and reflect on what it is doing and to decide to support the Government and the 1985 budget.

8.45 pm

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): These debates are usually rather depressing affairs in which we rehearse familiar arguments and make the same speeches. The right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) went a long way to bringing a sense of reality into our proceedings. He did well to draw attention to the imminence of the crisis in regard to the future of the European Parliament. He put his finger unerringly on the central issue.

It might surprise my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) to learn that I have always believed that there is great danger in the form and functions of the European Parliament as it was conceived. It has the power to spend money, but no responsibility for raising it. That is why I was so ferociously opposed to the Labour Government's proposals for devolution in Scotland and Wales. I do not oppose devolution, but their proposals were disastrous.

The Frankenstein is well and truly out of the bottle, if I have not mixed my metaphors too much, and we are now faced with a Parliament which is determined to assert its authority as a directly elected body, however slim that authority might be in view of the small turnouts for European elections. Moreover, it is on a collision course with the British and other European Governments. I have little doubt that one of the results will be a growing demand in Britain and elsewhere to do away with the European Parliament, although that means rewriting the treaty. Such pressure will not be easy to resist.

However small my enthusiasm for the European Parliament and however grave my misgivings about the form in which it was set up, I must utter a solemn warning. In order to abolish it, we shall have to rewrite the treaty. I am convinced that it will turn out to be impossible to conclude a new treaty which gives us even part of the satisfaction that we derive from the imperfect operations of the present Community. The outlook of the statesman who concluded the original treaties in 1957, to which we acceded many years later, meant that they were prepared to see the wood and not be blinded by the trees. They were prepared to subordinate the short-term interests of their countries to secure advantages which could be achieved only by a pooling of effort. I find no evidence of any such readiness among leaders of any of the countries that constitute the present Community. Much as I deplore the weaknesses of the present Community and regret the wrong functions given to the European Parliament, we must live with the present treaty and try to make it work.

By the same token, I share many of the pertinent criticisms of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East of a CAP which piles up ludicrous surpluses and seeks ways of funding ever larger surpluses.

I must also reflect that had we followed the policies advocated by the Labour party and a few Conservative Members—it is not unfair to include my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East among them—and bought our food in the cheapest markets, we would today be bidding against those countries stricken by famine for the world's limited supplies of cereal. I do not believe for a moment that that would place us in a better situation.

I have never made any secret of my view that the European Community is unsatisfactory. However, it is the best Community we have, even though it is just not good enough. The Community in which we presently live is rapidly losing out to the rest of the world in industrial innovation, the creation of new jobs and raising the living standards of its people. It is failing to do the job it was set up to do. It is not even a Common Market. We shall not get even half of what the Community should be providing unless we are prepared to go forward rather than backward. We should not go backward by saying that the only things we want from the Community are those which advantage us. Frankly, we cannot run any kind of alliance, let alone a community, on that basis. We must go forward and strengthen the decision-making processes of the Community. Therefore, we must take seriously the proposals circulating in the European Parliament in respect of institutional reform. I believe that the Parliament is out of its depth on financial matters, but on institutional matters I believe that it may have a lot to teach us.

Nothing alarms me more than the gap which is now opening up between the common thinking within the European Parliament among parties of all nationalities—not, perhaps, among the British Labour group, but that group is all alone in the world — on the need for institutional change and more effective ways of taking decisions, and the total refusal on both sides of this House even to consider those ideas, let alone to consider accepting them seriously. We must move towards a system in which the use of the veto is altogether exceptional. No one is suggesting that we should give up the veto where vital national interests are at stake, but unless the nations which comprise the EEC are prepared to reconcile themselves to the fact that normally they will accept majority decisions and resort to the veto only in cases of acute national need, not much progress will take place.

The best that can be hoped for under the present system is the acceptance of what is familiarly known as two-speed Europe. That is frequently described as a great tragedy. I am not sure that it is, given the limitations of the present situation. We could possibly go along with a system under which, for example, the seven nations constituting WEU agree to co-operate more closely in providing a European pillar for the North Atlantic Alliance. Equally, those nations which are getting together to build up a European aviation industry could go ahead and build the aircraft, even if British Airways, for reasons of its own, prefers to buy inferior American aircraft rather than the superior European aircraft which are available.

The founder states have formed and operated a European monetary system that provides an element of stability to their exchange rates, but, for reasons best known to the Treasury, we prefer to remain outside that system. I believe that we would do very much better within it. We can operate that type of two-speed Europe for a certain time, but even that will not work without better decision-making processes. It is notable that among the institutions of the Community which do work — the European monetary system and the Airbus consortium are two examples—there are institutions which are able to take effective and swift decisions.

8.54 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer), who is sincere in all his contributions, has called for realism. I shall attempt to be realistic and shall echo some of the points made by the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) who made a distinguished and fundamental contribution.

The ambit of our debate is extremely wide. In fact, the motion contains four debates. There is a debate on the arrangements for finances for 1984, another on the draft budget for 1985 and its various appendices, yet another on the preliminary document on own resources — an important document arising out of Fontainebleau's success or otherwise — and a fourth on the disciplinary document. If that were not enough, we have in the italicised sentence of the Order Paper consideration of Cmnd. 9348, with its 122 paragraphs. In my capacity as Chairman of the Scrutiny Committee, I wonder whether the House has taken on too large a meal.

The main purpose of my speech is to draw the attention of the House to the reports of the Scrutiny Committee on some of the documents referred to in the motion. It would be wrong of me to try to deal with all of them—the debate is too wide for that—but I want to emphasise some of the current practical points that have been mentioned so far. We are now talking about financial control in the Community. The long-awaited crunch has happened. The Community has run out of money, and its various institutions and member states are asking, "What will happen next?" In the midst of this, as the right hon. Member for Strangford reminded us, the Assembly is attempting to increase its own power and, perhaps, credibility.

We must remember that the power of this House over its own Executive is through the control of money, but the mere fact that we are asked to debate instruments which relate to running out of money in 1984, and the fact that there is also Cmnd. 9395—named as the Undertaking, but we are not discussing it now—tells us that the hoop has been burst, provided that it is possible for the House to approve that document in view of proceedings elsewhere.

If the House approves that document, the increased expenditure for 1984 will be approved. It may be a relatively small amount—a matter of 1,000 million ecu —but that is the principle, as can be seen from the 34th report from the Select Committee on European Legislation. The Committee, of which the right hon. Member for Strangford and I are members, owes a great deal to the assistance we get from our clerks. Among the batch of documents on which we reported—they were largely financial—was a consultative document, No. 8514/84, and a letter signed by Mr. Andriessen. He more or less told member states, "The Community will run out of money in 1984. Please see what you can do about it". Paragraph 7 of the document refers to raising money for the current year. It states:

"Similarly, the Council cannot, if it is to respect in full all its obligations under the Treaty, advocate an upheaval of those policies which are financed by non-obligatory expenditure. The transfer of a major volume of non-obligatory credits to EAGGF Guarantee would mean a decimation of the Community's structural and sectoral policies."

It then states that the Commission will not cut those to maintain the obligatory expenditure of the Community. That is a major statement of policy. We must be under no illusion that Cmnd. 9395 merely maintains the obligatory expenditure of the Community. It also maintains the non-obligatory expenditure, which is nevertheless above the 1 per cent. limit.

The right hon. Member for Strangford referred to the 1985 budget. The Scrutiny Committee summarised the proposals in House of Commons 78-xxxv. On page 10 we set out a schedule of the draft budget for 1985 and the preliminary draft budget for 1985. The original preliminary draft budget came to a total of 28,000 million ecu. The present budget is 2,000 million ecu less, which makes a total of 26,000 million ecu. The reason for the reduction was to keep within the 1 per cent. limit. The Council makes it clear that expenditure will exceed that. It states:

"In deciding on a budget appropriation for the 1985 EAGGF of 18,000 million ecu, i.e. a reduction of 1,315 million ecu by comparison with the figure considered necessary by the Commission in the preliminary draft Budget, the Council for its part, while emphasising the need for rigorous market management, undertakes to meet by 1 October 1985 the additional budgetary requirements which will arise in 1985."

The 1985 budget is not realistic in the eyes of the Commission. The Council, in keeping with its legal obligations, has cut it to inside the 1 per cent. limit. However, at the same time it is saying that by October 1985 it will need more propping up. The Government may return to the House to ask us to approve yet another undertaking to fill the kitty, which may be empty sooner next year than it was this year. That is assuming that the own resources mechanism is not in place by then. It may be. We hope that own resources will provide repayments for 1984 and 1985, if they go through.

I turn to a change in the financial regulations. We commented on this in our report, House of Commons 78-xxxiii. It states that the Commission proposes "that greater flexibility be given to the Commission to transfer funds between lines in this section."

In effect, that changes the appropriation. A reason why we have an appropriation Act is to maintain rigidly what the Government can spend between different votes. In the EEC it is not a budget but an estimate of expected expenditure. The financial regulation will give greater flexibility for transfer of appropriation between one heading and another. There is already a lot of that.

I turn to the question of monetary discipline. In our report, House of Commons 85-ii, the Scrutiny Committee draws the following conclusion:

"The Committee do not perceive any legal implications in the Conclusions as presented in this document but have already commented on the unusual nature of its status, and the fact that it does not have legislative form. They note that the text will arise for discussion between the Council and a delegation of the European Parliament scheduled for 21 November 1984 and will be presented for adoption thereafter."

I mention this because it is clear, not only from the report but from a letter which I received in the nick of time from the Economic Secretary, that before the disciplinary document was discussed and agreed by the Council of Ministers, a delegation from the European Parliament talked to the Council about it. That was before the House talked about it. I received a letter from the Economic Secretary today telling me that, as a result of the Dublin summit, the Council adopted the following conclusions:

"Firstly, to invite the Commission and the European Parliament to examine with it ways in which the co-operation necessary for a budgetary discipline common to all three institutions may be brought about. Secondly, to invite a delegation of the Parliament to meet it shortly before the meetings at which the Council is due to fix the reference framework for the year."

There will now be regular consultation between the Council and members of the Strasbourg Assembly in respect of budgetary discipline. The points made by the right hon. Member for Strangford have been fulfilled completely, because the budgetary procedures will now include consultation with the Strasbourg assembly, but there will be no similar consultation with the House.

The present struggle — financial control over an executive not in Whitehall but in Brussels—is critical. I suggest that the same constitutional rules apply there as applied here hundreds of years ago and as still apply today.

9.6 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): In the few minutes available to me, I shall concentrate on a fairly narrow area, although I hope that Ministers will realise that I wished to say much more.

My hon. Friends will agree that when the Scottish National Farmers Union has met Ministers it has introduced sensible and realistic proposals. That body was the first to suggest to the Minister that quotas were the way to deal with the milk problem. The NFU accepted quotas, because it suggested them, but Scottish farmers are now unhappy because the super-levy is not working. They oppose the super-levy because they believe that, although they have honoured their side of the agreement, farmers in other parts of the Community have not.

The Scottish NFU believes that the way to deal with the over-production of cereals is to allow the price to dictate the market, but it qualifies that by saying, "We are prepared to promote the idea but we want the Government to be realistic. If the rest of the Community behaves as it has done with milk quotas, we want our backs to be protected."

I represent a constituency of 2,000 square miles which are largely agricultural. The vast majority of it is mountainous agricultural land, and some parts of my constituency include the most rugged agricultural land in Scotland. When I went to school, Scotland was split into three parts—the highlands, the central lowlands and the southern uplands—but some years ago we introduced a new animal called the Highlands and Islands Development Board. It would be hard to find a more misnamed organisation, because it does not represent all the highlands of Scotland. Indeed, a substantial part of the highlands of Scotland are completely outwith the board's responsibilities.

Unfortunately, the Europeans, hearing us describe an area of Scotland as the highlands and islands, naturally think that we are talking about all the highlands. There are communications problems, not only because of the language differences but because we cannot draw lines on the map to represent the mountain areas accurately, which causes problems. The constituency of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) adjoins mine. He will know that the northern stretch of the A9 that normally gets blocked in the winter months is in my constituency. However, that is not recognised and accepted as being as difficult for farming as the Inverness area. There is something wrong with this, and something should be done about it.

Areas such as Glen Lyon, Rannoch, Drumochter, which is next to Inverness, Glen Shee, Strathadle, Glen Prosen and Glen Clova are without doubt some of the most difficult farming areas in Scotland. Therefore, they should be treated as are the rest of the highland areas. [Laughter.] This is not a laughing matter. Labour Members would not laugh if they had to face the problems of farmers living in these difficult areas. They see their neighbours being treated differently because we have drawn a line on the map that does not represent the highlands of Scotland.

I make it clear that this is not a plea for more European spending. My farmers and I take the view that budgetary disciplines are essential if Europe is ever to work, but it must be seen to be fair and responsible, and at the moment it is neither.

9.11 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Once again we are discussing the payment of more money to the Common Market, and for what? Primarily, it is for the dubious privilege of buying dearer food. It is difficult to understand why the serried ranks on the Conservative Benches want to vote for this. I am struck by the painful and glaring contrast between the Government's stringency at home and their largesse abroad in the EEC. Recently we had the statement by the Secretary of State for Education and Science. After some arm-twisting, he had to climb down. To pay for that, he took a couple of million from university furniture and a couple of million from science. On these matters we get meticulous, penny-pinching economies, but just mention the EEC or the CAP and the Government open up their coffers and money is spent with gay abandon. They spend money like a drunken sailor with eight arms.

Why is a dash of monetarism not applied to the EEC? Instead, rather like the good fairy in a pantomime, the Prime Minister rushes in to play Lady Bountiful with our money. Gone are the days when she spoke of achieving a broad balance of our payments into the budget and about getting our money back, or when she went to the Dublin summit and claimed that she was not prepared to settle for half a loaf. Gone are the days when the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he was Financial Secretary, came to the Scrutiny Committee and said that our position must be that of the French and we must be roughly in balance. Gone are the days of resolute statements and firm intentions. All hopes have disappeared. We have been let down and strung along. We have been kidded and conned, and Agriculture Ministers are still coming along with their tree-grown theory of money supply.

There are two questions that have never been answered. First, why are we paying net any money to the budget? We are one of the poorer members of the Community, so why are we not a beneficiary? The bulk of this money goes to incentives for farmers to produce more food that cannot be consumed, so the second question is: why should there be any more money for agriculture? People keep going on about reforming the CAP, but if it were reformed it would not need any more money.

We should let the countries which produce the surpluses pay for them. Not only are we denied cheap food from overseas and forced to pay the higher EEC prices, but we pay for the surpluses of other member states, which are caused by the higher prices. We are doing violence to our national interest. The policy is anti-British.

The higher prices are a type of danegeld paid by Governments on the continent to assuage their agricultural populations and lobbies. I am not against such bribes, but I do not see why we have to pay them. It would make more sense to make deficiency payments to our own farmers to keep prices low and give us cheap food.

The Foreign Secretary said that the Government had no intention of introducing legislation to increase own resources until the Finance Ministers had agreed "on precise measures to guarantee the effective implementation of budget discipline."

On the same day the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) said that it was wrong

"to proceed on the basis of fudge and hope—fudge the issues and hope that the outcome will be all right." — [Official Report, 10 July 1984; Vol 63. c. 894-907.]

Having read the documents, I am bound to say that the European political fudge-making industry has never been in better shape. We are in the ludicrous position of trying to persuade the EEC to spend less by offering it more money.

While farmers are encouraged to produce more, the budget will always push against the own resources ceiling. In the meantime, we continue to be Europe's major paymasters on a continuing and escalating basis. The truth is that the Prime Minister was out-manoeuvred at Fontainebleau. She conceded a 40 per cent. increase in tax contributions, without achieving the budgetary discipline and control of agricultural spending, in return for a refund mechanism the complexities of which serve only to conceal its imperfections. Had that mechanism been in operation from 1980 to 1983, our refunds would have been much less than they were.

Fotainebleau has provided no lasting solution to budgetary discipline and agricultural extravagance. When the EEC runs out of money again, as it will, we shall be asked to pay yet again even more. The threat is that VAT contributions will go up even further to 1·6 per cent. The prosperous farmers of West Germany were given a remission of 5 per cent. VAT, resulting in even higher prices and so even bigger surpluses. That is hardly a sign that the situation will improve.

Instead of resources determining expenditure, we have agreed to contribute £120 million to an inter-governmental whipround. Why is that? It is to bail out the CAP, to keep it going and to encourage its wasteful rake's progress. On the condition that we pay the extra £120 million, the EEC has agreed to pay us our 1983 rebate, which was agreed at Stuttgart.

The Government's "victory", or "diplomatic achievement", is that we can have some of our own money back if we pay in even more. The agreement on increasing our VAT contribution was to be conditional on the reform of the CAP. A requisite was the Council adopting measures guaranteeing budget discipline acceptable to Britain and the House.

The document is pathetic and hopelessly inadequate. It is not a regulation like the existing regulations that govern the budgetary procedure. Instead, it has the status of "Conclusions". What does that mean? I do not understand. It has no legislative force.

The sixth report for the 1983 Session of the Select Committee over which my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) presides with such distinction states:

"The result of any such controls would clearly depend upon . . .the extent to which it was enshrined in legislative form."

It has not been, and why not? The answer was given by the Prime Minister on 5 December. I do not know why the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) is making funny faces. I hope he understands that the debate can continue until 11.30 pm. The Prime Minister said:

"The text on financial budgetary discipline is binding on the Council itself, but is not being embodied into a treaty or technically — legally — into the budgetary process. — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] Because one simply cannot get agreement from all 10 countries." — [Official Report, 5 December 1984; Vol. 69, column 354.]

We could not reach agreement, which is why it is not enshrined in legislation. Are the member states likely to agree in future? I do not believe that they will do so. Therefore, we have absolutely no guarantee, yet despite that we are increasing our tax contribution to the EEC.

In article 1 of the so-called "Conclusions" it is stipulated that the EEC will act by a qualified majority. Again, that gives the veto to other countries to stop a satisfactory position. It is in no way binding—it is as watertight as a sieve. Articles 2, 3 and 4 refer to account being taken of "exceptional circumstances". What are they? From my experience of the Common Market, there are always exceptional circumstances.

Article 5 provides for a clawback of any excess expenditure over the following two years, barring "aberrant developments". What is the EEC except an aberration? It is an institutionalised aberration. We have absolutely no guarantee in any shape or form.

Once again, we have been led up the garden path—and not only on this count, but on every count, whether trade, jobs, food prices, taxation, investment in or out or fishing. Whatever the count, this country — like the Scandanavian countries—would be better off not being a member of the EEC.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The Minister made an heroic effort at the beginning of the debate to prove to the House—[Interruption.] It was an heroic effort. I shall give the reasons for its failure later. He tried to convince the House that firm budget discipline had been achieved. As we listened to the debate, it became clear that with one or two notable and unconvincing exceptions—those sitting on the Liberal Benches — the Minister manifestly failed to achieve his aim. Even the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), on whose support the Minister could generally rely, was critical of the current position in the EEC.

Perhaps it is not surprising that the Minister's efforts failed. After all, it was only a short time ago—last July — that the Government told us that they were determined to bring this year's budget into balance and that there would be no question of any supplementary budget. However, by September it appeared that their resolve had weakened. Perhaps the Minister of State can blame his hon. Friend the Economic Secretary for that and move the blame for failure slightly away from himself, for it was then that the Economic Secretary agreed to the supplementary budget that is the subject of the undertaking that is now being considered before the courts and that may be considered by us before the end of this month. However, the Economic Secretary takes an opimistic view of the supplementary budget — this extra payment of £120 million — since he described it as a reimbursable advance. Drawing upon his experience as a banker, he said that this is a payment made to the borrower in advance of the receipt of his own funds. Presumably he expects that next year the Commission will have sufficient funds to pay back to us what he is pleased to call an advance.

Perhaps another reason for the failure of the Minister of State to convince the House is that the Prime Minister cast doubt upon the firmness of the budgetary discipline which had been obtained at the Dublin summit. When my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) questioned the Prime Minister on 5 December he said:

"The Prime Minister has said that the Council has bound itself in respect of budgetary discipline. If that were to be so, would that not need financial regulations?" — [Official Report, 5 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 355.]

The Prime Minister said that she would have preferred financial regulations, but that she regarded the conclusions as binding upon the council. Even if the Government had achieved the kind of regulations that were wanted, that would still not have dealt with the fundamental problem facing the EEC with regard to its budget. Even if regulations had been obtained setting a ceiling on agricultural spending, we would have been left with a self-contradictory set of regulations. Some of the regulations already in operation in the EEC allow open-ended price guarantees and commitments in terms of agricultural spending. All that the financial disciplinary regulations would have done would have been to try to hold that down. There would have been a contradiction. Indeed, the notion of imposing firm discipline upon farm spending is like trying to hold down the lid on a pot of boiling water. Sooner of later, the lid blows off, and out comes the boiling water.

The Minister of State failed to convince the House because it is recognised that the Government have failed to achieve the original objective that they set themselves —the radical reform of the common aricultural policy. That is why, quite rightly, hon. Members on both sides of the House have continued their sustained criticism of the common agricultural policy. The CAP is responsible for the budget overspending. Unless the CAP is reformed, we can talk about firm discipline until the cows come home —an appropriate metaphor, perhaps—but we shall not get control of the EEC budget.

What we have been offered in terms of the conclusions reached by the Council are, as one senior EEC official described it. not worth the paper they are written on. Its legal status is doubtful and it is full of holes.

Even if, as the Minister of State suggested, the Commission were to take one or other member country to the European Court and try to apply the strictures of the Council to it—let us grant to the Minister of State that supposition — what I fail to understand is how there could be any success in the European Court if what one is trying to apply is a set of guidelines with such gaping holes in their application. Obviously, even in that situation, there would be every opportunity for the country allegedly in breach of the conclusions of the Council to wriggle out of any charge that the Commission wanted to bring against it. It is no good saying that people can be taken to court. They have to be taken to court with a watertight case. Without that it would be pointless.

Many points have already been well made during the debate. The references to "exceptional circumstances" and "unusual circumstances" in the various articles show that the rules cannot possibly apply. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) rightly asked, when do we find a situation in the EEC which does not have exceptional circumstances for the farming community? When can farmers not plead in their cause a gamut of conditions that they can pull into play, ranging from what is happening to the dollar to what is happening to world food markets whether in grain, sugar or whatever? Any of those situations can be used to justify whatever claim they wish to make.

We are left with a document whose legal status is unclear and whose guidelines cannot be binding because of the loopholes that they contain. We are also left with a series of conclusions that have as their major weakness that they set too high a ceiling on any future agricultural spending. That is because of the way in which the rules have been drawn.

Any of the major rules of the system can be breached or altered by a qualified majority vote in the Council. The way in which future calculations for agricultural spending are to be carried out will allow agricultural spending to rise both as a proportion of future budgets in 1985 and in the years thereafter and in volume terms. That is why the conclusions that have been adopted at Dublin cannot possibly prevent overspending in future. That is why the Minister of State completely failed to convince the House that we shall have firm control on agricultural spending.

Let us take one or two examples from what is happening now and see what confidence that will give us for the future. Look, for example, at what is happening with regard to milk production. The quota system that was introduced this year aimed at cutting EEC milk production by 7 per cent. Last Saturday the Financial Times pointed out that seven months after its introduction not one penny of the super levies have been paid and three delays to payments have already been agreed by the Commission. In October and on 1 December the Financial Times reported that the Commission had to take four EEC states to court over the milk super levy, and apparently those cases are still under consideration.

On 1 December the Financial Times commented:

"So complex are the rules that most member states are nowhere near completing the administrative arrangements to carry them out. Where they are reasonably well advanced, a number have tried strategems which the European Commission suspects are designed to soften the blow of quotas or enable their farmers to sell more milk."

West Germany is quoted as an example. It seems that it is defying the super levy regulations by exempting thousands of small farmers from more than half the reduction that is required. Although a reduced rate of cuts for small producers may be compensated for by the greater cuts that are made by large dairy farmers, the German move is believed by Commission experts to ignore both the letter and the spirit of the regulations and it has not been officially sanctioned.

We usually complain about the attitude of France towards Community regulations and Germany usually claims the virtue of wanting stringent spending controls. In this instance it appears that even West Germany, one of the more virtuous members of the Community, is bending and twisting the milk quota rules to ensure that many of its dairy farmers are exempt from Community strictures.

It is claimed that the milk quota rules show that the Community is moving towards stricter budget discipine and is prepared to accept quotas. It is said that the Community is prepared to restrict production and thus to reduce spending on agriculture. After the best part of a year following the introduction of the regulations, we find that member states are not observing them. They are busy adapting, avoiding and evading the regulations. Italy is a notorious example. One of the documents before us tells us that there are 61 cases against Italy in the European Court. Italy is flouting the rules.

If we are asked to believe that the Council's conclusions will take us forward into the future, that the EEC will present us with a balanced budget year-on-year and fulfil the Community ideal in that way and that farm spending cuts will take place, we must realise that there is little evidence for that in what has been going on so far.

The Government are trying to con us into believing that farm spending is under control and that they have obtained everything for which they have asked. Ministers return regularly from Brussels, Strasbourg, Stuttgart, Fontainebleau, or wherever the latest summit happens to be, and say, "We have won again. We have obtained everything for which we asked. Everything in the garden will be lovely." It is the greatest con job in history. They do nothing of the sort.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East) rose——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Dr. McDonald: I give way to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

Mr. Budgen: Is the hon. Lady not being grossly unfair to the Government? It may have been a con job for the first time they tried it, but it cons no one now.

Mr. Dykes rose——

Dr. McDonald: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he was absent for most of the debate. As I understand it, he is not in the Chamber to reply on behalf of the Government. If he is, he is sitting in the wrong place.

I take the point of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West. He is not deceived. Having read with interest the way in which he cuts through Ministers' condescending verbiage in Select Committee, I know that he is not conned by them. However, many members of the public believe the Prime Minister when she returns from a summit and tells us that she obtained everything for which she asked. It is our job in Parliament to make it clear that she has obtained very little of that for which she asked. In this instance she has returned with a 1985 budget——

Mr. Dykes: What did the previous Labour Government obtain?

Dr. McDonald: I shall educate the hon. Gentleman with a little history. One of the things that Conservative Members must understand — [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman must not get over-excited. I heard his piece from a sedentary position.

The transitional arrangements did not end until 1978, so the problems with which we are now faced did not arise. They have arisen since 1979 and worsened. We are now left with the 1985 budget. The proportion of that draft budget spent on agriculture will increase to 72 per cent., and in the real budget the proportion will increase to 73 per cent. As a type of palliative, the regional and social funds have been marginally increased, although, once inflation is taken into account, they probably have only stood still.

My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) described in detail the cuts in aid which appal people in this country and other member countries — cuts in transport, science, technology, industry and other social measures. Those services are the immediate victims. Yet more and more money will be paid out next year to farmers. The laughable aspect of the whole business is that the budget will cope not with 12 months but with 10 months of a year and will immediately bring us into conflict with the European Parliament as it rejects a draft budget that is too stupid for words.

The Government, having come back for more money this year, once the court case is cleared up in the way they hope, will return next year with their begging bowl asking for yet more money from the suffering British taxpayer. In the following year, they will run into a further crisis, because the 1986 budget will also fail to meet the demands made on us. The Government will start talking about an increase in own resources from 1·4 per cent. No doubt by then the Government will have run out of goods, which have already been zero-rated, on which to oppose the imposition of VAT.

Ministers talk about firm controls on spending. Nothing they have said proves the point they wish to make. Next year's budget shows that nothing like that aim will be achieved. This year's budget shows that the whole of the Minister's work in Brussels has been a total failure. The British taxpayer pays the price, and it is up to him to realise whose fault that is.

9.42 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): As the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) said, this has been a wide-ranging debate covering a large number of documents and a great many more Community topics. I do not have the time to enter into some of the wider considerations discussed by my hon. Friend the Minister of State. I shall have to leave it to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) to debate with my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) whether changes in the treaty are needed. I believe that a great deal could be done within the existing treaty, and that is where the priority lies.

I note the comments of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) about fisheries. I shall report what he said to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

The right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) asked about the subdivision within the United Kingdom which results in Northern Ireland having a problem with the super levy. I understand that that has happened, because national quotas are divided into separate sections according to what is technically the organisation of dairies

[Mr. Ian Stewart]

—in this case, the milk marketing boards—and, because there is a separate milk marketing board for Northern Ireland, that board is a separate entity.

General points have been mentioned in the debate. The hon. Members for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) have displayed a fundamental misunderstanding. They spoke as if the budgetary problems in 1984 and 1985 were somehow a condemnation of budget discipline. The point is that the difficulties of constraining expenditure this year and next have occurred because we did not have effective budget discipline. Had we had budget discipline, I have no doubt that many of the difficulties that we face would have been avoided.

The hon. Member for Newham, South asked whether supplementary financing would be reimbursable and what the provisions were in the 1985 budget. The 1985 budget was drafted and brought forward before the agreement on the supplementary finance was reached, and the proposals are that the advances should be reimbursable, starting in 1986. They do not appear in the documents before us today.

On the question of the overrun this year, the hon. Member for Thurrock sought to chide me for being reluctant to concede in July of this year that we should make a substantial payment for supplementary finance. I wonder what type of negotiations she thinks Ministers conduct if they do not try all along the line to ensure that they obtain the best deal. In this case, the amount of overspending was reduced to the irreducible minimum and the amount of supplementary finance required was also as low as possible. I should have thought that that was self-evidently in our national interest. Getting the figure down from well over 2 billion ecu in the original proposals to 1·35 billion ecu in the July Budget Council without conceding that we would agree to any supplementary finance was an achievement which the hon. Lady should be glad British Ministers could deliver.

Dr. McDonald rose——

Mr. Stewart: When we managed to agree a figure on 1,003 million ecu in September, that was less than half the original amount proposed. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would welcome the efforts that had been made on behalf of the United Kingdom.

Dr. McDonald: The Minister has misunderstood much of what has been said. On 10 July the Foreign Secretary said that "we shall be pressing in the Budget Council next week for savings that will bring into balance the 1984 budget". — [Official Report, 10 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 897.]

That is fine as an intention. No one quarrels with that, but we are saying that the Government did not succeed.

Mr. Stewart: The Government succeeded in reducing the figures substantially. We forced the Commission to make savings in its market management, and we forced the Commission and Council to agree to offsetting amounts against agricultural expenditure so that we were left with a much smaller figure to finance. The fact that there was a residual figure shows that budget discipline has not applied until now. I and most hon. Members must wish that budget discipline had been in place at least two or three years ago. It would have prevented many of the problems that we have had to face in the past two years. They are still with us, because the Fontainebleau agreement was not put in place until the middle of this year, and the post-Fontainebleau package — of which budget discipline is a part — is only now being put in place.

The right hon. Member for Strangford said that it would be undesirable if the European Parliament were to reject the 1985 budget, because that would be flat against the interests of all member states, and the agricultural sector in particular. I entirely agree with what he said in a thoughtful and impressive contribution. I hope that before members of the European Parliament seek to reject the 1985 draft budget they will realise that the consequences for the people whom they represent and who elected them to serve there would be entirely adverse and would not assist the reputation of the European Parliament or its claim for a greater part in the affairs of the Community.

Mr. Marlow: In his brilliant introductory speech my hon. Friend the Minister of State unfortunately did not have time to touch on the proposal to increase the Community's own resources. I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will deal with that. The increase in own resources means that the Community will be spending more taxpayers' money. Will my hon. Friend tell us where that will substitute for current United Kingdom policy so that we know what the Community will be taking over from us? If there are to be new Community policies, will he tell us what they are? If not, which of the current policies are to cost more in the future? The sum must add up somewhere, and I know that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary is very good at arithmetic.

Mr. Stewart: If I had not given way to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), I should have had more time to deal with the points that he has raised and which have been covered many times in the debate. I shall be coming to the question of own resources.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Am I correct in supposing that this debate can go on until 11.30 pm?

Mr. Speaker: That is certainly true.

Mr. Stewart: I think that I should also take the wishes of the House into account in measuring the length of my speech.

The hon. Member for Livingston asked how the United Kingdom would get its 1,000 million ecu refund next year. We intend that the own resources decision should be brought into play before the end of 1985 and that we should receive the 1,000 million ecu by way of abatement. We have also arranged, and the Council has agreed, a general undertaking attached to the 1985 budget guaranteeing that the United Kingdom refund will be paid without specifying the means whereby that is to happen. The actual decisions are for the future, but the Council has recognised the unreserved right of the United Kingdom to the 1,000 million ecu compensation in respect of 1984, to be paid next year in that way.

The European Parliament wished to place our compensation on the expenditure side, but we were able to resist that. It also wanted to go above the 1 per cent. ceiling for the 1985 budget, and we were able to resist that, too. Nevertheless, we must face the fact that this year and next year there are temporary pressures on the budget because of the lack of a budgetary discipline system in the past.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Economic Secretary has just made a very important statement and I should like to press him a little further on it. The Fontainebleau agreement provided that the refund in 1985 in respect of 1984 would be payable by means of an abatement. If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, he does not envisage the refund coming into operation until the decision on the increase in own resources is taken. He will be aware that the date of that increase is a matter of contention in the Community and that the Germans are still holding out for 1 January 1986 so as to coincide with enlargement. Is the Economic Secretary saying that the agreement on our refund does not come into play if the date for the increase in own resources is not in 1985? More important, is he saying that the Treasury will not deduct the abatement from our payment to the EEC until the decision on own resources is reached? As I understand the Fontainebleau agreement, there is no reason why the abatement should not start running from January 1985.

Mr. Stewart: As I have said, it is our assumption and intention that the own resources decision should be implemented within the calendar year 1985 and that our abatement would come into play at that time. As it is possible that the own resources decision will not be implemented in 1985, however, the Council has agreed that the United Kingdom will be due to receive its compensation next year in any event.

I must move on to the question of budgetary discipline. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), who tabled the amendment, spoke of the budgetary discipline text as a worthless piece of paper. I take the strongest possible issue with my hon. Friend over that view. We undertook to arrange that measures necessary to guarantee the effective application of budgetary discipline would be put in place. The component parts of those measures are an overall reference framework covering all expenditure, separate provisions for an agricultural guideline and a maximum rate of expenditure covering non-obligatory expenditure.

My hon. Friend raised the question whether there was any limit on the reference framework which the Council could fix. The Council, being bound by the conclusions, will not fix a reference framework higher than that of the agricultural guideline and the maximum rate. It is limited in that way.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I suggested that article 1 imposes no limit and that the Ministers can sit down and, by a majority vote, fix any ceiling that they wish. My hon. Friend now says that there is a restriction at the 1·4 per cent. figure. If the 1·4 per cent. limit is there anyway, what does article 1 provide which would not have been provided if that article did not exist?

Mr. Stewart: Article 1 refers to the reference framework itself and also to the agricultural guideline, but the reference framework is the total amount within which the budget must be set. The component parts of the budget are the agricultural expenditure and the non-obligatory expenditure within the maximum rate. As the budgetary discipline text provides for both those elements, that constitutes the reference framework.

Mr. Forth: Does not article 6 provide for the reference framework itself to be changed, and does that not render it meaningless?

Mr. Stewart: Article 6 provides that the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers may alter the reference framework, but that would be a matter of changing one of the elements within it. As the Council has bound itself in relation to the maximum rate, it would be able to alter the agriculture guidelines under the circumstances described in some of the clauses of the budgetary discipline text.

It has been said that because there is flexibility in the text it is useless, meaningless or full of holes. That is not the case.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Why?

Mr. Stewart: I shall explain why, if I am given a chance to do so.

The purpose of the budgetary discipline is to move away from a system where price and the price-fixing of agriculture settlements in the early part of the year determined the cost of the programme to a system in which an acceptable cost works back to the establishment of the prices. No one can say, with something as erratic as agricultural expenditure, that one can always predict in March the exact outcome later in the year. That is why neither this country nor other member states could have accepted an absolutely rigid system. That would not have been realistic.

Comments have been made about the legal nature of the budgetary discipline text. The consequences are binding on the Council. That is the important factor. They are incorporated in the budgetary procedures of the Community.

On the question of own resources, it has been suggested that we would have a 40 per cent. increase in expenditure. There will be no step change, because the base is fixed on 1984-85, and therefore increases will be related to that. The increase will be much lower—probably less than 20 per cent.—because Britain will pay less than 1 per cent. in own resources for the next few years even if the VAT ceiling is increased to 1·4 per cent.

We now have a satisfactory arrangement on budgetary discipline and I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos 8322/84, Preliminary draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 for 1984; 8879/84, Letter of amendment to preliminary draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 for 1984; the unnumbered document, Draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 for 1984; Document No. 10222/84, European Parliament's proposed amendments and modifications to the draft supplementary and amending budget No. 1 of the European Communities for 1984; the unnumbered document, Draft general budget of the European Communities for the financial year 1985; Documents Nos 9482/84, Letter of amendment to preliminary draft budget of the European Communities for 1985; 10690/84, European Parliament's amendments and modifications to the Draft budget of the European Communities for 1985; 8454/84, Amended proposal for a Council decision on the Communities' system of Own Resources; 8445/84, Commission proposal for a Council regulation introducing reserve measures to cover requirements in 1985; 8514/84, Commission's communication on the budgetary requirements of the Community in 1984 and 1985; 5899/84,

[Mr. Teddy Taylor]

Amended proposal for a Council regulation amending the Financial Regulation of 21st December 1977 applicable to the general budget of the European Communities; and the unnumbered document, Budgetary discipline; common position of the Council of Ministers; and welcomes the agreement on budgetary discipline providing for the firm control of agricultural and other expenditure.

Overseas Aid

10 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): I beg to move,

That the draft International Development Association (Seventh Replenishment) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 7th November, be approved.

I understand that, with the leave of the House, we can take with this the second motion—

That the draft International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (1984 Selective Capital Increase) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 7th November, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the Minister have the leave of the House?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Raison: The purpose of these orders is to authorise an increase in our subscription to the capital stock of the World Bank for the take-up of a further 529 shares, and a contribution to the seventh replenishment of the International Development Association.

The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which is known more popularly as the World Bank, owes its existence to the imagination of those concerned with the immediate financial needs of Europe after the second world war. The creation of the World Bank, along with the International Monetary Fund, was an act of faith. Her Majesty's Government's participation was agreed by this House almost 40 years ago, in December 1945. Since then, the bank has, of course, changed its emphasis to tackle the problem of the world's developing countries.

The IBRD's basic aim, enshrined in its articles of association, is to promote economic progress in developing countries, other than the very poorest, by providing financial and technical assistance, mostly for specific projects, in the public and private sectors. Loans have been granted to Governments for projects in a variety of sectors — agriculture and rural development, education, energy, industry, population, health and nutrition, water supply and sewerage, transportation and telecommunications. There has also been some non-project lending, including structural adjustment loans. This recent form of lending is to provide financial assistance — foreign exchange — to a country which undertakes to make changes in its economic management. The bank's total lending in the year to June 1984 was $11·9 billion. The bank's goal is to bring its borrowers to a point at which they are fully able to turn to the world's financial markets to meet their needs. The bank has helped many countries graduate out of its lending programme. The most notable case is, perhaps, Korea.

The Bank has unparalleled first-hand knowledge of a wide range of developing countries' problems and an operating experience which is second to none. Moreover —we attach more importance to this—it has a first-class system of evaluating its lending operations.

The Government have consistently given the strongest possible support to the World Bank president and his staff. I welcome the opportunity provided by today's debate to reaffirm that support, and to pay tribute to Mr. Clausen and his team for their sheer professionalism and dedication to the formidable tasks in hand.

More directly, we support the bank's central aim of the alleviation of poverty and its concentration of resources in key areas, especially in agriculture, rural development and energy. We welcome particularly the Bank's very useful country macro-economic and sector analysis work, as well as its willingness to do more in donor co-ordination.

I shall now deal more specifically with the draft International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (1984 Selective Capital Increase) Order 1984. The purpose of this order is to enable the Government to make a further subscription to the capital stock of the bank of a sum equivalent to $63,815,915, of which only 8·75 per cent. — or $5·5 million — would be paid-in. The balance would be callable. A copy of the IBRD resolution No. 395 has been placed in the Library for the information of hon. Members, and the sum I have mentioned is the price of 529 shares as set by the terms of that resolution. The selective capital increase will add a further $8·4 billion to the IBRD's capital base. That will help the bank to maintain its lending programme at the current high level. The main purpose of the selective capital increase was not to provide additional capital, however, but to effect changes in shareholdings in the bank following the IMF eights quota review. The need for a long-term increase in the bank's capital base will have to be met by a general capital increase in about 1986.

As a result of the selective capital increase, and in the context of the negotiations on the seventh replenishment of the International Development Association, the ranking positions of the major shareholders in the IBRD have been re-aligned: the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany remaining respectively in first and third positions, Japan moving from fifth to second position, and the United Kingdom—formerly second—and France—formerly fourth—sharing joint fourth place. The United Kingdom has thus been given a lower allocation of shares, 529, under the Bank 1984 selective capital increase than would otherwise have been allocated to us. However, this does not mean that our support for the bank is in any way diminished. The World Bank shareholding is generally fixed in relation to members' economic and financial strength.

I turn to the International Development Association. As the House will know, the association is the soft loan affiliate of the World Bank. It was created to provide loans on highly concessional terms to developing countries which would have great difficulty in servicing borrowing from the World Bank itself. As the association is administered by the same staff as the World Bank, all that I have already said about that staff applies with equal force to the association's operations. With its concentration of resources on the world's poorest countries — some 60 per cent. to Commonwealth countries—the association's programme is almost a mirror image of the allocation of our own bilateral aid programme. Many in the House will be aware that negotiations on the IDA's seventh replenishment were tough, protracted and, in the end, disappointing. A total of only $9 billion was agreed, some 25 per cent. less than the nominal level of $12 billion approved for IDA 6.

Although at the final meeting of the IDA 7 Deputies in Washington last January donor representatives felt that the IDA was one of the most effective multilateral channels for transferring resources to the poorest countries, the United States' representative reiterated his country's earlier determination to contribute to the replentishment no more than $750 million in each of three years. The other countries represented were not prepared to meet the shortfall in the contribution of the major donor, and the size of the replenishment was predicated by the United States 25 per cent. share. The IDA management was given a mandate to try to raise additional resources to help close the gap between the $9 billion agreed and the level of $12 billion which most donors regarded as the minimum required by the association for its fiscal years 1985-87. As hon. Members will know, I was able to announce to the House on 27 January that Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to make a contribution to supplementary funding on the basis of the usual equitable burden-sharing among donors. Many other donors have expressed a willingness to contribute on a similar basis, but the IDA management has not pursued this question of supplementing IDA's general fund because of the declared non-participation of the United States and, in their absence, of Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany.

The draft International Development Association (Seventh Replenishment) Order 1984 will if approved by the House, give the Secretary of State authority to make a United Kingdom contribution of £401,520,000. Payment to the association would be effected by the deposit of three promissory notes, of equal amounts, over three years from 1985, to be encashed over a period of years, with the costs being met as they occur from sums voted for overseas aid.

I do not propose to go into the detailed arrangement of the workings of the replenishment. They are set out in the report of the Bank's executive directors, together with the IDA resolution, dated 24 May 1984. Both have been published as a White Paper—Cmnd 9402.

I should, however, draw the attention of the House to changes in the shares of contributions of several donor countries. Five countries—the United States, the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, Kuwait and Sweden — have reduced their percentage shares; while 10 other countries have increased theirs — the most significant being Japan, France, Canada, Italy, Norway and Finland. In our own case, our percentage share has come down from a very high 10·1 per cent. contribution under the previous replenishment to 6·7 per cent. I make no apologies for that. Our reduced share is not a reflection of any weakening of the Government's resolve to support the association. We have determined the level of our contribution in relation to the United Kingdom's relative economic strength among donors.

I am glad to say, however, that we were able to negotiate a package with our Japanese friends whereby their share of IDA 7 funding was substantially increased as par of the arrangement for the realignment of shareholding positions in the World Bank, to which I referred earlier.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Will the Minister explain more clearly what he means by his statement that we have determined the level of our contribution in relation to the United Kingdom's relative strength among donors? What sort of calculation did that involve?

Mr. Raison: It is based on the gross national products of the different donor countries. The 10·1 per cent. share that we had in the previous replenishment was far above our proportionate share of the world's economy. We have reduced it to a more realistic level.

During negotiations, we made sure that the combined share of the United Kingdom, France, West Germany and

[Mr. Raison]

Japan was no less than it was under the previous replenishment. In fact, it turned out to be slightly higher than last time.

The IBRD and the IDA are the world's leading development institutions. They constitute the cutting edge for change and for improvement in the social and economic conditions in developing countries. Successive British Governments have supported them, and our commitment now is as firm as ever. I commend both orders to the House.

10.12 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): We deplore the failure of the United States Administration to contribute to the supplementing of the international development association funds. We regard that as critical for the role of IDA. I shall develop that argument and its relevance to Government policy shortly.

We also deplore the fact that the Government's IDA contribution will fall from 10·1 per cent. to 6·7 per cent. We do not accept the Minister's argument that that reflects Britain's economic strength among donors, because we do not accept that the Government are fulfilling their potential in the international arena, nor that they are participating with other countries in the sorts of project for joint international recovery which the World Bank report for 1984 stresses as critical to the future prospects of less developed countries. The report states that the world's economy is now:

"balanced on a knife edge."

Students of economics will be familiar with what is known as knife-edge theory. It is that an economy, such as the international economy, can either hit the ceiling or the floor. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) is amused. I trust that during the debate he will argue for a recovery of the world economy rather than a continued collapse of trade among less developed countries, which has devastating effects on sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Srortford): I shall not argue on the merits or demerits of knife-edge economic theory. I shall argue about the effect of the amount of money and help that we give to ordinary people in extremely poor countries.

Mr. Holland: I would be impressed by the hon. Gentleman's intervention if we were to have a significant increase in the amount of money given, but the Minister has just said that we cannot have such an increase because of the position of the United Kingdom economy. Although he claims that this is an outdated economic theory—by which I presume he means a Keynesian economic theory —it is very much to the credit of the World Bank that it has not fallen for the manic monetarism of some other institutions and is arguing the case for global recovery. The bank stresses that, without that recovery, the prospects for some areas of the world economy, especially sub-Saharan Africa, are extremely dire.

As the bank stresses, after three years of almost uniterrupted decline in growth in trade, the improvement in the world economy during the past year was due almost entirely to the United States recovery. That recovery is no longer in question, but it will be deflated by the American Administration's cuts in expenditure, including social expenditure. If, as expected, that reduces American exports to the level where they were about two and a half or three years ago, that will take about $100 billion worth of demand out of the world economy. Although Third world countries are not in as strong a position as they should be, in terms of the United States importing from them, that in itself will damage Third world prospects.

It is a double blow for Third world countries that the United States Administration can neither contribute to the replenishment of IDA funds, nor can it sustain its recovery, which we were told was secure, in such a way that world trade and payments can increase. The figure of $100 billion in total demand from the North is the equivalent of 4 per cent. to 5 per cent. of Third world export trade. The collapse of that trade will be damaging and will certainly dwarf the replenishment levels in IDA funds at present.

As the bank stresses, strains persist in the international structure of trade and payments, and faced with the need to reduce imports, the developing countries have been forced to reduce the level and alter the composition of their investments. Capital formation has been shifted towards the energy sector and economic infrastructure at the expense of the social sector.

The position of sub-Saharan Africa will be dire. The list of human miseries in the African continent has been well highlighted by UNICEF in its report on the impact of recession on children, which showed how children have been the victims of economic decline. Much attention has been focused, and will be—with good reason—in this debate, on the drought in Ethiopia and the relevance of the World Bank's proposals to the African Continent. However, in a country such as Zambia, the height-for-age ratios have fallen in all age categories of children under 15. Child mortality in sub-Saharan Africa was 50 per cent. higher than the average in developing countries in the 1950s; it is now almost double that average. The bank claims that there must be improvements in countries' internal economic management. We do not claim that internal economic management cannot be improved. The bank also claims that additional external assistance will not by itself solve Africa's problems.

Net capital flows to sub-Saharan Africa are expected to fall from $11 billion to $5 billion. We are talking about a difference of $6 billion, which is double what the replenishment of the IDA from $9 billion to $12 billion would have been. It shows how devastating will be the effect of not achieving the aimed-for increase in the IDA replenishment. Some of the figures illustrate how serious the position is. Against gross capital flows in 1980-82 of about $13·1 billion, the projections for 1985-87 for sub-Saharan Africa are a total of $13 billion. But amortisation, or the paying off of debt, will increase from $2·3 billion to $8 billion, so that the net capital flow into the area will be halved—instead of being $10·8 billion it will be $5 billion.

The World Bank, under pressure from the Reagan Administration, has felt obliged to endorse the role of market forces, but, because of the increased amortisation payments, net private capital flows, which, for 1980-82 were $2·5 billion, will now be minus $1 million. In other words, not only is the United States Administration failing to increase IDA, but the private sector lauded by that Administration is taking resources out of the region.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does my hon. Friend accept that, in the past decade or more, extremely high interest rates, for the most part led by the United States, have meant that when it comes to a crisis, rather than poor little kids in Ethiopia and elsewhere in the Third world being saved, the entrepreneurs in the casino economy—the bankers—are being bailed out? This results in the poor countries having to pay more and more to save their necks, when all that the Western economy is doing is bailing out bankers who should have had their fingers burnt. In other words, the bankers are all right when they are making a profit, but, when they look as if they will die, the so-called market forces do not operate and the bankers are saved by those who should be looking after the starving millions.

Mr. Holland: My hon. Friend has made a typically forceful and relevant point. It is apparent from the World Bank's recent statement that it is especially concerned about the impact of IMF policies on the countries that it helps through the development programme. In other words, the World Bank is concerned with long-term development prospects, issues and projects, but the IMF is concerned with short-term balance of payment adjustments. This has meant—I am glad to see that the World Bank has endorsed this in the case of Latin America—that the IMF has imposed a further deflation of some $30 billion in trade by imposing cuts packages on some of the leading Latin American countries. Therefore, while the World Bank is trying seriously to make a contribution to world development prospects, the IMF is making contributions to the global slump. My hon. Friend's point about the role of the banks is important. The banks have lost confidence in several less developed countries, and in so doing over the past few years have started for the first time in decades to draw resources out of the Third world.

If imagination and political willingness were shown by leading Governments, and this Government must still be considered one of the leaders among the official development donors, we would see a public institutional response to offset that decline in the private capital flow and in private capital lending to the Third world. That would mean a World Bank and IDA replenishment that was several times what we are being offered by the Minister tonight.

The bank is cautious about market forces in its annual report. I am glad that it does not simply want to let the market rip, and it is not waging a war against the mixed economy as the IMF is. It stresses the importance of other programmes such as health and education, as well as improved financial control. It stresses smallholders and co-operative agriculture as well as the promotion of private investment. That is right, as private investment will not come unless it is co-ordinated and promoted through public institutions and by public policy. But the bank is not being allowed to play the kind of role it should be able to play in the promotion of investment and world trade. Also, inasmuch as the bank is affected by the kind of monetarist market reasoning coming out of the United States, market forces alone, whether through smallholders or co-operatives, will not be sufficient to ensure the long-term development aids with which the bank is concerned.

It is relevant to compare the analysis of trade by the bank and that by UNCTAD. The UNCTAD statistical handbook lists the commodities on which the Third world depends. It refers to wheat, sugar, coffee, corn, rice, agricultural raw materials such as cotton, natural rubber and tobacco, and minerals and other materials. Between 65 per cent. and 95 per cent. of trade in those commodities is controlled by multinational companies. The donor countries in the development assistance programme, the funding countries in the World Bank programme and the funding countries on the IDA programme must face the fact that only a fraction of the value added from those exports goes to the less-developed countries. Typically, less than 20 per cent. goes to those countries and frequently less than 10 per cent.

If the bank is to fulfil its aim of long-term development, it needs to take a leaf from UNCTAD's book and confront the question of why so little of the value added in key commodities goes to the less developed countries. Countries such as Britain with a high share of multinational company activity in Third world countries should seek to ensure that a higher share of that value added goes to the Third world. If they do not those countries will not be able to offset their grave domestic economic problems in the current economic climate.

The World Bank report stresses the role of the aid donor. It deals with the longer-term agricultural development programme and the relationship between the bank, the British Government and other World Bank board members. The bank is not concerned with short-term issues. The bank is not the most appropriate agency to deal with the drought problem.

In the debate on 22 November I welcomed the possibility of the funds which the Government are not now to make to the IDA replenishment programme, because of the non-co-operation of the United States, being rescheduled to the World Bank's programme for Africa. However, there was nothing in the Minister's statement to confirm that. What is to happen to the £200 million which would have gone to IDA? Will it be allocated to the World Bank programme? What will happen in Bangladesh, for example? The Minister did not reply to my earlier question about that.

It appears that the 6,500 tonnes of food aid for Ethiopia was to have gone to Bangladesh. That is giving with one hand and taking with the other. The problem in Bangladesh is severe. The floods between May and September affected 20 million people and caused $800 million worth of damage. There is a 2·8 million tonnes shortfall in foodstuffs compared with a normal shortfall of 1·5 million tonnes. What is the Government planning to do about that? If they are not planning to reschedule the funds what will they do for Bangladesh and the food need there?

Any sure foundation for the World Bank's longer-term development programme in Ethiopia and Africa must be based upon an adequate response to the drought problems.

The Prime Minister has said that not only are the Government doing their bit, but that they are doing more than other countries. That claim is contradicted by the facts. The United Kingdom's contribution to Ethiopia before October this year was £1·2 million and £2·5 million worth of cereals. Since 1 October, the contribution has been £6·2 million plus two Hercules aircraft. Italy has given £16 million as well as two Hercules. West Germany has committed more than £7·5 million, excluding the EEC contribution. Australia has contributed £7·5 million, Canada £16·5 million and Bulgaria £10·5 million.

Italy's contribution is critical, not only in quantity but in quality. It sent 150 trucks plus spares to Ethiopia. The trucks could double the aid distribution capacity of the Eritrean Relief Association and make a direct contribution because of which the World Bank's longer-term programme would be based upon the survival of agriculture in the critical drought areas in Ethiopia.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): The tenor of the hon. Gentleman's argument is probably that the problems in Bangladesh and Ethiopia are not for solution by individual countries but—especially in the latter case—can be solved only by the international community. Does he accept that when I was in Bangladesh some years ago there was no prospect that it would ever be able to feed itself in the foreseeable future? Surely these are matters for the international community as a whole and cannot be laid at the door of any one nation.

Mr. Holland: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised that point. Bangladesh illustrates the problem to which he referred. When I was in Japan not long ago I spoke with members of its development institute, which had sent a team to Bangladesh for two years to study areas of potential comparative advantage that that country might have in the world economy. After two years, they decided that there were precisely none. In textbook theory that should not be possible—in the real world, it is possible. One reason is not only the technological change, which means that jute is not the export commodity that it once was, but that we now have a multinational division of capital and labour world wide. Thus reliance on low-cost wages alone with intermediate technology is not sufficient to guarantee Bangladesh an international future.

I would have agreed with the hon. Gentleman had he said that it was not for national governments alone to seek to solve the problems of a country such as Bangladesh. That must be supplemented by multilateral and international action. But it appears that the food aid allocated to Ethiopia has been diverted from Bangladesh—and it was a small contribution in the first place, some 6·5 million tonnes. Yet there is an 800-million tonne gap in the needs of Bangladesh.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the real problems for Ethiopia is that of the Eritrean people, and that assistance from the Government should be given through the Eritrean Relief Association to ensure that it goes to those in greatest need? I have tabled a question on that matter.

Mr. Holland: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is one reason why Ethiopia and Eritrea cannot wait for the World Bank's long-term development programme for sub-Saharan Africa. It is a point that the Minister seems unwilling to admit. The fact is that 85 per cent. of the drought areas in Eritrea and Tigré are outside the Government's control because they are in the hands of the Liberation Front, and 50 per cent. of Wollo is similarly outside the Government's control.

The Minister has chosen to react to the points that we have made several times by claiming that he has no desire to hype-up the political confrontation with the Ethiopian Government, and I appreciate that. However, he assumes that that would happen by dealing with the Liberation Front. If so—as we have said before, and now stress again—there is every reason to allocate a far higher share of food aid to the relief associations such as those in Tigré and Eritrea. I know that the Minister is doing that, but it is on a small scale. The caring British public, which responded so overwhelmingly to the drought crisis in Ethiopia, is beginning to understand that a far higher share of food aid is going to the Addis Ababa Government that to the liberated areas—30 times more.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Would not my hon. Friend accept that a large proportion of the food aid which is going in through the good offices of the Addis Ababa Government and the relief agencies is finding its way into parts of Tigré and Wollo which are not necessarily under the control of the Government and that the practical logistics of moving grain mean that the grain must go that way?

Mr. Holland: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point and I respect it, not least because he has been to the areas concerned and seen what the problems are. But the fact at the moment is that no long-term development programme such as the World Bank is proposing for sub-Saharan Africa will start at rather than behind the post unless the current drought can be tackled. If millions of people leave their farms because of the current drought and have to go to the main towns of the area for food aid distribution, there will be no chance of a harvest next year. It is totally different case from Bangladesh where floods this year left deposits and sediments which may mean a good harvest next year. That is not the position in sub-Saharan Africa.

I put this point to the Minister because it is directly relevant not only to laying the foundations for a longer-term World Bank programme but also to the concern shown by the British public. If he cannot call for a cease-fire and cannot persuade the Council of Ministers of the EEC to call for a cease-fire in Ethopia, is he so timid that he cannot at least call for no attacks upon properly marked food convoys and for an assurance that airstrips for flying in food aid which the liberation fronts have offered to construct should not be bombed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. We are discussing the operations of the World Bank and the association and the levels of contributions thereto. We must not stray too far into the unilateral contributions of the British Government.

Mr. Holland: I am grateful for your guidance on that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but we are talking not simply about the bilateral contribution of the British Government but about the role played by the EEC and the relationship between short term food assistance or drought aid and longer term development assistance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With great respect, we are talking about two orders which relate to the operation of the World Bank and the International Development Association and the level of contributions which are set out in the order.

Mr. Holland: I appreciate that point, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but my argument, simply, is that the kinds of costs which are likely to be incurred by failure now to distribute food aid effectively in sub-Saharan Africa will pre-empt the kind of resources which the World Bank wants to put towards development. It will simply be remedying a drought crisis after hundreds of thousands or millions of people have died rather than being able to build on a sure foundation. We are not an insignificant power.

Although our share of the World Bank has diminished, we are still represented on the board of the Bank and this Minister is directly responsible for Government policy on the Bank.

I would stress a further point on the relationship between the current economic crisis and the Bank's lending policy and the role of IDA. The bank is seriously addressing itself to the longer-term development issue. It is not receiving adequate support from the leading countries and from its board members on this point. It is not simply a matter of United States policy. It is, firstly whether alternative ways can be found for like-minded members of the bank's board to undertake activities which fulfil the spirit of the bank's objective without necessarily undertaking them through bank agencies.

Secondly, on such individual projects as the bank's programme for sub-Saharan Africa, where the analysis has been published in detail and where the prospectuses have been published in detail, what will the Government's response be? Thirdly, what role will the Government play in relation to the longer-term issue of global economic recovery which the Bank stresses is so crucial for its own activities? It is very notable that, because of its concern about the recession in the United States economy, the bank in its report makes the case for a European economic recovery which would have a very significant impact on the export performance of less developed countries.

This week's issue of The Economist asks why, with a recession now under way in the United States as a result of Government policy, Europe cannot take up the recovery and face its responsibility for a recovery programme. I was glad to see this and it is rare for me to say that of something in The Economist. If Europe does not do so, not only shall we have had a cut in the IDA contribution which could cripple the IDA's activities, but we shall have a deepening of the global slump.

It is possible for the Government to take action. The longer term development prospects depend upon a real recovery in world trade. For example, a real recovery of $100 billion a year spent would not only sustain Third world exports by 4 to 5 per cent. a year but would, over a 10-year period, add more than a half to the Third world's GNP. That would make it possible not only to offset the debt crisis in some respects through repayment. And the World bank stresses the imminent risks to the Third world countries from that debt crisis. It would thereby enable less developed countries to put the brunt of the debt crisis behind them within not 10 but five years.

The Government are making no contribution to such a recovery. They are reacting to the depression of world spending and trade. They claim that they are justified in reducing contributions to the bank because of the reduced circumstances of the United Kingdom's economy. I call upon the Minister to say what he is doing in the international arena to encourage not only the bank's policies but, for example, Commonwealth countries and their New Delhi summit proposals and those of the recent meeting of the Commonwealth countries for economic recovery. If we do not do so, not only the World Bank and its programmes will suffer but the Third world too.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister rather than criticise him, as the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) did, on the way in which he led the group in the World bank to try to effect a special fund for the support of the IDA to replenish the figure of £9·5 billion. That is what the total IDA replenishment has been reduced to by the American's failure to contribute to it. My hon. Friend maintained the amount of money allocated in the ODA budget in order to continue to make that contribution.

Those countries which failed to support my right hon. Friend were Germany and Japan. We in the House should say straightforwardly that we resent that. The Third world should resent the fact that Japan in particular, with its responsibility for aid and trade relationships with the Third world in which it is very much the winner, has failed in its responsibilities to the Third world far more than has the Government, who were led by my right hon. Friend to replenish that shortfall in the IDA replenishment led by the United States.

Let me deal with the United States and the reasons why it did not support the replenishment of the IDA at its current level—£12 billion. Clearly, in view of rising overseas costs and inflation, that would have been below what had been agreed to previously. When one bears in mind that in the meantime China, an extremely large country with many poor people, has come into the IDA, the failure not only to renew at the same level of £12 billion, but to reduce it by 25 per cent. to £9·5 billion, is something that the developed world should be ashamed of.

I much admire my right hon. Friend's work and determination in trying to bring that about. The reason why the Americans failed to do that was that they resent the fact that 40 per cent. of the IDA fund goes to India. It was felt that with the addition of China, an even greater percentage would have gone to India and to China. That is because the allocation of funds under the IDA is to those countries which have a low per capita income. India and China can therefore command a large percentage of the IDA budget.

India is a powerful economy. It is a nuclear power with a major defence capacity. It has also a major industrial capacity. The Americans are right to criticise the IDA's distribution of money to India. In fact, India could devote a large amount of its funds—it has large reserves—to the support of the poorest in its own country. I believe firmly that development begins at home, and help must start at home. Developing countries must put their own houses in order and direct their money to the poorest in the communities before they can expect the international community to respond. I have some sympathy with the American view of the IDA and I understand why they chose not to replenish its funds. On the other hand, I criticise it because IDA grant funds are needed desperately, especially in Africa, as the hon. Member for Vauxhall has said and as my right hon. Friend would undoubtedly agree. Aid is necessary in Africa to prevent widespread starvation of the sort which we have seen on our television screens and which has accorded a major response from the British people.

Mr. Parry: Is it not deplorable that our assistance to the African continent is so small compared with that which is made available by some of our European partners? We are making available only half of the target which has been set by the United Nations.

Mr. Wells: I believe that the hon. Gentleman is talking about the United Nations target of 0·75 per cent. of GDP, which we have agreed to and at which we should be aiming. That is the target for total aid contributions. But we should not talk in meaningless monetary economic terms. We should be directing ourselves to sending aid to where it is most needed. I am not interested in global figures. My interest lies in directing aid to the poorest, to the starving people of Africa and elsewhere. The issue is directing money, people, materials, compassion, management and administration to those places and not 0·75 per cent. targets. The hon. Gentleman may agree that that aid should be directed to Africa and the poorest parts of the world.

My right hon. Friend has been trying to promote that policy. He has been supporting the World Bank's fund for Africa, which is designed to absorb the moneys which were available in the ODA budget and to support the IDA. Having failed to secure replenishment for the IDA, we are supporting a special fund for Africa.

What is my right hon. Friend forced to say to the World Bank and other organisations which come to him for money? What I am about to say may lead to cross-party agreement. He is forced to say that he does not have the money now. I should like him to tell me that that is not true, but I understand that the Government are saying that they cannot now lend money to Africa for a special Africa fund. There will be opposition from West Germany and Japan to the formation of a World Bank special fund for Africa, and Britain may be included in that category because the Government say that they do not have the money.

Why do we not have the money? Let us return to the debate on aid and take up the leader that appeared in The Times on the Saturday after the debate. It seems that many in the House did not understand what was happening; neither did the leader writer of The Times. The aid budget has not been compensated at all for overseas risen costs and adverse changes in the exchange rate, whereas the diplomatic budget has been compensated in part for those risen costs.

The Times leader said that the Foreign Secretary had given way to the aid lobby and had not cut the aid budget in favour of cutting the diplomatic budget. The reverse is true, and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development has had to deal with the consequences. We have learned from a strange admission to the Public Account Committee that my right hon. Friend's budget for dealing with the Ethiopian crisis by emergency relief and food aid was £50 million. Anyone budgeting in the ODA hopes that he will not have to use all that money and that he will be able to use money in other directions through the unallocated funds within the ODA's budget. That aid money has been used up almost entirely in providing drought relief in Africa. My right hon. Friend the Minister gave generously to Ethiopia to try to relieve the drought and political problems. The hon. Member for Vauxhall paid tribute to my right hon. Friend in trying to deal with those problems—perhaps not enough was done; there can never be enough done in such cases—that lie beneath the Administration of the Addis Ababa Government, whom I deplore.

I can see that you are becoming agitated, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I am not dealing with IDA, but these budgets are related.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is a general debate on overseas aid. The debate is concerned with the two funds and our contribution to them. Any hon. Member taking part in the debate must address himself to the orders before the House.

Mr. Wells: I fully accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am trying to say that these two budgets are intimately related; that is why my right hon. Friend the Minister has not been able to make the contribution to IDA which he would otherwise ask the House to approve. We have reduced, as we should do in the light of our economic circumstances, the amount we give to the IDA. The figure has been reduced by 25 per cent. because of the failure of the American and British Governments to contribute at the level at which they would have contributed if the aid contribution had been renewed at the previous level. I contend that it should have been renewed at a higher level. You have given me the opportunity, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to make a point on the IDA.

The House has decided to take together the issues of the IDA and the IBRD, and I shall try to be quick in dealing with the World Bank. I am concerned about the way in which the British Government control the votes of the World Bank. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Vauxhall said, the way in which the alternative director on the IBRD executive board and the IDA executive board votes is controlled not by the Overseas Development Adminstration and my right hon. Friend for Overseas Development but by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. How is the alternate director told how to vote?

Mr. Stuart Holland: When my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) and others were in government, that was the responsibility of the Ministry of Overseas Development. It is simply a reflection of the downgrading of that Ministry that that is no longer the case.

Mr. Wells: I am asking for information. Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will be able to correct us and put us on line. As I understand it, that aspect is not under the control of the Overseas Development Administration.

The IBRD needs not only more money—in case you think that I am getting out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I point out that is a reason why I welcome the order—but greater conditionality. Conditionality is required to ensure that the money that goes through the World Bank is directed towards the development of those countries which need it.

Why has the alternate director of the World Bank executive board voted against Guyana and denied that country more funds from the IBRD to which the order contributes? A policy decision must lie behind that, which has not been revealed to the House. I ask my right hon. Friend to clarify how and why that director is authorised to vote. We should not penalise or turn our back on Guyana. We need to help Guyana's economy through the World Bank with the money which will be voted through this order.

I believe that the special adjustment loan is on offer, and I call upon my right hon. Friend to ensure that the World Bank conducts itself properly in relation to special adjustment loans to aid development of the poorer countries. That must be combined with the conditionality of the IMF so that we achieve a longer-term programme through the two institutions than is available through the IMF alone to resolve the difficult development problems faced by the poorer countries.

I shall give an example of how some of the money from the IBRD and the IDA is used badly, in the development of one country. Let us take St. Kitts. Sanctions against sugar going to the United States and the EEC have caused St. Kitts to lose $5 million, but the World Bank and the IDA have just given it $5 million for additional development projects. That shows that there is insufficient co-ordination of policy not just domestically and bilaterally but also internationally, with other countries and multilateral agencies, and through trade relationships, to support the development of the poorest countries. The IBRD and the IDA have the greatest opportunity to bring about that co-ordination. That is why I ask the House wholeheartedly to support the orders. I hope that my right hon. Friend can bring about the necessary improvements to meet the points that I have made.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the House wants to hear the Minister's reply. He would like to begin at 11.22 or 11.23 pm. I appeal for brevity.

10.57 pm

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I cannot altogether follow the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) in the sympathy that he expressed for the United States over the seventh IDA replenishment. The Minister, perhaps inadvertently, gave some, but not all, of the figures on this issue. It is worth summarising them briefly, because they are stark.

The sixth IDA replenishment amounted to $12 billion. The World Bank, which operates the IDA scheme throughout the world to the poorest countries, wanted $16 billion for the seventh replenishment. That would have been an increase of one third. There is to be $9 billion. That is a decrease of 25 per cent. on the sixth replenishment, but what is more important is that it is a decrease of 43 per cent. on what the World Bank considered to be essential for multilateral aid from rich countries to help poor countries over the next three years.

That is not the final figure, because the figures that I have been quoting are all in cash terms. As my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) said, there is inflation throughout the world and the 25 per cent. cut is probably even bigger if one takes account of expected inflation over the next three years.

The prime mover in making this cut has been the United States, as the Minister very fairly pointed out. I think that the whole House accepts that. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford suggested that there were reasons for this. No doubt there were—there are reasons for bad policies, just as there are reasons for good policies. In other words, there are good reasons and bad reasons. In making that cut, the United States has forced all the other rich countries to follow suit because of the way in which the IDA contributions are calculated. Once a major donor has taken the lead, the process cannot be stopped but spreads like the ripples in a pond when a stone is thrown in, and the poor countries of the world will suffer substantially as a result.

The United States took that action for bad reasons. I know a great about political opinion in the United States in relation to the Third world. There is a great deal of myopia and sheer ignorance, not merely among the American people, but among their legislators, about the facts of life in the poor countries which the IDA replenishment is designed to aid. If ever there was a case of spoiling the ship for a ha'porth of tar, it is the penny-pinching attitude of the United States in this regard.

In terms of the United States defence budget, let alone its total budget, the cut in contribution from $1 billion to $750 million, rather than an increase to $1,250 million, is penny pinching indeed. For the world's richest country to adopt such an attitude to the major issue of the next few years, which will affect the future of all of us — not even improving life in the poor countries, but just stopping things getting worse—will inevitably make it far more difficult for the World Bank and other international institutions to stop the rot getting worse.

The United States, aided and abetted — as the Minister again quite fairly said, although he did not use those words—by the Federal Republic of Germany and by Japan, has taken a very bad decision indeed. It is probably one of the most significant decisions that it has taken in relation to the Third world since the second world war, and possibly in its history. Those three countries, with the rest of us who are carried along willy-nilly due to the system of proportionality in contributions, will live to regret that decision.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall explained in such clear detail, the situation in the Third world is getting worse. Let those who doubt that read the World Bank's annual reports, including the latest report. The problems are not just poverty, unemployment, disease and malnutrition, but heavy debt burdens, population increases and, above all, the fact that in real terms commodity prices are at their lowest for about 30 years so that Third world countries cannot earn the money to pay for the extra cost of their imports or even to finance their debt burdens properly.

I do not suggest that the whole system is about to collapse like a house of cards, because I believe that the rich countries have sufficient nous and self-interest to recognise that they must allow debt rescheduling rather than let the world banking system collapse. But that does not improve life in the poor countries. It merely staves off disaster for all of us, and that is what the IDA replenishment would have done if we had had the $16 billion to which I believe the British Government would have been willing to contribute. Certainly there would have been pressure from the House for them to do so.

We have to accept the order, because it is better than nothing, but symbolically it is a disaster for the Third world. Those countries need more multilateral assistance, but they will get less as a result of the ignorant and myopic policies of the politicians and leadership of the United States. My only regret is that the United Kingdom, as a close friend and ally of that great country, did not have sufficient influence to change opinion on Capitol Hill and in the White House and ensure that the United States, as the world's richest country, undertook its true responsibilities to the poor countries of the world.

I am ashamed of the action of the United States. We must accept the order, because by doing so we shall preserve something at least for the poor countries. However, I am afraid that the position will deteriorate. When, in three years' time — under a Government of whatever colour—we debate the eighth replenishment of IDA, I am afraid that the global situation will be much worse, and that will be partly because of what the United States, Germany and Japan have done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) for the brevity of his speech.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): This is the first time that I have taken part in a foreign affairs debate. I do so because two weeks ago, as a member of an all-party delegation that included six other hon. Members, I visited the United Nations. I should like to thank all those, especially in the Foreign Office, who so excellently put to use some very scarce funds. Whether anyone apart from the participants benefited from the exercise, I leave the House to judge, but I hope that it will be possible to continue to send such delegations.

We had 24 meetings at the United Nations in three and a half days. One might have thought that in that time we would have run the gamut of the United Nations agencies. We saw politics, and we saw the aid agencies. We had lunch with Brad Morse, the director of the United Nations Development Programme, which was an experience that I would recommend to anyone. But we did not see the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade or the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and we did not see the transfer and banking of funds. We did not meet anyone from IBRD or from the IDA. That was a serious omission, because without trade and without industrial development — without the hard-headed commercialism especially noticeable in the IBRD—we must be talking in a very limited way. For if trade and commercial enterprises are successful and mutually beneficial, as I believe that they are, much aid becomes less necessary. The political input that the Western world would like to see into the Third world will follow both more subtly and more effectively in that way than if it is simply fuelled through the political and soft aid agencies.

I have had some contact with IBRD in the recent past. I believe that is is easily the most hard-headed and commercially minded of all the agencies operating in that field. My husband's company has been involved in much of the supervision of its activities in parts of the Third world.

The rules of the IBRD could be commended to one or two other organisations, including, perhaps, some of our own companies. I quote from the guide to the United Nations:

"Under its charter, the Bank must lend only for productive purposes—

in other words, not direct to Governments—

"and pay due regard to the prospects of repayment. . . loans must be for specific projects . . . The bank must assure itself that the necessary funds are unavailable from other sources on reasonable terms. The use of loans cannot be restricted to purchases in any particular member country or countries, and the bank's decisions to lend must be based only on economic considerations."

Most of the money comes from private investors—from the bank's own borrowing — and the disbursement is done entirely against invoices, most of which are for contracts based on international competitive bidding. After that, an extensive audit is required.

That is not a bad collection of commercial rules on which this and other Governments could allocate funds to the developing countries.

In 1974-75, my husband was involved in supervising some IBRD projects in Turkey. I went with him. This week, I checked on what has happened to some of the projects in the decade since then. The experience was salutary. The IBRD projects have continued to be profitable, despite all the political vicissitudes of that sad country. I found it hard to believe, but one particular project was in fact set up to break a government monopoly in one industry, and it has had a dramatic effect on that part of the economy.

The IBRD has encouraged and made possible an input in kind—not just cash—from other donor countries, so that, for example, the link between West Germany and Turkey has been emphasised. We should recognise and value such links. We would be far more worried if such links were forged between Turkey and East Germany or some other Eastern bloc country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) says that funds should go to the countries where they are most needed, but there are occasions when funds should go where they are most ably used. If we concentrate on a country that is rising and that has potential for development, and if we can transform it from a poor to a moderately well-off country, we will have helped the world economy more rapidly and more effectively than by simply pouring money into the countries with the greatest difficulties.

There has recently been much criticism of attitudes to aid of various types. Some of the most telling appeared in a leader article in The Times of 27 November, which came out while we were sitting at the United Nations. It sent a shiver of fear through representatives of all of the countries sitting there, so much so that several agency leaders came up to us waving a copy saying, "You do not all believe this, do you?" The article's comments were based on a debate in the House on Overseas aid on 22 November. Two comments were especially apposite. First:

"MPs showed an obsession with volume."

It went on to say that aid should be "subjected to more critical cost benefit analysis for donor and recipient together."

I do not think that I could be described as an aid freak because, perhaps more than any other hon. Member present, I am aware that the funds which we are voting are competing with my pet activities such as pensions and the National Health Service. We should try and we should admit that we are obsessed with inputs at the expense of outputs. If I might say so with the greatest respect, the speech of the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) was a classic example of an obsession with inputs without any consideration of the results. That, of course, is a British failing. We do it all the time. We do it with the National Health Service and with the Department of Health and Social Security, and we have just done it with the Common Market. I suspect that much of the funds that we have just voted for the EEC might have been better devoted to filling the grain silos of the rest of the world rather than those of Europe.

I suspect that much of the grumbling about inputs that we get from newspapers such as The Times is an excuse for not examining the results. Those who have doubts cannot be smug. We must ask three questions about where the money is going to and what we get out of it. First, what do we as donors get out of it?

Mr. Parry rose——

Mrs. Currie: Secondly, what do the recipients get out of it; and, thirdly, what is the result for both of us? We must ask what we donors get. It is a selfish and cruel question, but in this world the best things are often done for the wrong reasons and we should remind ourselves and our constituents that, through the IBRD and IDA, about 80 per cent. of what we give comes back to us in direct procurement. One or two agencies provide even more. The United Nations development programme, for example, brought back twice as much to the United Kingdom in terms of dollars in 1983—we gave $28 million and got $63 million back. We are on to a good thing in some of these programmes and we should not let our constituents forget it. I commend to my right hon. Friend the practice of the Ministry of Defence which, when there is any argument about what we should do about that programme, circulates to all hon. Members a list of companies in our constituencies which benefit from the programme so that we can be assured how employment prospects in our constituencies are affected.

We must ask what developing countries get. For IBRD it is easier to say what they do not get. They do not get weapons from IBRD. They do not get political infiltration. We are not talking about CIA or KGB funding of tin-pot dictators. They do not get unrepayable debts. They do not get grandiose white elephants and triumphal arches. They do not get schemes which break down for lack of infrastructure, parts or skills. The Third world is littered with past mistakes and especially the neglect of agriculture. It is significant that all those things that I have listed are the result of bilateral aid programmes, especially of Government-to-Government direct bilateral aid. We in the United Kingdom give about two-thirds of our total aid through bilateral aid and about one-third in multilateral aid of this type. I cannot tell whether that proportion is right but I know that if we go on—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Lady must relate what she is saying to the orders.

Mrs. Currie: I am referring directly to the orders, or at least I am trying to. I know, however, that if we head entirely away from programmes such as we are dealing with, we are probably going in the wrong direction.

We must ask what we get together. IBRD and IDF have shown the success of programmes which have a hard-headed and commercial element, for many of the nations that were once the recipients of IDA are now donors to IBRD. They work. Sentimentalitly alone is not enough. Long after the starving have disappeared from the television screens and long after the urgency of the immediate aid programmes has faded, the money that we vote tonight will contribute far more to a prosperous world from which we shall all benefit.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Time is short and I want to make only one simple point. The Liberal party entirely agrees with the criticisms of the hon. Members for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) and for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) of the United States for its failure to respond to the World Bank's request for replenishment to IDA. I wish to put that firmly on the record.

Did the Government make representations to the Reagan Administration about this, and if so, what response did they receive? Did they receive a response in the terms referred to by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells)?

11.15 pm

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend on what he has done and on his personal commitment to this matter. I welcome these orders because they are directly relevant to what is happening to the poorest countries—something on which a number of hon. Members have rightly concentrated.

Of course we must increase the viability of developing countries as partners with industrialised nations in a mutually rewarding expansion of international trade. Every developing country, in addition to needing financial resources, also needs human resources. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) mentioned Mr. Bradford Morse, the administrator of the UNDP. I was in New York two weeks ago and had more than one meeting with Bradford Morse. I endorse what my hon. Friend said. It is quite an experience, which unfortunately too few people have. I am indebted to him for reminding me that development is all about human beings. That is an axiom, but it is often forgotten when one gets bogged down in figures and percentages.

Mr. Morse reminded me that for far too long we have suffered from a Marshall plan mentality on aid. After the second world war in Europe all that was needed was a transfer of capital, but development in the Third world is still too concerned with investment and the transfer of capital, without concentrating on developing human resources.

In Europe that was not necessary, because the human resources were already fully developed after the second world war. We must do far more to improve skills, human resources and capacity. Only 10 per cent. of improvement in development comes from capital—the rest is in the development of human resources. The latter has been neglected, and in the last five years the World Bank has tried to fill that gap. That is why I am pleased about the orders.

I do not entirely follow the doom and gloom that is sometimes spread by Labour Members, although I share many of their criticisms and much of their concern. However, it is right to put on record that in the 30 years between 1950 and 1980 there has been a greater improvement in the less-developed countries than in any other 30-year period for any nation at any time, including Japan. Literacy in the poorest countries increased from 22 to 48 per cent. Life expectancy rose from 41 to 57 years. Child mortality decreased from 28 per 1,000 to 12 per 1,000. There has been a dramatic and worthwhile benefit over that 30-year period.

These orders are directly related to what we can do for the poorest countries. I am concerned about the fact that for the poorest 50 countries our percentage of gross bilateral aid was 63 per cent. in 1983, the lowest since 1979, with the exception of 1982. Our total overseas aid expenditure in 1983 was only 0·35 per cent. of GNP, the lowest for the last 20 years, except for 1980.

I appreciate that technical factors—for example, the timing of our contributions to IDA—have been largely responsible for those lower percentages, but that percentage of GNP is exactly half that suggested by the Brandt Commission. Indeed, it is necessary to remind the Government that in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office memorandum to the Brandt Commission in July 1980 there was a commitment to work towards the 0·7 per cent. of GNP for official aid, although without a target date. The percentage in 1979 was 0·52 per cent.

The poorest countries need international institutions because they are unattractive donees for bilateral aid as they have little to offer in return. I urge my right hon. Friend, when considering the orders, especially that relating to the IDA, to ensure in future that there is no flight of capital from Third-world countries, and to review the terms for loans because many of them are no longer applicable to the problems of Third-world countries. Finally, there is a need to fix interest rates for the future. Third world debtor countries cannot plan their next year's budget when they do not know what interest rates will be.

I commend the orders to the House.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I was told tonight by Mr. George Galloway, who is to give evidence to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee tomorrow and who has just returned from Ethiopia, that he has evidence from aerial photographs that about 500,000 people are making their way towards the southern Sudan. The position in sub-Saharan Africa, as the Minister knows, is beyond description.

In those circumstances, should this oil-rich country make this cut? About every eight hours a tanker leaves my constituency at Hound Point for Japan, Korea or heaven knows where, loaded with North sea oil. We are rich in oil. Even in our own national interests, should we not do something more to help the Third world?

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) has been waiting patiently to speak, as I did, so I shall end on a point which will not surprise the House. The Sunday Times estimates—it is an underestimate—that £3 million a day is spent on those islands in the south Atlantic, yet the Government propose this international penny-pinching. That is not the way that the United Kingdom should conduct its affairs in 1984.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): When the Minister replies, I hope that he will deal with how aid is distributed. He may have seen the admirable article in this week's New Statesman by James Firebrace about large donors, such as the United States, Canada, and European countries. There is no examination of where their aid goes, but aid given by voluntary organisations is monitored.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) rightly said that 85 per cent. of people in Eritrea can be reached only by the Eritrean Relief Association. I hope that the Minister will say that the Government recognise the ERA and will give it full support to ensure that vital supplies are given to the people there, who need them desperately.

Mr. Raison: I shall deal with the last point immediately, although it is perhaps a little outside the scope of the debate. We believe that the best way to get help to the rebel-held areas of Ethiopia is by working discreetly through voluntary agencies. I believe that to be a better way than to recognise all sorts of bodies and to hype the matter up politically.

There was great unanimity in the debate, in that we all respect the World Bank and what it does. No hon. Member seriously dissented from that, and I echo that shared respect. I was glad to hear from a newcomer to our debates, my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). It is always nice to have fresh blood in these debates. Her stress on outputs as opposed to inputs is right. It occasionally worries me that we spend all our time during the Lomé negotiations talking about how large the next one will be, and little time talking about how large in terms of effect the existing one has been, or, indeed, why it has not been possible to spend much of the money that was allocated to Lomé 2. We should talk about the consequences of our aid programmes, rather than only about their size.

The debate was wide-ranging and not especially disciplined, but nevertheless it was valuable. All that I can do in the time available is pick out a few points, and one in particular. We all share the regret that the next IDA replenishment will be as low as $9 billion. I should tell the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) that Britain and the EC made clear to the United States their views on the size of the replenishment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) and others mentioned the World Bank's proposal for a special facility for Africa. The matter has been mentioned directly in relation to the orders and to the possibility of an IDA supplementary fund. The proposal was discussed by the World Bank's executive board earlier today. The facility will take the form of a voluntary fund with a target of $1 billion to be committed over three years. The fund would be outside the IDA and the normal burden-sharing arrangements among donors would not apply. The precise purposes for which it would be used will be agreed by donors at a meeting in January or February. The United Kingdom would expect to attend that meeting. Until then, we shall continue to discuss with the bank how best we can play our part not only in relation to the facility, but in the wider context of the bank's joint programme action for sub-Saharan Africa, of which the special facility will be only a part.

The bank's purpose—this is in line with what we have heard in the debate—is to support reform and adjustment undertaken in African countries that have structural problems. That is precisely the underlying aim of our bilateral aid programme in Africa. During the past year alone, we have committed programme or sector aid worth nearly £33 million to eight countries in pursuit of that policy, and we shall need to bear in mind the strength of our bilateral programme when considering how to respond to the bank's latest initiative. We must ask ourselves whether a United Kingdom contribution to the bank's proposed special facility would be likely to yield greater value to African countries than would our programmes, and whether, in consequence, it represents a higher priority claim on our resources. Hon. Members must understand that, in the final analysis, there are limits to what we can do.

In the wider global context, there is a general decrease in official development assistance available to developing countries. Therefore, it is more important than ever that aid flows are used to maximum effect. We know that aid alone is not sufficient to bring about change; the right climate and policies must also be there. We must ensure that we have an effective policy dialogue such as we have been seeking in the Lomé negotiations.

As the House probably agrees, the World Bank and IDA staff are taking a positive lead in those directions, especially in the creation of more consultative groups in which policy dialogue with recipient countries can take place, and donors can exchange information. The bank intends to strengthen its staff in that area. We can take encouragement from that. I say firmly that my Department will work closely with the bank and IDA staff wherever and whenever we can. That is the real thrust of the joint programme of action for sub-Saharan Africa.

I cannot say now exactly what will happen in the discussions on the special facility, but I can say categorically that we believe that nothing is more important in tackling the problems of the world, especially Africa, than that we should work together as closely as possible with the World Bank and the other multi-lateral and bilateral donors. That must by the keystone of our approach to Africa in the difficult period that lies ahead. The House recognises those difficulties, and it recognises that, in the short term, we have the desperate problem of dealing with the immediate famine, which I have seen so vividly, and which everyone has seen on television. That is the immediate problem, but beyond that is the crucial problem of finding out how best we can begin to get the long-term development that Africa has so far not seen, in spite of the great resources that have been poured into it.

When the House passes these orders, as I believe it will, it will be making a significant and important contribution to this enormously challenging and worthwhile task.

PETITION

Human Embryos

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I beg leave to present a petition from the ministers and members of the church congregations in the Banff and Buchan constituency. The petition contains 449 signatures and was initiated by Rev. David J. Randall of Doune Manse, Macduff, and the other ministers in the constituency.

The petitioners believe that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real living individual human being, and oppose all practices which discriminate against the embryo, or violate his, or her, human dignity and right to life.

The petition continues as follows:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos; the discarding of human embryos; their use as sources of transplant tissue; or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the embryo concerned).

The petition initiated by Rev. David Randall, and the others to whom I referred, concludes:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray for the guidance of Almighty God upon all your deliberations etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Teachers (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

11.32 pm

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): This is——

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) has done the House and the people of Scotland a great service by securing this debate this evening. However, the Secretary of State for Scotland has made a major announcement, which will have enormous consequences for teachers in Scottish education, but he is not here on the Front Bench tonight. Is that not an outrageous affront to the House of Commons?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Where is he? Where is the Secretary of State?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must resume his seat when I am on my feet.

Mr. Canavan: The Secretary of State is not in his seat.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that he is taking time from the Adjournment debate by continuing the point of order. The presence or otherwise of the Secretary of State is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Where is the Secretary of State if he is not in his seat?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already told the House that this is not a matter for me.

Mr. Maxton: I take the point that my hon. Friends the Members for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) and for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) are making, because the issue of teachers' pay and salaries, and their demand for an independent inquiry to examine their pay and conditions, is an important one for Scotland.

When I first applied for this debate two weeks ago, the major teaching union in Scotland, the Education Institute of Scotland had been demanding such an inquiry for four months. When I was eventually granted the debate last week, it was against the background of the teachers in Scotland being on strike for one day. That strike achieved a turn-out of 31,000 out of 41,000 members of the EIS. In areas which are traditionally moderate such as Dumfries and Ayrshire, the strike was 90 per cent. effective among EIS members. Tomorrow, yet again the teachers of Scotland will be on strike.

In the meantime we have had a written answer from the Secretary of State to a question carefully planted by the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth). Planted questions are not unknown. In that reply the Secretary of State made important announcements about the inquiry into teachers' pay.

The first point that must be made is that the Secretary of State is not present to hear the debate. Secondly, he should not have made such an important statement in a written answer. He should have made a statement on the Floor of the House this afternoon so that we could question him about it. It is an insult—a continuing insult—because time after time the Secretary of State makes statements by way of written answers.

I understand that on television in Scotland tonight the Secretary of State said that a written answer was the usual way to deal with such matters. His colleagues in the Cabinet do not believe that. They believe that the correct way is to make a statement on the Floor of the House. How much better it would be if we had an assembly in Scotland where such matters could be properly debated and decided.

If the statement is so important, why did it have to be made today and what effect does the Secretary of State think that it will have? If I were being slightly less immodest than usual, I should say that it was to forestall my Adjournment debate. I do not believe that to be so. I think that the Secretary of State must have thought that if he issued the statement today it would appease the teachers in Scotland and that the industrial action promised for tomorrow would be called off. I have spoken to teachers' leaders in Scotland tonight and I am afraid that I must disillusion the Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State was given a roasting tonight on Scottish BBC television. He was taken apart by that most moderate of women, Mrs. Mary Marquiss, and made to look foolish. That says something about his case.

Far from appeasing the teachers, he has made matters considerably worse. It is likely that what he has said will cause considerable confusion in Scotland tomorrow and that the industrial dispute will go on even longer than first intended. It is possible that the teachers will ballot for an extension of industrial action and that they will be joined by other trade unions in the teaching sector.

The Secretary of State has treated the legitimate demand for an inquiry with contempt. He is not prepared to admit that teachers' pay has been seriously eroded. He said in the letter which formed part of the written reply: "it is of course no part of the Government's policy that salary increases should be indexed either to the rate of inflation or to some measurement of pay increases in the economy generally . . . However, pay awards to teachers over the last 10 years or so have in fact been very closely comparable with those made to other groups of local authority employees in Scotland." I do not know about whom the Secretary of State is talking.

Mr. Canavan: What about the police?

Mr. Maxton: Indeed, what about the police? Their salaries have gone up considerably more than teachers' salaries.

The Minister has treated that argument with complete contempt. He has said to the teachers, "We do not believe that your salaries should be increased. We believe that the erosion of your salaries against the cost of living and other comparable professions is right." From what he said on television about pay, it would appear that one reason why he is refusing to set up an independent inquiry is that it would give a blank cheque to the Educational Institute for Scotland. Conservative Members might agree—do that they think that it would so so? Let us consider what that means. They are saying that an independent inquiry—one set up not by the EIS but by the Secretary of State—would be so convinced by the teachers' case that it would give them everything they want.

The Minister said that the workload of pressures on teachers has not increased. Anyone who knows anything about the teaching profession knows that that is not the case. There has been enormous curricula development in relation to those two great men of Scottish education, Dr. Munn and Mr. Dunning. The Secretary of State says that, essentially, the curricula development will be over in a short time. Anyone who studies the matter knows that examinations will have to be set up and the work by teachers will continue for a long time yet. Many children face prospects of no employment when they leave school. They are not interested in education because they feel that they will be on the dole queue anyway. That places an additional burden on teachers.

The Secretary of State makes an offer of a possible award of additional money. Let us be clear that that is hedged about by so many clauses, sub-clauses and sub-contracts that it is difficult to say that it is any more than a con-trick. In return for that fraction of a promise, the teachers will be asked to give up hard-fought and hard-won conditions of service for essentially nothing. They are not being offered anything in return.

The Minister has solved nothing by his statement. The teachers are angry, depressed and frustrated. That will lead in the short-term to industrial action. No teacher wants that —the teaching profession is not renowned for industrial action. The Minister must ask why the Government have forced teachers into industrial action that they do not want. Even more important are the long-term effects on the morale of Scottish education of such a statement.

I ask the Minister to change his mind and set up an independent inquiry to decide the rightful position of Scottish teachers.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) on his good fortune in having an Adjournment debate tonight on this important matter. I am grateful to him for leaving me a few minutes before the Minister replies.

It is significant that the Minister and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have had ample opportunities to address the House on this matter, but they have declined to do so. Had it not been for the fact that my hon. Friend was fortunate in obtaining the Adjournment debate tonight, there is a strong possibility that we should not have heard from the Government today.

I said earlier today that the Secretary of State's letter on this issue was an insult to the teachers and to the House and therefore it would have been a complete waste of time had he come to the House to make a statement today. I have come to the conclusion that the Government have now set themselves on a road which turns every grievance in this country into an industrial dispute.

The Scottish teachers have a justifiable grievance. The Munn and Dunning reports have been produced. The whole context of a teacher's work load has changed quite dramatically. The Secretary of State does not even acknowledge that in his letter to Bob Beattie, published today. Teachers' salaries have fallen substantially, in a way which no other profession in this country has experienced. The Secretary of State acknowledges that fact but goes on to say that that is part of the Government's policy in any case.

The right hon. Gentleman adds a final insult to injury by saying that he is prepared to try to find a way around all this by setting up some kind of inquiry, but that he will dictate the terms. He wants an investigation into nine or 10 points which would dramatically alter teachers' contracts of employment by taking up hard earned home time in order to right a grievance. The teachers have a justifiable grievance. The Secretary of State and his hon. Friends want to alter the teachers' contracts in order to right what undoubtedly is a justifiable grievance.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Cathcart is right and there is prolonged trouble in Scottish schools, it will be because the Secretary of State does not understand Scottish education. Never having attended a Scottish school, he does not understand that we aim for the highest standards. Nor does he understand the dedication of Scottish teachers. Therefore, he plays on something which he simply does not understand.

If there is trouble in our Scottish schools, the responsibility for it—let it be said before the trouble begins; it is not a case of being wise after the event—will lie at the door of the Secretary of State. I hope that the parents of children in Scotland will understand clearly that the teachers are the victims of this Government's dogma and of a policy which is so unjust and so reprehensible that it is bound to lead to trouble. Even at this late hour I plead with the Minister to try to persuade his right hon. Friend to use common sense, to withdraw the letter which he sent today to Bob Beattie and to accept the teachers' request, not a demand, for an independent review so that the teachers can get on with the job which they so want to do—teaching our children.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): On such a serious subject, it is a pity that the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) did not resist the temptation to make some cheap and totally unjustified personal remarks about my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) will not be surprised to learn that I did not agree with much, if any, of what he said. But this is a serious subject and I am glad of the opportunity tonight to set out the position, following my right hon. Friend's statement, and in particular to put on record the Government's decision today on the postponement of the implementation of the standard grade, following the receipt today of a letter from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities.

The complaints of hon. Members opposite about the absence of an oral statement were totally bogus [Interuption.] I have checked what the last Labour Government did on teachers' pay under similar conditions. Not only was there not an oral statement, but I have not found a written statement, although one may exist.

I assure those hon. Gentlemen who have suggested that in some way the timing of today's decision was related to industrial action that it was completely unrelated to any disruptive action. Of course we deplore the disruptive action that has been taken. I hope that disruptive action will not continue once the teachers have had the opportunity to consider precisely what my right hon. Friend said. Disruptive action will damage pupils, Scottish education and teachers' reputations. I can say unequivocally that disruptive action from the teachers' point of view will achieve nothing.

No responsible Government could possibly have signed a blank cheque in the way that the teachers wanted. But my right hon. Friend has said clearly in his statement that he fully appreciates the strong feelings of many teachers. He has pointed out that there is another possible and proper way to handle the matter.

Mr. Canavan: Give the teachers the same money as the police.

Mr. Stewart: If I have time, I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's point about the police.

It is the statutory responsibility of the Scottish joint negotiationg committee to determine the salaries and conditions of service of school teachers in Scotland. We are prepared to consider on their merits, and in the framework of the Government's existing public expenditure plans for Scotland, any proposals relating to pay and conditions of service which might result from a detailed examination undertaken by the SJNC for school education.

Mr. Maxton: If the Minister is prepared to do that, why does he not accept the report that has already been drawn up by the working party of the joint negotiating committee which has representatives of the Secretary of State on the management side?

Mr. Stewart: I am about to deal with that report, which I have read, unlike, I suspect, many hon. Gentlemen.

My right hon. Friend has, however, pointed out that a review of conditions of service would have to deal specifically with areas where existing arrangements appear not to be in keeping with the present-day requirements, including the definition and prescription of teachers' responsibilities in the planning of personal teaching methods and programmes; the teaching, discipline and assessment of pupils; participation in schemes of personal professional development; participation in pastoral, tutorial and guidance arrangements; lunchtime and playtime supervision of pupils and consultations with parents, including attendance at parents' meetings, and control by employers of time within conditioned hours when teachers are not in class contact.

I cannot accept that it is other than realistic and constructive to want to examine teachers' conditions of service as well as their salaries. In much of the discussion of the teachers' request for an independent review of their salaries alone, great play was made of their status as professionals. But the argument that we have been hearing is that teachers should be paid on what they conceive to be professional scales but that their conditions of service, which in a number of respects are favourable, should not come under scrutiny. Teachers currently work a 32½-hour week. I shall rephrase that. Teachers currently have a 32½-hour working week.

Mr. Ewing: That is a cheap point.

Mr. Stewart: No, it is not a cheap point. It is surely unusual, by the standards of any profession, that teachers should have several hours in the week—the difference between their class contact time and their working hours —in which it is up to them to decide where they put in the hours that they are expected to spend on non-class contact duties.

I understand that there has been something of a hysterical reaction about the conditions of service point from the Educational Institute of Scotland this evening.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): A what reaction—historical or hysterical?

Mr. Stewart: I understood that there has been a hysterical reaction to this point. There is a good deal of confusion about such matters as playground and lunchtime supervision, discussions with parents and attendances at parents' meetings. There is much doubt in the minds of many teachers whether these matters are part of their professional duties. It is in no one's interests—parent, teacher or pupil — to leave the issue unresolved. A review is a sensible response to what has been said.

I shall respond to the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Cathcart about the teachers' case for substantial salary increases.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden) rose——

Mr. Stewart: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I usually give way to those who wish to intervene. However, I should like to get on with my speech. If I have time later, when I have put my case on the record, I will give way to him.

Mr. Canavan: Did anyone teach the Minister to make a speech?

Mr. Stewart: I had excellent teachers.

Mr. Canavan: It does not sound like it.

Mr. Stewart: We have been told by the hon. Member for Cathcart that the teachers have an unanswerable case for salary increases. That is based on the proposition that if something is said often enough and loudly enough it automatically becomes true.

Mr. Canavan: Give teachers the same money as the police.

Mr. Stewart: I am coming to the hon. Gentleman's point about the police. Teachers have been treated very much like other comparable groups of employees. Teachers say that comparable groups have received much larger pay increases than themselves, but if they are compared with other public service groups, especially others employed by local authorities such as manual workers, social workers, administrative, professional and technical grades, and with civil servants, it emerges that they have been treated in much the same way. When one compares teachers with civil servants in the comparable salary bands, it emerges that teachers have had larger salary increases over the past 10 years than those groups.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) referred to the police. The police provide security and they are significantly different from other groups because they have no right to strike. I need hardly say, in more general terms, that it is not the Government's policy to index pay increases either to the rate of inflation or to earnings of other groups.

Mr. Canavan rose——

Mr. Stewart: That would not be consistent with our policy of fighting inflation——

Mr. Canavan: It is on the police——

Mr. Stewart: —or of keeping down expenditure——

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Canavan: It is unfair of the Minister to compare teachers with the police.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) to resume his seat. The Minister has not given way.

Mr. Canavan: Then he will give way now. The police cannot be compared with teachers. Teachers educate children.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Canavan: The police are employed by this Government to beat miners and others over the head on picket lines.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not being fair to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), who was fortunate enough to secure the Adjournment debate. The debate is personal to him and we want to hear the Minister's reply. Mr. Allan Stewart.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Stewart: No, I have given way to the hon. Member for Cathcart, who initiated the debate. I am not giving way to the hon. Member for Falkirk, West. The local authority sector must be a part—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Falkirk, West is not doing any good by making constant interjections. Hon. Members on both sides of the House want to hear what I am saying in response to the arguments of the hon. Member for Cathcart.

Hon. Members will know that my right hon. Friend sought the advice of the Scottish Examination Board and COSLA on whether phases II and III of the standard grade reforms in the implementation programme should be postponed. The SEB advised that for its interest there was as yet no reason for postponement. I have today received the advice of the convention that phases II and III should be postponed, and my right hon. Friend has accepted that advice. I agree with the convention that the policy of non-co-operation in new curricular developments, which the EIS has adopted, makes it necessary to postpone the new courses due to begin in August 1985 and August 1986.

I share the extreme reluctance with which the convention said it decided that postponement was now inevitable. The refusal of teachers to co-operate in new developments is a complete betrayal of the expectations of parents and pupils. I regret particularly the loss to those pupils who have not hitherto had the opportunity to show what they can do in national examinations and to gain a certificate showing their achievements. The policy now adopted by the EIS contrasts strangely with its view, less than two years ago, that implementation should be speeded up—a view that the Government then accepted.

Mr. Dewar rose—

Mr. Stewart: By its action—or rather policy of inaction the EIS has now prolonged for the schools the period of overlap during which both old and new courses are taught, a period which, not so long ago, the EIS was anxious to reduce to a minimum.

Mr. Dewar rose—

Mr. Stewart: May I finish this point?

I must reiterate what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already made crystal clear: there can be no going back on phase I of standard grade, the new courses in English, mathematics, science and social and vocational skills which pupils started in August this year. We cannot betray the trust of those pupils by saying to some of them that, after all, they will not have the opportunity to gain the Scottish certificate of education in 1986 and saying to others that, after a term spent on the new courses, they must revert—

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought that you were going to bring the proceedings to an end. The Under-Secretary of State has made an important statement. There has been a difficulty in getting such statements from the Library the following day. May we have the statement placed in the Library? Will you approach Mr. Speaker on this subject? A statement made around midnight has not been available to hon. Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Under-Secretary of State has heard the hon. Member's comments.

Mr. Dewar rose—

Mr. Stewart: I cannot give way; I have only one minute to go. I shall be happy to ensure tomorrow that hon. Members have an early copy of what I am saying, because this matter is important.

Phase I of standard grade must go ahead as planned, and we shall, of course, monitor the position. We are consulting the local authorities and the examination board. I hope that we can minimise any further disruption to pupils now embarked on these new courses, to pupils studying for ordinary grade and higher grade examinations and to the conduct of the examinations next year.

The Opposition have talked about the additional work load for teachers. I must say to the—

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nicaragua

1. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications for United Kingdom foreign policy of the current situation in Nicaragua.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): We wish to see the restoration of peace and stability in central America. As my right hon. and learned Friend told the House on 9 November, the situation in Nicaragua calls for the greatest possible restraint on all sides. We wholeheartedly support the Contadora process as the best hope for bringing peace and stability to the region.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Why do the British Government, rather like the United States Government, appear to accept that the elections in El Salvador are more legitimate than those in Nicaragua? Do the British Government accept the integrity and sovereignty of Nicaragua? What representations have we made regarding the serious tension that exists between the United States and Nicaragua?

Mr. Renton: There was agreement on all sides that the elections in El Salvador were fair. It cannot be said that the same agreement applied in respect of the elections in Nicaragua. Although a number of people felt that the elections were reasonably conducted on election day, it was clear that, in advance of that, there was political discrimination in the form of harrassment at Opposition meetings, unequal time on radio and television and censorship of some material relating to the election campaign. Because of such considerations, four parties withdrew from the election. Against that background, we decided not to send observers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Is it not true that the strategic security of this country depends to a significant degree on NATO's capacity to provide reinforcements for Europe passing through the Panama canal, the Caribbean and the Gulf of Mexico? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the efforts by the United States to foster genuine democracy and to prevent the extension of Marxist subversion and influence in that area are in our interests?

Mr. Renton: Security not only in Nicaragua but in the whole of central America depends strongly on a regional settlement. That is the spirit behind the whole Contadora process. The United States in the United Nations General Assembly has given its specific support to that process, just as we have.

Mr. Anderson: Is there not a role for us, particularly before Congress meets, in seeking to restrain the increasingly bellicose noises from the United States in respect of Nicaragua?

The Minister mentioned Contadora. Does he not share the anxieties of the Mexican Government and others that the United States, acting directly and through its allies, is seeking to move wrecking amendments to the Contadora treaty and thereby abort the process?

Mr. Renton: Honduras and others have suggested amendments to the Contadora Act, which are now under consideration. The position of the United States in this matter is reflected in the fact that the United States has constantly stressed that it wishes to achieve political reform by peaceful means. There is a continuing dialogue between the United States special representative, Mr. Shlaudeman, and the Deputy Foreign Minister, Mr. Tinoco. That shows that the American Government have a direct link with the Sandinista Government. The continuation of those discussions is most important.

Uganda

2. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have made in the current year to the Ugandan Government on human rights.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): We attach great importance to this. My right hon. and learned Friend met the Ugandan Minister of State for Foreign Affairs in New York on 28 September and discussed a number of issues in our bilateral relations, including human rights. The situation has also been raised with the Ugandans on a number of other occasions.

Mr. Fisher: I appreciate the Minister's concern, but how does that concern square with the fact that the Government are giving support for the training of the Ugandan police and army? What assurances can the Minister give that that training will be solely for the benefit of increased discipline in the army and will not result in human rights being endangered further?

Mr. Rifkind: It squares very well. As the hon. Gentleman correctly said, the purpose of the military training that we are giving the Ugandan army is to ensure that there is a proper level of discipline in the armed services. At least part of the problem of human rights in Uganda has been caused by a lack of discipline and a lack of control. That is one element in regard to which we can make a positive contribution.

Sir John Farr: Are representations being made about the pitiful circumstances of the many tens of thousands of Ugandan Asians who fled that country and arrived in Britain penniless, many of whom are now in Leicester? What actions have the Government taken to get some justice for them?

Mr. Rifkind: Earlier this year the Ugandan Government introduced a scheme to examine compensation claims and to try to respond to the proper anxieties to which my hon. Friend has referred. I understand that some of the cases have been completed and that property has been returned to Ugandan Asians from whom it was expropriated. We hope for rapid progress in this matter. There has been progress, but it has not been sufficiently rapid.

Space Weapons

3. Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards the proposed Soviet-American negotiations on weapons in space.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): We are pleased that the Soviet Union has agreed to discuss outer space arms control with the United States. We are strongly committed to arms restraint policies in this area. Together with our other allies, we shall continue to support United States efforts to achieve progress in this field, but the need for Western patience and perseverence is as great as ever.

Mr. Banks: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply. Bearing it in mind that the two super powers are at the start of a race to develop weapons in space at gigantic cost, will my hon. Friend undertake to do all that he can to improve the understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union on the desirability of reaching an agreement to ban the stationing of all weapons in space? Will he say what the Government's policy is towards the United States's strategic defence initiative?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend about the urgent need for measures, which are agreed between East and West, and principally between the United States and the Soviet Union, for arms restraint in outer space. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister talked about the dangers of a new and terrible theatre of war in that regard. I am sure that the United States goes into these preliminary discussions in the new year with the clear objective of trying to reach an understanding with the Soviet Union. Indeed, my right hon. and learned Friend has just had discussions with the United States Secretary of State about these and other issues and will shortly do so with Mr. Gorbachov in London next week.

Mr. Norman Atkinson: Will the Minister reconsider that answer, as it must contradict the Government's main purpose for maintaining nuclear weapons? The House has often heard the Government explain that their justification for having nuclear weapons is their deterrent value. If weapons in space are successfully developed with a view to finding a satisfactory defence against nuclear weapons, will that not minimise the deterrent value of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Luce: The Soviet Union and the United States are undertaking some research on strategic defence and ballistic missile defence, but the United States has made it plain during this year that it is willing and anxious to talk to the Soviet Union about research on both sides, with a view to reaching some form of understanding. That is a sensible way in which to proceed and I hope that that is what they will do.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my hon. Friend agree that American space weapons are designed primarily for the defence of the United States, not for Europe, and, therefore, that their deployment would uncouple Europe from the American strategic deterrent? Does he further agree that on those grounds alone West European Governments should resist the development and the deployment of space weapons by either side?

Mr. Luce: As I have already made plain, the Government believe that we must get urgent progress, if possible, in arms restraint in outer space. I reinforce that view strongly. Nevertheless, I believe that it is the view of the United States that the Alliance as a whole should remain completely united in these matters. We are in the closest possible consultation with them on the important issues of outer space.

Mr. Healey: Is not the question of unity the question of the policy upon which that unity exists? Does the Minister agree that the American strategic defence initiative, if it were successful, which most American experts think is most unlikely, would undermine the whole basis of nuclear stability as it has existed since the second world war? If he does not accept that, does he agree that if the Americans give their knowledge to the Russians it would make a farce of the Government's policy of maintaining a national nuclear deterrent? For those reasons, will the Minister strongly urge the United States' Government to accept the Soviet proposal to ban weapons in outer space?

Mr. Luce: I agree that the implications of research and prospects in outer space are extremely far-reaching and serious. That is why it is important that we should support strongly the statement of the United States' Government that they are willing to discuss both their research and Russian research in outer space with a view to reaching some understanding about restraints.

High Technology

4. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, during his recent visit to Israel, he was able to further the prospect of joint ventures in high technology between Israel and Britain and closer co-operation between Israel and the European Community.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend's recent visit to Israel focused on the prospects for peace in the middle east. He also reviewed our bilateral relationship with Israel, as well as the effects on Israel's relationship with the European Community of Community enlargement. There was a discussion on progress in commercial relations, but joint ventures in high technology were not specifically discussed.

Dr. Clark: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of Israel's capability in various areas of high technology. Will he therefore suggest to his right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade that he should visit Israel for bilateral talks, as he has done with other countries in that area?

Mr. Luce: First, I take note of my hon. Friend's suggestion. He might like to know that officials at the Department of Trade and Industry are due to have discussions with officials in Israel shortly, as part of the United Kingdom-Israel joint committee on trade relations, with a view to finding ways to increase our trade with Israel. Trade in both directions is already increasing quite strongly.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Does the Minister accept that before there is a further increase in trade, or a continuation of trade, between Britain and Israel, we should first at least demand that Israel withdraws from Lebanon, stops building settlements on the west bank and gives basic human rights to the Palestinians on the west bank in Gaza?

Mr. Luce: On the first question, commercial trade has continued with Israel. We believe that it is right to have ordinary, straightforward commercial trade. We want to see an agreement as soon as possible between the Israeli Government and the Lebanese Government for the withdrawal of forces there. In that connection, the European Community imposed an arms embargo on Israel in 1982 as a result of the invasion of the Lebanon.

Africa

6. Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit Africa.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I shall be visiting Zimbabwe, Zambia and Kenya between 5 and 12 January.

Mr. Lloyd: The World Bank, in its challenging and perceptive series of reports on sub-Saharan Africa, has pointed out that the key issues are the better use of investments and the adequate existence of management capacity in Governments. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, despite the well-meaning but misguided observations of certain bishops and others, the one thing we must do is to continue support in that area, especially where investment in South Africa is concerned, since, despite its many faults, it remains the country which most fulfils the World Bank's conditions and is the only country which is well placed to ensure that there is not a massive disaster south of the equator? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with the observations of President Reagan yesterday that we shall continue to give unswerving support provided that South Africa continues to address the imperatives of constructive change?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of continued investment throughout Africa, and that that investment should be well managed, and in many places better managed than it is. I also agree with him about the importance of continuing freedom to invest in South Africa where that investment can contribute to the economic and political stability of that country, which has a wider significance. I would rather not agree selectively with parts of President Reagan's observations on South Africa, but I have noted them with interest.

Dr. Owen: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that this is perhaps the best opportunity that there has been for six years to obtain a Namibian peace settlement along the lines of the United Nations resolution? The hardening of Republican Congressmen's attitudes and President Reagan's change of position are now coupled with the Angolan President's offer to withdraw Cuban troops from the Namibian border and to send some Cuban troops home. Will the Foreign Secretary take the initiative, with the other four of the original five countries, to push a United Nations settlement in Namibia?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the changes to which he referred, especially the change in the position of the Angolan Government, give greater encouragement to the chances of a settlement of the Namibian problem. As he will know, we have been pursuing this matter through the existing negotiation arrangements for a long time. We shall continue to do that, and I shall consider whether the original Contact Group can do something more in this context. We must give every encouragement to that process.

Mr. Hayes: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend and the House will join me in expressing sympathy with and offering condolences to those British people who lost relatives in last week's Gambian ferry disaster. Will he assure the House that he will do his best to give information to those families, who at present do not know what is happening? One of my constituents does not know whether his brother is alive or dead. Will my right hon. and learned Friend go so far as to say that he will assist with the funeral arrangements at the earliest possible opportunity so that my constituents—[HON. MEMBERS: "Get on with it."] Mr. Speaker, Opposition Members do not seem to appreciate the seriousness of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going into detail on a rather broad question.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful, Mr. Speaker, but may I finally ask my right hon. and learned Friend to do everything in his power to ensure that the right information is provided to my constituents on this extremely serious matter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The House will join my hon. Friend in expressing sympathy with the Gambian Government and people at the sinking of the ship Chilele Jawara on 7 December when it was carrying 73 Gambians and 25 Britons. We especially extend our sympathy to the families of the three Britons who are missing, feared drowned. Only one body has been recovered, and the search continues for the other two. I fully understand my hon. Friend's anxiety on behalf of his constituents, and I assure him that our consular department is in contact with the next of kin and is, through the high commission, keeping them informed of developments. It will continue to do so.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that today there is a lobby of Parliament, jointly organised by the Namibia support committee and the anti-apartheid movement, demanding Government action on independence for Namibia? Will he take to the rally that is being held immediately after Foreign and Commonwealth Questions a message that the Government will now act and speak on behalf of the Namibian people, instead of behaving like a surrogate of South African intransigence, as has hitherto been the case?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has offered a characteristically misguided insight into the scene. The Government have been exercising the most strenuous endeavours to help to bring about a settlement of the Namibian question. We have been taking an active part, not only in discussions with the South African Government, but with the Angolan Government, the Front Line states and our other partners in the Contact Group. We regard the settlement of this dispute in accordance with resolution 435 as a matter of importance, and we shall continue to press for this.

Mr. Lawrence: While he is in Africa, will my right hon. and learned Friend visit Bophuthatswana, from which I have just returned, which is an independent, free enterprise, democratic, multi-racial and harmonious state, lacking only the recognition of Britain and other countries?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am familiar with my hon. and learned Friend's views, which he propounds with such tenacity, on Bophuthatswana. I fear that I shall not have an opportunity to visit it in the near future. It will have to bask for the moment in the glory of his own recent visit.

Mr. Anderson: The Foreign Secretary knows that we applauded the courage shown by his Minister of State in his attitude to Solidarity when he visited Poland. Will he show a portion of that same courage in denouncing the legal tyranny in South Africa, which charges with treason men who involve themselves in democratic activities? Will he also learn from the President of the United States and the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the tune has changed and that it is now respectable to denounce apartheid?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is not fully familiar with the fact that, on many occasions, we have expressed our abhorrence of the system of apartheid. We have expressed our views strongly about many manifestations of that, and most recently in the pronouncement that we agreed with our partners in the European Community on 11 September. There was also the speech by the presidency in the General Assembly only three weeks ago. There is no doubt about our position.

China

7. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which ways he expects the signing of an accord with China over the future of Hong Kong will affect Anglo-Chinese relations in the long term.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We are confident that the successful conclusions of the Hong Kong negotiations provides a firm basis not only for the future prosperity and stability of Hong Kong, but for even closer co-operation between the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China in the years ahead.

Dr. Mawhinney: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept the appreciation of the House for the substantial contribution that he has made to improving Anglo-Chinese relations? Now that the accord on Hong Kong has been signed and an agreement has been reached, will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that he will continue to afford the highest priority to building on that good relationship politically, diplomatically, in trade and in travel?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments. I assure him that, just as we have been working hard for a number of years to improve our relationship with the People's Republic of China we shall continue to do with particular reference to trading, touristic and other opportunities, so that our companies can make a major contribution, as we would wish them to do, to Chinese modernisation.

Mr. Beggs: Following the signing of the agreement, will all possible assistance be given to British companies tendering for contracts in China? Will companies such as GEC, which has factory space in my constituency in Larne, benefit in the long term from the good relationship being developed between the two countries?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We shall certainly continue to give all the support that we possibly and sensibly can to the efforts of British companies. We shall shortly be re-opening a consulate in Shanghai, which will be helping in that important part of the Chinese economy. I hope that the company to which the hon. Gentleman has referred will be among those to benefit.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, following the agreement on Hong Kong, any consideration of Anglo-Chinese relations should include priority being given to fostering confidence in Hong Kong and in the relationship between the people of Hong Kong and China? Has he any plans to facilitate that?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I very much agree that after the conclusion of the agreement on Hong Kong it is essential that we do not lose sight of the continuing importance of good relations between Hong Kong and China. Indeed, such relations are likely to develop during the work that will have to take place over the next 14 years. That work will be undertaken in a more auspicious climate if, at the same time, we are striving to improve our general relations with the People's Republic.

Mr. Adley: Will my right hon. and learned Friend please take this opportunity to have a thoroughgoing review of the COCOM agreement in so far as it relates to relations between this country and the People's Republic? Does he agree that in the past 30 years there has been such a fundamental change in China's relations with the Eastern bloc and the Soviet Union, as well as with the Western world, that the present situation is nonsensical, indefensible and thoroughly harmful to the development of good trade relations between us?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I hesitate to agree with such wide-ranging epithets, even though they come from my hon. Friend, but I agree that it is important to ensure that the COCOM agreement operates sensibly and in a manner consistent with its overall objectives.

Mr. George Robertson: Now that the Foreign Secretary is on the point of going to Peking to sign the Hong Kong agreement, which will do much to cement British-Chinese relations, will he tell us how he intends to report on the joint liaison group over the next 12 years? Has he had any time to reflect on the suggestion made last week about the possibility of an annual report to Parliament, with, perhaps, a debate on it?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have certainly been reflecting upon that point, but I am not yet in a position to emit the results of those reflections.

Disarmament

8. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's response to the United States-Soviet talks on disarmament, planned to take place in Geneva in January 1985.

Mr. Luce: We have consistently supported the United States in its willingness to negotiate, without preconditions, balanced and verifiable agreements on limiting nuclear weapons. We therefore welcomed the announcement that Mr. Shultz and Mr. Gromyko are to meet in January. We firmly hope that this will lead to agreement on how to carry forward the process of negotiating arms control agreements covering both nuclear and outer space questions.

Mr. Malone: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that the recent Soviet offer secured by the Leader of the Opposition not to target nuclear weapons on this country and to reduce the number of medium-range nuclear weapons is anything but helpful? Does it not simply amount to a unilateral renunciation of our nuclear weapons? Does not the other matter, which was conceded off-the-cuff by the Leader of the Opposition when in the Soviet Union, that we can simply replace all our missiles with cardboard ones, say all that needs to be said about the Opposition's policy on this issue?

Mr. Luce: In so far as it is possible to understand the offer made to the Leader of the Opposition by the Soviet Union, it would seem that in return for us renouncing our independent strategic deterrent and getting rid of all nuclear weapons in this country the Russians would make proportionate reductions in their country—which, given the size of their strategic force, would represent a tiny, minimal reduction—and would point their weapons in a different direction. If the Leader of the Opposition thinks that that would enhance the security of this country, he had better think again.

Mr. Johnston: Are the Government prepared to involve the British independent nuclear deterrent in such disarmament negotiations?

Mr. Luce: The first thing, obviously, as the hon. Gentleman knows is that there is to be a preparatory meeting between Mr. Shultz and Mr. Gromyko in early January with a view, we understand, to discussing the parameters within which they will review the whole question of nuclear reductions and arms activities in outer space. That is the purpose of that meeting. Therefore, we have to hope that it will lead to a discussion between the Soviet Union and the United States which will, in due course, lead to a reduction in nuclear weapons.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has frequently made it absolutely clear, as far as Britain's independent strategic force is concerned, that if there is clear evidence that both of those countries agree to substantial reductions in nuclear weapons, and there is no increase in the defence capability of the Soviet Union, we shall consider the situation with regard to the British deterrent force.

Sir Peter Blaker: Will my hon. Friend be even more specific about the relationship between our nuclear deterrent force and the size of the Soviet strategic arsenal? Is it not true that our nuclear force represents less than 3 per cent. of the strategic arsenal of the Soviet Union? Therefore, is not the proposal discussed between the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and Mr. Chernenko that we should throw away the whole of our nuclear arsenal in return for a reduction to 97 per cent. in the Soviet Union arsenal both ridiculous and positively dangerous?

Mr. Luce: My right hon. Friend, who has had responsibility for these matters, is absolutely right. The British deterrent force constitutes only 3 per cent. of the total nuclear force of the Soviet Union. It must be seen in perspective. In the forseeable future there is a need to maintain our security in Britain by the retention of an independent nuclear deterrent. As I have said, if there is real progress and substantial reductions, we can review the position again.

Mr. Healey: Either the Minister was badly briefed or he did not read his brief. Is it not true that the United States Government and the Soviet Union Government will discuss in January not only the abolition of weapons in space but a substantial reduction in offensive missiles, whether based in Europe or elsewhere? Does that not put the British nuclear force, like the French nuclear force, in the middle of the argument?

Does the Minister agree that as the Conservative Government in the early 1970s agreed that British weapons should be counted in SALT I, for the Prime Minister now to oppose the counting of British weapons in the forthcoming negotiations will present a severe obstacle to their conclusion? Does the hon. Gentleman not feel a little embarrassed because President Reagan and the Opposition are talking to the Russians about arms control while the Government absolutely refuse to engage in discussions?

Mr. Luce: As is often the case, the right hon. Gentleman is talking absolute nonsense. The position is clear. If Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Shultz, as a result of their preparatory meeting, get together to discuss all nuclear weapons reductions as well as those in outer space—which is absolutely right—that will involve discussions about the Soviet and the United States missile systems. The right hon. Gentleman is not showing a sense of perspective. If there is substantial progress on nuclear weapons, which we all hope there will be, and there is an agreement for substantial reductions, that will be the right moment for us to review the position on Britain's deterrent force.

Brazil

9. Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to foster and cement good relationships between the United Kingdom and Brazil; whether he will seek to visit Brazil; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We have close and friendly relations with Brazil. These links were further strengthened by the visit of my noble Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in July and by recent parliamentary visits in both directions.

Mr. Walker: Is the Minister aware that the Brazilian economy continues to grow despite the economic problems in the world, and that British exporters can only benefit from good political relationships with that country? Is he further aware that the Brazilian Government annually purchase from British defence suppliers £80 million of goods and have never demanded an offset agreement? Is he aware also that the arrangement between Short Brothers of Belfast and Embraer provides Brazil with little in money terms? Does the Minister recognise that a contract for the new basic RAF trainer would greatly assist in cementing good relations with both countries?

Mr. Renton: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's close interest in the Shorts—Embraer bid to supply the RAF with a new trainer. It is one of four bids currently being considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. It will be given close attention and, like all the other bids, every other relevant consideration, including political factors, will be taken into account.

South Africa

10. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current condition of relations between the United Kingdom and the Republic of South Africa.

Mr. Rifkind: Despite recent difficulties, we continue to attach importance to the maintenance of diplomatic relations with South Africa. We welcome the lifting of the detention orders on the three men in our Durban consulate, and I can confirm to the House that the three men have now left the consulate. This removes a difficult problem and will improve our ability to make representations to the South African Government on matters of concern.

Mr. Proctor: I welcome the good news from Durban that my hon. Friend has just given the House. Will he take this opportunity to welcome the recent release of political detainees in South Africa?

Mr. Rifkind: We are always delighted when the imposition of detention without trial is lifted. Naturally, both sides of the House will be concerned that charges have now been levelled against the men, but they will at least be able to answer those charges in court. The South African courts have a healthy reputation for independence.

Mr. Anderson: Have the men been charged with treason following their leaving the consulate? Now that these three brave men are no longer in the consulate, will the hon. Gentleman adopt a rather more robust view about the "Coventry Four" in relation to South Africa?

Mr. Rifkind: I am not aware that any charges have been levelled against the three men. My latest information is that the three men in the consulate were having a meeting with their families in the building in which the consulate was situated. We have already indicated our great concern at the South African Government's refusal to return the "Coventry Four".

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Budgetary Discipline

78. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the effectiveness of the proposed new principles for European Economic Community budgetary discipline.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The principles agreed at Fontainebleau represented an important new step in the control of Community expenditure. Following the adoption at Dublin of a text incorporating these principles, the Community now has at its disposal the means of implementing effective budget discipline.

Mr. Freeman: I draw my right hon. and learned Friend's attention to article 5 of the agreement and ask him about two provisions. It is extraordinary, by normal business standards, that the overspending will be corrected within a two-year period and that let-out clauses will enable overspending not to be corrected in certain circumstances. Will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that overspending in the Community will be promptly corrected and that there will be no fudge?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The point made by my hon. Friend in his last sentence is plainly important. The arrangements for correction over a period are designed to take account of the circumstances in which the correction might need to be made. It is of the highest importance that this budgetary discipline arrangement should be applied with full vigour and that its purpose and intention are met.

Mr. Deakins: Is control of public expenditure a matter of vital national interest for this country? If it is, why have we agreed to majority voting to deal with it in future?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Control of Community expenditure has been and remains of the greatest importance to this country. It is regarded as a matter of the highest importance by a number of other member states. For that reason, we have been able to achieve agreement on this text to secure effective implementation of budgetary discipline. The reason why the budgetary discipline text provides for the Council to set the reference framework by qualified majority is that we want the new budgetary discipline arrangements to be incorporated, as I think the House would want, in the Community's budgetary procedure. All decisions on budgetary procedure are taken by qualified majority. The essential point is the stipulation that, in future, agricultural spending should grow at a rate less than the growth in the own resources base, and the Commission has bound itself to draw up its price-fixing proposals in the light of that guideline.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: As it seems likely that the European Parliament is about to reject the Community's budget, what advice will my right hon. and learned Friend give to the Council of Ministers? Will he take note of the fact that the last time the European Parliament rejected the Community's budget the Commission observed little discipline by way of sticking to the principle of one twelfth per month of the previous year's budget?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend has come at the end of his question to the point that arises at the beginning of his question. If the Parliament rejects altogether the 1985 draft budget, the Community will have to operate under the provisional twelfths regime within the 1 per cent. ceiling. It is important that that is done properly.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Foreign Secretary was once Chancellor of the Exchequer. During the annual round of public expenditure reviews, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman ever have dreamt of accepting an undertaking from a Government Department that it would not spend more unless exceptional circumstances arose, as under article 2, or barring aberrant developments, as under article 5? Would it not have been abundantly plain to him as Chancellor that such a Department was fashioning the boltholes down which it hoped to escape? Therefore, why should the right hon. and learned Gentleman invite the House to pretend that that is not precisely what the Community is also doing?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If the hon. Gentleman studies the budgetary arrangements in this country he will see that a number of Departments have rather more flexible arrangements over the control of expenditure than the ones about which he is now complaining. As Chancellor I was not necessarily happy with all of them. The arrangements that have been made, which were debated in the House yesterday, represent a substantial achievement as a means of securing effective budgetary discipline.

Community Institutions (British Staff)

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the ratio of Britons to other nationals of member states employed by European Economic Community institutions.

Mr. Rifkind: The overall ratio is about one to 10 for all staff and one to 6 in the highest grades. I am arranging for more detailed figures to be published in the Official Report.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is my hon. Friend aware that Great Britain's agreed staffing quota of 18·4 per cent. of the staff of the EEC institutions is only just over half filled by British nationals? What steps does my hon. Friend intend to take to ensure that more of the 1,000 or so highly paid jobs involved go to British nationals, as they should, rather than to French and Belgian nationals as at present?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend properly draws attention to what has been a problem. We have been exercising ourselves energetically in recent years to rectify the position. The position is now reasonably healthy in the higher grades, but there is still a problem to be resolved with some of the lower grades within the Community, particularly in agriculture, development of the budget, the secretariat, and the Council secretariat. We shall continue to make representations on those matters.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Has my hon. Friend noted that the French Government have appointed as their two Commissioners their former Foreign Minister and former Finance Minister? If we wish to stake a claim to important posts within the Community, would it not be a good idea to appoint persons of that calibre rather than the two—I had better not say it—rather less than first-class political personalities whom we have chosen?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend's remarks are unworthy. One of the two British Commissioners to the Community is a respected former Cabinet Minister, and the other was an important member of the previous Government. My hon. Friend does no service to the United Kingdom by suggesting that their qualifications are other than excellent for the jobs that they will occupy.

Following are the figures:

*British and other nationals in EEC institutions

	A Grade			Others
	Total number of officials	United Kingdom officials	(Per cent.)	Total staff numbers	United Kingdom staff members	(Per cent.)
Commission	2,527	360	(14·25)	7,155	549	(7·67)

Budgetary Discipline

80. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Council of Agriculture Ministers will be asked to approve the statement on budgetary disciplines before it is finally approved by European Economic Community Foreign Ministers.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, Sir. The text on budgetary discipline was formally adopted by the Foreign Affairs Council in Dublin on 4 December.

Mr. Deakins: Is the agreement by the Foreign Affairs Ministers legally binding on the Council of Agriculture Ministers? If it is not, why should it pay any attention to the agreement?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As the hon. Gentleman will recollect, there is only one Council of Ministers. It is sometimes attended by Finance Ministers, sometimes by Foreign Ministers and sometimes by Agriculture Ministers. The text represents a firm undertaking by the Council, which has committed itself to observe the provisions. It is an undertaking which is as valid and effective in relation to Agriculture Minister as to any others.

Mr. Winnick: How does the Foreign Secretary compare his words about better financial discipline, and the rest, with the thousands of tonnes of beef, butter and milk powder that are being held in stores within the United Kingdom? Is the Foreign Secretary aware that I have a list of thousands of tonnes of such food? Will he use his influence to ensure that such food is sold at reduced prices in Britain and used for people in distressed areas? There are 2,000 tonnes of milk powder being held in one intervention store in the west midlands.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman correctly identifies one of the features of the common agricultural policy which must be reformed. It is being reformed as a result of the measures agreed by the Agriculture Council on 31 March this year. In regard to milk and butter production, total Community milk production is down by

3·4 per cent. this year, and butter production is down by 9·5 per cent. The reduction of present stocks and the problem of the creation of additional stocks are central objectives of the reform of the CAP, upon which the Community is now embarked

Mr. Marlow: While my right hon. and learned Friend is rightly concerned to keep public expenditure strictly under control at home, can he explain to the House and the country why the Government have put their name to this ramshackle vessel, which will founder at the first squall?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Because they take a totally different view from the somewhat eccentric one to which my hon. Friend has for so long been committed.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Foreign Secretary aware of the misgivings that many milk producers have that other EC countries may not be abiding totally by the quota agreement? Will he give the House an assurance that, if that is the case, we shall not screw our farmers down and suffer disproportionately as a result?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am aware of the anxiety that is rightly felt by the farming community in Britain in that respect. In four other countries already the production is currently less than the total quota which has been allocated to them. One country, Italy, does not yet appear to have taken steps to implement the super levy, and the Commission has instituted infraction proceedings against Italy. We attach importance to the discipline being enforced effectively across the board.

Mr. Budgen: If there is such widespeard and strong determination to enforce budgetary control, why has the payment of the super levy been postponed by all the nation states on so many occasions?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I suspect that, because of the way in which the market arrangements are going, the requirement for payment of the super levy has not yet arisen. The postponement to, I think, 14 December is being applied uniformly.

Mr. Robin Cook: Has the Foreign Secretary observed that the Strasbourg Assembly proposed the insertion, on the revenue side of next year's budget, of an expected revenue of 120,000 ecu from payments of the super levy, and that the Commission has since deleted that entry on the ground that it does not expect to receive payments? Does not that speak volumes for the confidence of the Commission in its own system for controlling agricultural expenditure?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If the system operates so as effectively to reduce the output on a substantial scale, that will, of course, have an effect on the likelihood of the super levy being paid on the scale on which it would otherwise be paid. I think that that must be the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

European Union

81. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about progress made towards achieving the objectives set out in the solemn declaration on European union made by the Heads of Government at the Stuttgart summit.

Mr. Rifkind: This work is being pursued in the two ad hoc committees set up at Fontainebleau last June. The Dublin European Council received interim reports from both committees and asked them to continue their work, and each submit a report in March for full discussion at the European Council in June next year.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend agree that his answer indicates a disappointing lack of progress so far? What steps do the Government intend to take to ensure that progress is made rather more quickly and effectively in the future?

Mr. Rifkind: The solemn declaration to which my hon. Friend's question refers calls for a review to be made not later than 1988. Based on the progress achieved by that date, a decision would be taken as to whether there should be a treaty on European union. Given that we are expecting a full discussion by European Heads of Government in June 1985, I cannot accept the implied criticism of my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that, irrespective of any proposal that may emanate from the Heads of Government working parties, both the Heads of Government meeting and, therefore, the meetings of their working parties are extra-treaty? If the results of the working parties are placed before the Council of Ministers, as the Minister has just mentioned, will that not be a new genesis of legislation in the Community? Hitherto, proposals for legislation have come only from the Commission. Therefore, will not the whole of the working parties' proposals, irrespective of their mertis, be extra-treaty and ultra vires?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not think that there is any reason why the European Council cannot discuss or commission work on any issues that it thinks are relevant. If it wished to implement any proposals that were recommended to it, and if the implementation of the proposals required treaty amendment, the hon. Gentleman can be assured that that would be done.

Mr. Forth: Will my right hon. Friend agree with me that in an enlarged Community, moving towards majority rule under agreements of this sort, the emphasis of policy-making and agricultural expeniture will shift inexorably to the south, and that that will cause a major reorientation of direction of Community policies and of expenditure, to our own detriment?

Mr. Rifkind: With regard to any decisions that may be taken by a majority, the Community has already reached agreement with the applicant countries as to what a new qualified majority will require. It will require a sum that is significantly different, as a consequence of enlargement, to take into account the larger Community that we shall then have.

Fontainebleau Agreement

82. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in implementing the Fontainebleau agreement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: A text implementing the Fontainebleau agreement on budget discipline was formally adopted at the Dublin European Council. The United Kingdom's 1983 refunds have been released and the bulk of the money has been paid. The Council has also reaffirmed its commitment that the United Kingdom's abatement for 1984 should be made on the revenue side of the budget in 1985, as agreed at Fontainebleau.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Secretary of State aware of the great concern in the House and beyond at the statement by the Economic Secretary to the Treasury in the debate last night, when he appeared to link the 1984 refund with the proposed increase in the Community's own resources and, even more worrying, with advancing that increase into 1985? Particularly because that increase in own resources has not been agreed by Parliament, can the Secretary of State give us a clear assurance that the United Kingdom refund and the abatement to implement that refund do not depend in any way on the agreement to increase the Community's own resources?

Sir Geofrey Howe: All those matters have been considered together over many months, and the 1985 draft budget as sent to the European Parliament was accompanied by a Council declaration stating that funds would be provided to meet the Community's inescapable financial obligations and the United Kingdom's 1984 abatement. Nine member states agreed that additional financing in 1985 should be made available to own resources, and it is our hope that the other country—Germany—will soon agree.

Mr. Dykes: Now that we are gradually getting used to working constructively with foreigners in the Community, would not my right hon. and learned Friend repeat the assertion that the commitment to majority rule that we encapsulated in our submission to the Fontainebleau conference is one of the best ways in which we and the other member states can begin to take the Community forward in some of the vital areas in the creation of a unified Community?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend that if the Community is to make the progress that we want towards effective unity of the market as a better opportunity for job creation in this country and throughout Europe it is important that the existing provisions for majority voting already in the treaty, to which we belong, should be put into action.

Mr. Hill: Is my right hon. and learned Friend saddened, as I am, by the fact that when we talk of Europe, we talk only of the EEC? Are there not other institutions in Europe, such as the Council of Europe and the Western European Union? Was not the French initiative at the Fontainebleau conference to reactivate the WEU one of the most important decisions made this year by any Head of State?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend that there are many European institutions beyond the European Community, and I know of his association with the WEU Assembly. As a matter of fact, these questions are related to EEC matters. However, I also agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of WEU. I think that he will know of the declaration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and myself at the Rome ministerial meeting of WEU that we regard the revitalisation and effective operation of WEU as a very important matter.

Dr. Owen: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that when considering the treaties and the possibility of an umbrella treaty it would not be inappropriate to look at the Community in terms of a two-stream Europe, at least on political co-operation, and that the seven countries which are signatories to the WEU treaty would be a natural grouping within the European Community to discuss that all-important element in political unity—security?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman raises wide-ranging questions. I would not readily subscribe to the idea of a two-stream Community, but I would subscribe to the idea that it is important for European countries to undertake effective discussion and consideration of security matters. I agree that the WEU, which comprises seven of the member states, is an appropriate place for that to take place. However, I would not want to regard that as exclusive or extinctive of political co-operation in the wider Community.

Common Market

83. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent steps have been taken to secure the practical establishment of a common market within the European Community.

Mr. Rifkind: In September an important package of standards for industrial products was agreed. In addition, there has been progress on a British initiative for standards for the interconnection of computer and communications equipment, and in similar work on telecommunications. The directive on frontier facilities will enter into force on 1 January.

Mr. Yeo: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his answer. Does he agree that the process of wealth creation in this country and throughout the EEC is far more likely to be assisted by the establishment of a free market in goods and services than by any form of expenditure under the EEC budget? Will my hon. Friend give an undertaking to give the highest priority at meetings with his EC colleagues to sweeping away the remaining obstacles to such a free market?

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom considers this to be the greatest priority at present. I am pleased to say that in one of the ad hoc institutions to which I referred earlier the United Kingdom put forward recommendations for the early implementation of an equal internal market. This has been unanimously endorsed by the committee as a whole.

Mr. James Lamond: Before the Minister gets carried away too far by the free internal market, will he tell us what steps are being taken to try to limit the damage that will be done to the British textile industry when Spain and Portugal join the Common Market?

Mr. Rifkind: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we are treating the industrial interests of the United Kingdom and of the existing members of the Community as an important priority. This covers a wide range of issues—not only textiles, but motor vehicles and a whole series of other matters which are important to the British economy.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Do the points of order directly relate to Question Time?

Sir John Farr: Mine is a point of order relating to questions.

Mr. Speaker: Very well. I shall take it.

Sir John Farr: My point of order relates to the format of Question Time today. Seventy-seven Foreign and Commonwealth questions were tabled, of which only 10 were reached, whereas six EEC questions were tabled, and in 20 minutes all six were reached. Mr. Speaker, I have drawn your attention to this anomaly on previous occasions, but it has been even more aggravated and exaggerated today. Once again may I ask you to pass on to the usual sources that the division of Foreign and Commonwealth and EEC Question Time is not equitable at the moment?

Mr. Winnick: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not farcical that, excluding EEC questions today and, in the main, brief supplementary questions, the fact is that we have dealt with only 10 questions? I do not believe that any further questions were linked with earlier questions. Is it not necessary to protect the House so that when there is the opportunity to ask questions on foreign affairs we have more than 40 minutes in which to do so? It is only by raising points of order that we can try to ensure that the time which should be ours is given and duly allocated. It is farcical that only 10 questions, or perhaps nine, were reached on foreign affairs, and that no more will be taken until the next round.

Mr. Norman Atkinson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not fictitious to ask what would happen to EC questions if foreign affairs questions took up all the time? Should not EEC questions take their chance along with all other foreign affairs questions that are addressed to the Foreign Office? If it is looked upon in that way and if you yourself, were to support the protests that have been made about only 35 minutes being spent on foreign affairs questions, I am told that the Procedure Committee would pay much more attention.

Mr. Hill: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest that it should be called, not EEC Question Time, but the European Institutions Question Time. There are frequently questions on other European institutions which override EEC matters.

Mr. Speaker: I share the worry about the shortness of time available for foreign affairs questions. It is a matter not for me, but for the usual channels, whether the Order Paper is broken up as it is today with, effectively, 35 minutes allotted for foreign affairs questions and 20 minutes for EC questions. That should be taken up through the usual channels.

I should tell the hon. Members who said that we had got through only 10 questions today that although Ministers do not always link questions, I seek to give preference to hon. Members who have subsequent questions on the Order Paper. I see from the indications that I have put on my Order Paper today that no fewer than 10 hon. Members who had tabled subsequent questions were called during the questions that were answered.

Entry Certificates

3.34 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for raising a point of order that I have raised over the last three days—the proposal of the Foreign Office to introduce a charge for entry certificates I felt that it might be helpful to raise this point of order since Foreign Office Ministers are in the Chamber. As I have explained over the last three days, the advice I have received has been contradictory and has varied over the last three days.

I am now advised that the Foreign Office proposes to secure a Privy Council order on Tuesday to implement charges for entry certificates, which is a matter of considerable anxiety to Commonwealth citizens and their families. I understand that the order is not subject to any parliamentary proceedings, but will be available for scrutiny by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments which, conveniently, meets next on Tuesday.

The proposal is widely thought to be unlawful, because a right conferred by statute would be diminished if a charge were introduced for entry clearance certificates. It is also widely held that an appeal in the courts against payment of a charge would be successful. Therefore, I am desperately trying to avoid the Foreign Office and Parliament being embarrassed.

Could you, Mr. Speaker, make representations to ensure that whatever procedure the Foreign Office pursues in this matter will be subject to parliamentary proceedings and will enable my colleagues who are very worried about the matter to have an opportunity to debate the issue before implementation of the proposal, which I understand is scheduled for 1 January?

I should also be grateful if we could be given advice by the Leader of the House or the Foreign Secretary about what procedures will be pursued and an assurance that whatever procedure is used will give us all an opportunity to debate the matter before a charge is introduced.

Mr. Speaker: I undertook to look into the matter and I am still doing so. In relation to what the hon. Gentleman has just said, I presume that the statutory instrument will be scrutinised by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. The Leader of the House will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said. Patently, it is not a matter for me, but I fully accept that it is an important subject on which hon. Members hold strong views.

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

3.36 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the Welsh rate support grant settlement for 1985-86.

I am today announcing to the Welsh consultative council on local government finance the details of the 1985-86 rate support grant settlement. Copies of the text of my statement to the consultative council, together with a number of key statistical tables, have been placed in the Library of the House. The rate support grant report has been laid before the House today and will be debated in the usual way. A copy of the report has also been placed in the Library. I will be announcing my decisions on the related capital expenditure issues in the near future.

The main features of the 1985-86 rate support grant settlement confirm the intentions that I announced in July. The total of relevant expenditure provision accepted for grants is £1,514·1 million. This comprises £1,309 million for current expenditure and £205·1 million for non-current items. Current expenditure provision—after allowing for the abolition of national insurance surcharge from next April and the greater role of the Manpower Services Commission in funding certain areas of further education — is £46 million or 3·6 per cent. more than the expenditure underlying local authority budgets in 1984-85, while the total of relevant expenditure is about 5 per cent. more than the comparable budgeted total for the present year.

Aggregate Exchequer grant will be £1,014·2 million comprising £149 million for specific grants, £26·5 million for transport supplementary grant, £2 million for national parks supplementary grant and £836·7 million for the rate support grants. Domestic rate relief is unchanged at 18·5p in the pound which costs £25·5 million, leaving £811·2 million as block grant. After deducting £600,000 for payments to specified bodies, the amount available for distribution to local authorities is £810·6 million.

The aggregate Exchequer grant of £1,014·2 million is £18·2 million or 1·8 per cent. more than the aggregate Exchequer grant provision in the main rate support grant settlement for the current year. Far more important for rating purposes, however, it is almost £50 million or 5 per cent. higher than the amount that authorities have included in their budgets for the present year, after allowing for the expenditure changes to which I have already referred. It represents 67 per cent. of relevant expenditure.

I believe that the settlement is very fair, and the consultative council has acknowledged that it represents an improvement on last year. That this is so owes much to the restraint which has been exercised by a majority of Welsh local authorities. Unfortunately, however, a small minority of authorities persist in spending in excess of their targets. I confirm, therefore, that I am setting targets for 1985-86 and grant penalties for exceeding those targets. I have retained the same basic system for determining next year's expenditure targets as that used in the present year but increased the weighting given to the grant related expenditure component.

The targets may require local authorities to make difficult choices in determining their spending priorities, but I believe that the targets are achievable by all authorities. Every authority's target gives a cash increase in its current expenditure. The minimum increase is 2 per cent. and the maximum 4 per cent., after making allowance for the national insurance surcharge and further education changes. In addition, for authorities spending at or below target in 1984-85 I have added 0·5 per cent. to their current expenditure total. Thus the maximum current expenditure increase for such authorities is 4·5 per cent. in line with the projected rate of inflation for the economy as a whole. In aggregate, the targets that I am announcing today are £7·6 million higher than the provisional sum notified to authorities in the summer. The increase largely reflects the use of fixed interest rates and a slightly lower assumption for council house rents.

The grant withholding penalty for local authorities spending in excess of targets has been strengthened. The amount of grant withheld for excess expenditure up to 1 per cent. above target is 100 per cent. of that excess, but above that level the rate of holdback increases to a maximum rate of 150 per cent. for authorities spending 2 per cent. or more above target. This compares with a maximum of 90 per cent. in the current year, reached at 5 per cent. spending above target. I am retaining the arrangements under which any authority spending at or below target is exempted from both grant holdback and the close-ending adjustment. The incentive for local authorities with low rateable resources to achieve their targets has, in the past, been considerably reduced because I placed a limit on grant holdback for such authorities. This year, therefore, I am reducing that limitation by 50 per cent.

Block grant will be distributed in accordance with the formulae agreed by the Welsh local authority associations. I have decided to retain the existing block grant mechanisms which determine the distribution of block grant and the same safety net for limiting grant losses associated with changes in GRE—a maximum 4p loss at county level and 1p at district level.

One innovation that I am introducing this year is a forward indication of targets for 1986-87 and 1987-88. This will assist local authorities in their planning. I must emphasise, however, that these are indeed indications and that circumstances in which the Government have to review them cannot be ruled out. Whether those indicative targets will need to be transformed into formal guidance figures depends to a very large extent on authorities' performance next year. I have told the consultative council that if budget returns show that authorities, individually and collectively, are on course to spend in line with the Government's plans for 1985-86 I am prepared to examine with the associations whether an alternative means of containing expenditure and encouraging moderate rate increases is possible for future years.

As I said earlier, the settlement provides for an increase in both grant and relevant expenditure of about 5 per cent. more than authorities have included in their budgets for the present year, after allowing for certain expenditure changes. That is why, in a period of expenditure restraint, I regard the settlement as very fair. It is now up to the local authorities in Wales to respond sensibly and with restraint, and I believe they will. Given this and continued vigilance against spending excesses and manpower increases, it should be within their power to maintain satisfactory levels of service in key areas while keeping rate increases on average to levels comparable with inflation.

I commend my proposals for the 1985-86 Welsh rate support grant settlement to the House.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The right hon. Gentleman still operates a harsh system. Does he understand that the minuscule easing of the target figures and the prospect of forward indications of targets are welcome, although they are but small crumbs from his table? Has not block grant in real terms been cut—according to the calculation of the Association of District Councils by about £30 million?

Whatever future tinkering the right hon. Gentleman may propose, is not the penalty regime very much more severe than 1984-85? Beyond a 2 per cent. overspend, the rate of grant lost levels out at one and a half times the amount of excess spending. Is that not extremely harsh? in fact, will not the amount of grant to be taken away from Wales altogether and returned to the Treasury inevitably exceed the total overspending by Welsh local authorities, even though the overall excess over target is very small? Could not this be seen as a Welsh ratepayers' contribution to the Treasury?

On rate increases, is it not realistic to suggest that some authorities will not succeed in getting within their targets and that the average rate figures will go up more like 8 or 9 per cent. because of the severity of the penalty regime and the overall cut in aggregate Exchequer grant?

Is not the right hon. Gentleman being very coy indeed about expressing clearly a view on the effect of this statement on the standard and depth of local government services? Is he not aware that he is placing local authorities under intolerable pressures? Does he know that a typical Welsh district might have to make real savings of up to £250,000 to achieve a district rate increase in line with inflation? What will the right hon. Gentleman do to reduce the volatility in the Welsh rate support system as it affects the Welsh districts? I am informed that there will be differences in targets set of up to 30 per cent.—arguably from a 19 per cent. increase to a 10 per cent. decrease. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that there are also differences in grant-related expenditure of up to 19 per cent.

If authorities in aggregate manage to get down to the overall targets, will that not be a serious cost to the services provided to our beleagured communities? I have in mind the quality of maintenance on roads and buildings, the quality of administration, the closure of libraries, the increase in the price of school meals, the decline in the number of policemen and teachers and the decline in Welsh housing and industrial development.

Penalties have again been increased, the ratepayers' contribution has again increased while central Government's contribution has decreased, and aggregate Exchequer grant has again been cut. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that he has put Welsh local authorities at very great disadvantage with his tightening of the financial screws? Under the right hon. Gentleman we have lost our democratic local government freedoms. We have lost 100,000 manufacturing jobs. One Welshman in five is out of work. The settlement will become known as a guarantee of social distress.

Mr. Edwards: Last year we heard from the hon. Gentleman the usual forecast of rate increases. He said that they would be well over 10 per cent. In fact, the average increase was about 8 per cent. Once again, this year, the hon. Gentleman has pitched the average a good deal higher than the inflation rate that I forecast. Once again, we shall wait and see the result.

The hon. Gentleman says that this is a harsh system. However, there are increases in relevant expenditure and in grant of 5 per cent. more than budgeted expenditure in the current year, which is more than the inflation rate. No one can say that that represents a harsh regime.

The hon. Gentleman referred to block grant cuts. It is true that since 1981-82 aggregate grant has grown by only 19 per cent. while there has been inflation of 22 per cent. Over that period, in cost terms, there was a fall of 3 per cent. which had to be borne by the local authorities. Over such a period, however, no one could describe that as a savage round of cuts.

The hon. Gentleman says that penalties are severe if targets are not met. However, all the evidence that I have suggests that the majority of authorities—certainly the majority of the counties—will meet their targets or come very close to meeting them. I have been able to tell Mid Glamorgan, for example, that, its final target being £1 million higher than the figure suggested in the summer, it is now within an almost minuscule percentage point of its target. Mid Glamorgan, too, should be able to meet its target.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the volatility of targets for districts. That volatility arises almost completely because of the rate fund contribution to housing revenue account. Districts decide either not to put up rents by as much as other districts, or to increase maintenance by much more than the average amount.

We all agree that targets are not an ideal system. I have made it clear to the local authorities and to the House that if we continue the progress made so far towards meeting the Government's objectives, I hope that we may move away altogether from the target system. We are on the road to achieving that result.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman painted the usual picture of the severity of effects on services. He cited some examples. I have before me figures for the expenditure of Welsh local authorities on education over the past seven or eight years. In terms adjusted for price and wage increases, we are spending more than, or almost exactly the same amount as, we spent seven or eight years ago. At the same time, there has been a fall of nearly 12 per cent. in the number of pupils. There has been no savage cut in that area, and it is a gross exaggeration to pretend that there has been.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall do my utmost to call all those hon. Members who wish to put a question. I ask hon. Members to make their questions succinct and brief. This matter will be the subject of an order later, and it will be debatable. This will be not a day for long speeches.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is general admiration for the way in which he manages to walk a very slack tightrope? The tightrope is slack because it lacks the necessary tension which would arise if local authorities were compelled to raise the money that they spend.

In that position, however, my right hon. Friend is vulnerable to cross-breezes. Is he aware that while there is still a determination that all waste should be cut out, there is also increasing anxiety lest essential services should start to suffer from a further increase in economies?

Mr. Edwards: I do not think that, when we are offering local authorities the ability to increase expenditure by slightly more than the rate of inflation without imposing severe rate burdens on them, there is any need for the type of suffering that my hon. Friend suggests might occur.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Does not the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that one of the heaviest burdens that most local authorities in Wales have to bear, some more severely than others, is that imposed by heavy, mass and persistent unemployment? Should there not be, under this settlement, some form of arrangement by which the scale of unemployment is taken into account? Might not the settlement take into account, for example, expenditure that must be made to maintain skillcentres which the Government and others are not willing to assist us to maintain? Should not the right hon. Gentleman have have come to the House to say, among other things that in the rate support grant he will try to do something to rescue us from the cuts that he is imposing in other spheres, such as massive cuts in regional aid for Wales?

Mr. Edwards: Some of the matters to which the right hon. Gentleman refers are taken into account in the GRE assessment. I note that the target of the right hon. Gentleman's Blaenau Gwent authority is well above the estimated inflation rate. In terms of the targets per head which have been set for English and Welsh counties, all of the eight Welsh counties are in the top 11 for England and Wales. That suggests that they are getting treatment which compares favourably with comparable authorities which face comparable difficulties elsewhere.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Does the Secretary of State intend to produce a simple guide to his statement and the documents that accompany it so that the people of Wales can understand the Government's meanness? Does he agree that a consequence of his statement, even in a well-managed and law-abiding county such as Powys, will be a decline in education provision, which has already led to the closure of a remedial education unit in Newtown, the closure of a special unit for teaching travellers' children in Welshpool and the closure of one-third of the school meals service in Powys? That is leading day by day to a decline in education standards about which head teachers are not being consulted properly because it is happening so suddenly?

Mr. Edwards: The simple way in which to put it, so that people can understand it, is to say that the grant provision is 5 per cent. higher than the amount which authorities have included in their budgets for the present year, which is above the anticipated rate of inflation, that Powys has a budget-to-target increase of 4·68 per cent., which is above the rate of inflation, that since 1981-82, Powy's spending has grown more than the general rate of inflation, and that I understand that that authority has resolved to meet its target. How it does that is for it to decide.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Is my right hon. Friend aware that three elements of his statement will be especially welcomed? The first is that we can see an end to targets, which none of us like. The second is the 5 per cent. bonus to local authorities — it can fairly be described as such. The third is the courageous attitude that he has now taken towards forward-planning, thus giving local authorities an opportunity of greater stability when planning. That is especially important in regard to stability of interest rates in supplementary reports. He is also giving indicative targets for the next three years—something that no previous Government have had the courage to do.

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that it is helpful to let local authorities plan. If they continue to co-operate as they have in the past, we could abolish targets. That would benefit everyone. Since 1979-80, Welsh local authorities' current expenditure has increased by 2 per cent. more than the increase in costs. Our aim is that, by 1987-88, current expenditure should be no higher in cost terms than in 1979-80. I do not believe that anyone can say that that is a severe regime. Against that background, it is absurd and a distortion of the truth to talk of slashing cuts in services.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I appreciate your request, Mr. Speaker, for hon. Members to be brief, but as we have received a document of 85 pages and a statement of 15 pages about rate support grants in Wales, I have many questions to ask. The Secretary of State continually comes to the House with statements and prophesies further doom and gloom for Wales. Last week there was a £60 million cut from our regional aid, and today his statement is about a further reduction in grant in real terms to local authorities. Will he state how many local authorities will receive less grant aid in real terms next year than they received this year?

Page 5, paragraph 8, of the statement gives a figure of £46 million, which is 3·6 per cent. higher than that included in local authorities' budgets for 1984-85. The Secretary of State claims that that is within the 4·5 per cent. increase in costs projected for the economy as a whole. Will adjustments be made to allow for a further inflationary increase? Will he state the total reduction in grant aid to local authorities since he was appointed to office in 1979? Is the Government's message the same as before——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is to be a debate on this subject. The hon. Member is making now the speech that he might well make on that occasion, if he were to catch my eye. In fairness to the House, there is another statement to follow this statement and a long day and night Committee sitting. He should confine himself to one question.

Mr. Powell: I promise that I shall not delay the House tonight because I shall not wish to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, but this issue is so important to the ratepayers of Ogwr that I wish to ask the last part of my question. Does the Secretary of State expect ratepayers yet again to pay more for fewer services? How many jobs will be lost as a result of his statement? What services will suffer? Will they include the care for the elderly, our schools, the fire brigade and social services?

Mr. Edwards: I have given the hon. Gentleman the overall figures and I circulated to every Welsh Member the detailed schedule, which sets out the position for each local authority in Wales. It would be unreasonable to detain the House by giving the detailed answers that the hon. Gentleman requires. Ogwr has a target increase which is above the anticipated rate of inflation. For the reasons I have given, I see no reason to anticipate the slashing cuts in services, about which the hon. Gentleman loves to talk.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that this extremely fair settlement will not harm the educational prospects of pupils in Clwyd? Does he agree that the maintenance of a high standard of education depends on the county council at last getting its priorities right and concentrating on its statutory obligations?

Mr. Edwards: I see no reason why there should be a great sacrifice by the education service in Clwyd. It is remarkable that the resources available and being spent on education in Clwyd, adjusted for cost and price increases, are substantially more than they where when we first had a separate Welsh rate support grant settlement. Indeed, it is about £10 million a year more than when the Labour Government made its slashing cuts in expenditure in 1977-78. There are more than 11 per cent. fewer pupils in the schools, and the pupil-teacher ratio in Clwyd is at its best ever.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the Secretary of State confirm that there has been no broad change in the definition of grant-related expenditure, and that it is broadly an assessment of the cost to a local authority of providing a standard of service comparable to other local authorities? If that is the case, why has Gwynedd this year once again a GRE of £97·2 million, but a target of only £94·4 million, which is £2·5 million less than the Government recognise as necessary to maintain the services?

Mr. Edwards: As the hon. Gentleman has had explained to him often before, targets are related not only to GRE but to previous expenditure patterns and to the pattern of expenditure that the local authority actually thought was right for the people in its area. He can hardly complain now and demand that the local authority should achieve the exact theoretical pattern of expenditure that creates GRE.

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): Is my right hon. Friend aware that yesterday his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment promised to send a "child's guide" to the rate support grant system to a number of hon. Members. Will he please send one to me? I am sure that I am not alone in being confused this afternoon. Will the Secretary of State say what effect his announcement will have on the city of Cardiff and the county of south Glamorgan?

Mr. Edwards: I sympathise with my hon. Friend about the complexity of these issues. South Glamorgan has a target increase above its budget of 5·19 per cent., which is well above the rate of inflation. I do not anticipate that it will have any difficulty in meeting its target. Since 1981-82 its current expenditure has grown a good deal more than the general increase in inflation and it has been a relatively low spender. I would think therefore, that it would have no difficulty in maintaining services and a low rate increase in the current year.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The Secretary of State will recall that we used to have a high domestic rate relief, partly because of our high water rates. He halved that domestic rate relief. As we are now likely to have higher water rates, will he increase the domestic rate relief?

Mr. Edwards: No, I shall not. I halved the domestic rate relief because I believed that it was currently a priority to give the maximum assistance to industry and to job creation. The change has been of great benefit to industry, and will help in our common objective of reducing unemployment. I am surprised, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman should suggest that we should go back on that move.

Mr. Tom Hooson (Brecon and Radnor): My right hon. Friend has done well in limiting himself to grant withholding as a method of discipline with the various local authorities. I note that among the counties the safety net needs to be applied only to Powys. Has not the time come to reopen the GRE need indicator, not only in relation to rural sparsity but at the opposite end of the scale, that is, where there is a high density of population?

Mr. Edwards: We have had this debate over a long period. We keep looking at the GREs of the local authority association. I would have thought that my hon. Friend would be glad that the limiter was used in that case and that we took account of the special problems of his county.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): The right hon. Gentleman said twice when he introduced his statement that he believed that it was a fair statement. Does he recall saying the same thing last year? Why is west Glamorgan county having to reconsider having nurses in comprehensive schools, cutting the meals service and doing away with music and swimming tuition? What does his statement offer west Glamorgan? How will it affect the decisions that the county may have to make?

Mr. Edwards: I pay tribute to west Glamorgan, which has made a considerable effort to get within target. It started as a very high spender, relative to the GREs, which my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Hooson) urged should be the basis on which we should proceed. We have allowed west Glamorgan a considerable period to adjust its expenditure from those high levels. It could meet its target, probably for the first time, on the basis of plans which it is now considering. I hope that it will do so, and that all Welsh counties will be able to meet their targets.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that in an ideal world it would be marvellous to have an unlimited amount of money to spend? But in reality where is the money to come from? We could print or borrow more money, which would cause higher inflation, higher interest rates and perhaps higher unemployment.

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that it must be a priority to keep down interest rates and domestic and industrial rates. The rate burden on industry has a considerable effect on jobs. I do not apologise for introducing a settlement that will help to keep down the general level of rates, as it has in recent years, to at or below the inflation rate.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): So that Mid-Glamorgan authority nearly reaches its target, will the Secretary of State estimate how many fewer teachers, home-help hours and school books there will be in the county?

Mr. Edwards: Adjusted for price and wage increases, personal and social service expenditure by Welsh local authorities has increased under this Government, and expenditure on education has been maintained, although Wales has nearly 12 per cent. fewer pupils. The reduction in teachers in no way matches the reduction in pupils. It is absurd for the hon. Gentleman to argue that there should not be some adjustment at a time of falling school rolls.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that his statement will be welcomed in Cardiff, although some of my constituents might prefer the loonier councils in Wales to be swept away by an extension of the reform of local government that we shall debate later today? Does he accept that his statement will concentrate the minds of our local councillors and will force them to return to what they should do rather than to waste taxpayers' and ratepayers' money on items such as CND weeks and reality-free zones?

Mr. Edwards: Local authorities should consider carefully their expenditure priorities at a time when it is clearly important that they should hold down the rate burden.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): The Secretary of State talks about industrial rates and the need to keep them down to attract industrialists to the valleys and communities of south Wales. Does he accept that a major criterion used by industrialists in coming to Wales is that there is a reasonable social infrastructure for them to move into, and that the continual cut in resources for Wales is a disincentive to industry to invest there?

Mr. Edwards: It is not a continual cut in resources for Wales. There is an increase above the expected rate of inflation in relevant expenditure and in aggregate grant. The target for the Rhondda is well above the expected rate of inflation. As the hon. Gentleman was informed in the Welsh Grand Committee only today, we are launching a major new road scheme for the improvement of his constituency.

Mr. Peter Hubbard-Miles (Bridgend): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Mid-Glamorgan county council decided recently to take £3 million from capital reserves rather than to make the necessary economies in this year's budget, which will result in a shortfall next year of £6 million? That decision was taken against the advice of the treasurer and the leader of the Labour group, who put his proposals to the Labour group but who was defeated by 31 votes to 19, although he remains the leader.

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the dangers inherent in putting off difficult decisions. Mid-Glamorgan's spending has increased by 4·1 per cent. more than inflation since 1981-82, and there is a danger that if it does not make the necessary changes it will store up difficulties for itself.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): If the Secretary of State believes, as he said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), that the infrastructure is adequate, does he expect to attract more Japanese companies to Cynon Valley? If he does, will he assure us that those companies will not require workers to retire at the age of 35?

Mr. Edwards: I am not sure that the hon. Lady's latter point arises from this statement. I welcome Japanese investment, but the policy statement issued by that company was not one of the finest examples of Japanese management techniques.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): In the light of what the Secretary of State called his generous statement, may we look forward to headmasters in his constituency and mine — they are adjacent — giving up the idea of demanding £5 from hard-pressed parents to pay for inadequate school resources?

Mr. Edwards: It is about time that Dyfed authority got down to the job of considering the details of its budgeting and what has been happening with its financial arrangements, because it is hard to see why it is confronted with such difficulties. Its target increase is above the inflation rate, yet it is on course to exceed that target by £1 million. Instead of encouraging schoolmasters to campaign, the authority should have a thorough and proper re-examination of its finances.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Does the Secretary of State appreciate that the message that will go to Wales following the statement is that there will be a further reduction in resources to Welsh local authorities, and that the penalties for the authorities which cannot comply with the Government's guidelines will be even harsher? Does he further understand that, as the total money available to local authorities decreases, an increasing percentage of cuts will be made in the provision of statutory services? That means that less money will be available for discretionary measures, which either improve the quality of life or are employment-related schemes. Does the Secretary of State agree that the statement will lead to a diminution in the quality of life, especially in the valleys of south Wales, and to an increase in unemployment?

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that strange messages will go out from hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), who are more anxious to make political points than they are concerned with reality. The 80 per cent. block grant has hardly altered since we first made a separate Welsh rate support grant settlement, and the suggestion that hunks of discretion will be removed from Welsh local government is not true.

Mr. John Watson (Skipton and Ripon): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I do not represent a Welsh constituency, but that I represent the rest of Britain, which must foot the bill?

Hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. An hon. Member who represents an English constituency has the right to participate in Welsh debates. We shall all be interested to learn how the hon. Gentleman can relate Skipton and Ripon to this statement.

Mr. Watson: Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what proportion of local authority spending in Wales will be covered by the rate support grant that he announced this afternoon, and how that proportion will relate to most constituencies in the rest of the United Kingdom, including Skipton and Ripon?

Mr. Edwards: The rate support grant proportion of 67 per cent. is based on completely different rateable values in Wales than in England. The real difference, which accounts for the settlement today being somewhat easier than the settlement in England, is that the Welsh local authorities have made a considerable effort to achieve the expenditure targets set by the Government. They have come close to doing so, while the minority of high-spending authorities in England have failed to do so, have enormously overspent on the Government's targets, and are still paying the price for that overspending.

Agriculture Council

4.19 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers in Brussels on 10 and 11 December, where, with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I represented the United Kingdom. Much of the meeting was taken up with further discussion of the new structures package. No agreement was possible on the basis of a compromise from the presidency. I emphasised the need for consistency between the costs of the structures measures and a decision, which has still to be taken, on the finance available for guidance expenditure over the next few years.

On the milk supplementary levy, the Commissioner said the that Commission was determined to ensure that the system was applied according to the rules in all member states, and that they would withhold funds for financing the dairy sector where the rules were not being observed. With most other Ministers, I emphasised the importance of proper and uniform application of the rules in all member states. Nine member states, with Denmark abstaining, adopted a statement noting that there are still technical and administrative difficulties concerning the application of the system in certain member states, and inviting the Commission to allow postponement of the first payment until the end of the marketing year. The Commission is expected to consider this matter at its meeting today.

During the discussion, I emphasised again the urgent need for the Commission to come forward with proposals to allow more flexibility between the dairy and direct sales quotas.

I raised again the issue of the price of natural gas for Dutch horticulturists, on which the Commission has instituted legal proceedings under the treaty. I urged the Commission, pending the outcome, to require suspension of the aid. The Commissioner said that the Dutch had already been asked to suspend the aid complained of. The question of recovery would be considered when the case was decided.

I also pressed the Commission on the French beef aid. The Commissioner confirmed that the French Government had notified this aid in accordance with the treaty, following the refusal of the Council at its last meeting to endorse the payments. The Commissioner confirmed that meanwhile no payments should be made.

In discussion on changes in detailed provisions on sparking wine, I refused to withdraw my opposition until I had received assurances that illegal procedures applied to United Kingdom whisky imports into Italy would be discontinued. I am happy to report that, after consulting Rome, the Italian Minister gave fully satisfactory assurances both that import procedures applied in future would allow imports at the lower rate of duty and that the excess duty charged would be refunded as quickly as possible.

In the veterinary sector, the Council reached agreement in principle on a proposal on charging for red meat and poultrymeat inspection. We have explained the need for the Community to reach early agreement on the harmonisation of inspection standards under the poultry meat hygiene directive. This made it possible to adopt the other outstanding issues in the veterinary package otherwise agreed at the June Council. These include satisfactory trading arrangements to protect the United Kingdom, including Northern Ireland, and the Republic of Ireland and Denmark against foot and mouth disease.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for making that statement, but he will not be surprised to hear that it has raised more questions than it has answered. For example, concerning the last paragraph of his statement, will he confirm that the previous agreement makes it possible for an import charge to be made to cover the costs of inspection of New Zealand lamb? If so, what is likely to be the extent of that charge? The poultry industry in Britain will be fairly unhappy at a decision that again harmonises charges in advance of the harmonisation of standards, which means that our more rigorous standards will feed through into higher costs in the shops.

There are a few shorter points to be made. For example, France seems to be still adamant about beef aids. I hope that the Minister will be equally tough if any question is raised about continuing our variable beef premium.

The wine lake was discussed at the Council of Ministers. What does the agreement amount to? Does it mean a genuine agreement to effect a genuine cut in wine production or is it, as one fears, a potential cosmetic fiddle which will put money into the pockets of people who remain in the industry?

What will be the effect of the Finance Ministers' demand to be consulted before any structures agreement arrived at by the Agriculture Ministers is agreed? Will that happen and has it been agreed that it will happen? Will the Minister confirm that, as the structures agreement affects only 4 per cent. of the agricultural budget, it will be a minuscule control on the profligate agriculture budget of the EEC?

Did the Minister—I suppose from his statement that he did not—and his fellow Agriculture Ministers discuss the increasingly important question of mounting cereal surpluses, which will be greatly augmented by this year's monster harvest? Did they consider the likely effect of the United States 1985 Farm Bill, which is likely to add some £900 million to the cost of EEC cereal export subsidies? If Ministers have not yet discussed that, I recommend that they do so, so that they can avoid the sort of haste, panic and muddle that has characterised the dairy quotas scheme.

The main part of the statement relates to the decision to ask the Commission to postpone the super-levy until March. The Minister rightly said that the Commission is meeting today. Has he heard what results have been arrived at? Is it likely that the Commission will agree to a request for postponement, and if not, what will happen? What will happen to the Northern Ireland dairy industry as a result of the withholding of the first £60 million by the Commission, for example? The Minister will know that the dairy industry in the United Kingdom is in complete confusion. Does he accept that, at the very least, this further decision will prolong its anxiety?

This decision — coupled with the failure of two countries even to try to implement the scheme, and the fact that on the latest figures, five countries are over their quotas of production—will lead many people to doubt whether the milk quota scheme will ever be properly implemented. On top of that, there is a threat by the Commission that it will direct imports of fresh milk into this country. Is it any wonder that the dairy industry is confused and has lost faith in the Government, who launched into the scheme without anticipating any of the problems, however simple? Are we not in danger of being the only ones in the Common Market who are in step?

[Mr. Brynmor John]

Can the Minister confirm that our inability even to fulfil our quota will not penalise us in the future, and will he use the present gap to try to obtain a more sensible scheme? The Select Committee has already criticised the over-hasty British scheme. Our dairy farmers, who have already made the sacrifice, will properly demand a fair deal and fair implementation throughout the Community. Will the right hon. Gentleman stake his reputation on getting that?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has asked a great many questions, which I shall try to answer. His first question was on the veterinary measures that I announced. The package provides for a charge on imports of meat from third countries to cover the costs of the limited inspection that is carried out. There has been provision for such a charge since 1972, although it has not been levied. The charge will not be implemented immediately. Charges have to be fixed by January 1986, so there will be further discussions on the implementing arrangements next year. New Zealand has known about this all along. It has not made representations to my Department. Domestic slaughterhouses are already subject to meat inspection charges.

The hon. Gentleman asked about beef, and in particular about the beef variable premium scheme. As he knows, this is something for which we fought, and, with great difficulty, we succeeded in keeping it within the package agreed at the last price review. There is no doubt that it will be one of the closely argued issues at the next price review. I see no reason to change the present arrangements, but the hon. Gentleman and the House will understand that the scheme has no friends in any other country in the Community. We did not enter into a detailed discussion of the wine situation following the agreements that were recently reached in Dublin.

The hon. Gentleman then asked me a question about the financial implications of the structures proposals. As I understand it, the arrangement is that the matter will be discussed at ECOFIN — the Council of Ministers (Economic and Finance)—when it meets to consider what the financial ceilings should be in relation to the structures directives.

The hon. Gentleman rightly said that the cereal surpluses are a crucial factor in the CAP. However, that subject was not on the agenda this time. Nevertheless, the cereal position was the subject of a good deal of discussion between Ministers in the margins of the Council. The hon. Gentleman also asked me about the United States Farm Bill, and I am hoping to meet Secretary Block within the hour to discuss that. He will also discuss that point with the Commission in Brussels before the end of the week.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about the Commission's decisions on milk. It is considering the requests for a general delay at its meeting today. First reports are that it has decided to make no changes to the regulations, but there has not yet been any formal response to the Council's request. Thus, I cannot anticipate what the situation will be until we receive a formal response from the Commission to the request from the Council.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): My right hon. Friend said that he had drawn the Commission's attention to the need for flexibility as between direct sales and dairy sales quotas. Is he making any progress on that, and when are we likely to hear that such flexibility has been achieved?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will have heard me say before that this issue involves the clearest case of unsatisfactory rules within the present milk levy arrangements. I think that I have raised this matter at every meeting of the Agriculture Council since June, but regrettably so far to no effect. One difficulty in recent weeks is that we have had a lame duck Commission, as the Commissioner and many members will not continue in office after the end of the year. However, I assure my hon. Friend that I shall continue vigorously to press that important point.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): Can the Minister confirm that there is only the remotest and faintest possibility this year of any levy being raised on the dairy farmers of England, Scotland and Wales? Can he also confirm that if it is to be raised, it will probably be raised by so little that there will be no logic in discouraging any dairy farmer in Britain from producing milk between now and next April? Were liquid milk imports discussed? If so, what is the present position?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will have seen the most recent figures, which show that when the period between April and October 1984 is compared with the same period for 1983, it is clear that the United Kingdom's milk production fell by 8·7 per cent. As he will know, that fall was largely assisted by the drought. I think that farmers have had sufficient information from various sources to show that it would be possible to produce more milk in the remainder of the year than in the first part of it and still not have a levy commitment at the end of it.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about imports of liquid milk, but that subject was not discussed in the Council of Ministers. However, he may have read in the press that our present arrangements have recently been questioned by the Commission. We are considering the situation and will decide, in due course, what response to make.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon, West): Yes, but will the Minister put down a real marker next time he discusses milk imports in the Community? If they were imposed in addition to the problem of quotas, it would mean a very serious blow for British dairy farmers. Will he make it quite clear that we are not prepared to allow such milk to be imported until the health problem, including that of foot and mouth disease, has been cleared up, together with the whole problem of nationally subsidised production and the freedom of our producers to export their products to the Community? At present, that is not the case with sheep.

Mr. Jopling: I endorse much of what my hon. Friend has said and am grateful to him for saying it. He is right to home in on the public health problems, which are central to milk importation.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Is the Minister telling us that the central issue at present—the cereals surplus—was discussed only on the margins, when we are witnessing the biggest emergency and famine that the world has faced for many years? What is the present estimate of the cereal surplus and how much will it cost? Will he repudiate the statement of the Tory chairman of the Tory group of Members of the European Parliament that they should sell that surplus, rather than giving it, in order to help solve the problems of Ethiopia?

Mr. Jopling: I had better not get into the business of repudiating, or not, any Member of the European Parliament. I have enough on my plate dealing with the comments of hon. Members. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not aware of a question that I answered earlier about the last Council, where we discussed in depth the problems of world famine and the cereal situation. But on this occasion we had a particularly heavy agenda. Of course, the whole subject of cereals will come up in the course of the discussions on the price fixing for 1985, which we shall no doubt start early in the new year.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Has the Agriculture Council considered the likely effect of enlargement on the Community and on agricultural policies, in that the shift in balance and political influence in the Community will put much greater pressure on the northern countries and their products because it will put greater emphasis on Mediterranean so-called products and prices? Is my right hon. Friend concerned about that? Is the Council doing anything about it?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will remember that responsibility for dealing with the problems of enlargement lies mainly with the Foreign Office. But of course the Council of Agriculture Ministers has given a good deal of thought to the problems of Mediterranean products within the Community. As one who, like my hon. Friend, attends the Fisheries Council, I should add that fisheries represents another important area where Spanish fishing, in particular, could have great effects on existing members of the Community.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Which states have difficulties in applying their rules over the milk supplementary levy? Is it true that some of those states now believe that the milk quota system is impractical, given the conditions that they face? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that a United Kingdom quota on milk is just a United Kingdom quota, and that no supplementary levy will be paid by the United Kingdom unless other states follow the rules and until the United Kingdom quota is exceeded?

Mr. Jopling: No doubt the hon. Gentleman will have seen statements that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have made in the past about the payment of levies. As a farmer, he will be aware that, because we have opted for formula B, these matters are based on the various milk marketing boards within the United Kingdom. Therefore, it is a fact that for the first six months of the milk year, a levy is due from Northern Ireland. However, the hon. Gentleman may like to know that milk production is down in most member states, including Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and the United Kingdom, and that from April to September milk deliveries in the Community were down on the same period last year by 1·7 million tonnes.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Does not my right hon. Friend agree that it would be misleading to talk about cereal surpluses if the cereal substitutes allowed into the Community were eliminated?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend may recall that the matter of cereal substitutes — mainly maize gluten feed and citrus pellets—has caused a great deal of discussion in the Council of Ministers. The Council did not discuss it on this occasion, but we have always resisted limitations upon those importations. I have no doubt that when I meet Secretary Block within half an hour, that will form a major part of our discussions.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Just what are we going to do about the Dutch horticulturists with their subsidised Groningen gas? Does not the Minister understand that hon. Members from central Scotland who represent glasshouse owners know that they are becoming absolutely distraught because of the unfair competition? I understand from the Minister's statement that there are to be legal proceedings. Is it fair to say that the Dutch have cocked a snook at the Commission in the legal proceedings? Knowing the Amsterdam lawyers, may I ask the Minister whether there is any likelihood of their arriving at a conclusion before the mid-1990s, by which time many of the tomato growers we represent will be out of business and down the chute? What will the Minister do about it?

Mr. Jopling: I am not going to enter into an argument with the hon. Gentleman about whether Amsterdam lawyers are any more pernicious than Scottish or any other lawyers. That would be inappropriate. It is a matter of the hon. Gentleman to judge.

I have made it quite clear that our view is that the Commission should have acted more quickly and that we expect the Commission to pursue the matter in the European Court if the Dutch do not comply. We extracted from the Commission yesterday a statement that it has already asked the Dutch Government to desist from that practice. I took particular trouble at a meeting with Mr. Braks, the Netherlands Minister, on Monday morning to express my serious displeasure at the way the issue has developed.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Is it true that five countries are now eligible to pay super-levy? Will my right hon. Friend explain why the payment was postponed if it is true that there is a general, serious and widespread political desire throughout the Community to restrain agricultural expenditure?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend has not counted very well. As I understand the matter, the Commission's view is that seven countries are due to pay levy. Some have collected it, some have said they will pay and there are disputes with other countries. The crucial aspect of the operation is to ensure a uniform attitude towards the behaviour of member states as regards complying with the law and the regulations. That is much more important than any short-term arrangement. We must ensure that everyone complies with the law.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): How can supplementary milk levy be due from the United Kingdom if its milk production is not exceeding its quota?

Mr. Jopling: As the right hon. Gentleman will see from the regulations, these matters are assessed under what we call formula B, on a dairy basis. For the purposes of the United Kingdom, especially for wholesale deliveries, we have treated the five milk marketing boards as the dairies. The levy and the quota are based on that. That is why there is levy due in Northern Ireland, but not in Great Britain.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): When my right hon. Friend spoke to his colleagues about cereal surpluses, did he impress upon them his view that they should be dealt with not at the last moment by a bureaucratic quota but by a price mechanism? Cereal farmers need an element of certainty. Above all, we need to take more grain out of intervention stores by relaxing controls on restitutions and export credit.

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend because, for a long time, I have said that the way to deal with the cereal surplus is through the discipline of price and not through some bureaucratic horror such as quotas or co-responsibility levies.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): On milk, did the Minister make it clear, and will he now make it clear to the House, that, if any other state—Italy appears to be the culprit—does not comply with the requirements, we will reserve the right not to comply ourselves and to take whatever unilateral action is necessary to safeguard our dairy producers?

Mr. Jopling: As I said earlier, the hon. Gentleman will have seen what both I and the Prime Minister have said on this matter. We must be a little careful about Italy; a special derogation in the regulations agreed last March, because of the peculiar problems of Italy and Greece, provides that their assessment for levy is made on the basis of 12 months, whereas the other eight member states are treated on a shorter-term basis.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his stance in the Agriculture Council in pressing for flexibility in milk quotas. What progress is he making towards a system of leasing of quotas?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those kind remarks. I have said many times that I am sympathetic to the prospect of leasing quotas. The present system of attaching the quota solely to the land is a great deal too rigid. In the end, we will have to make it more flexible, as well as dealing with the adjoining matter of direct and wholesale quotas.

I am afraid that it has proved impossible to get the outgoing Commission to change the rules. I shall give my hon. Friend the same assurance that I gave my other constituency neighbour, my right hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellet-Bowman), that I shall press on as hard as possible with this matter when the new Commissioner is in office.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): My hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) mentioned the disarray in the dairy industry. Does not the Minister fear that that is due to the tardiness of the distribution of secondary quotas? Will he extend the outgoers scheme to all farmers, irrespective of farm size, on a partial surrender basis?

Mr. Jopling: With a great deal of difficulty, I managed to obtain £50 million for the outgoers scheme. It looks as though that will be spoken for—I hope so. I am afraid that there are no prospects at the moment for an extension of that.

I wholly reject the hon. Gentleman's suggestion about disarray.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): How did the Council of Ministers defend the cereal support system, under which, for example, if United Kingdom agriculture receives a bonus issue of 4 million tonnes of cereal from the Almighty over and above that which is required by farmers to satisfy their appetites and their bank managers, the taxpayer will have to put his hand in his pocket and find an additional £100 million at least, at a time when the Government are trying to cut back in other areas?

Mr. Jopling: Under the rules as they stand, there is an open-ended commitment to pay. My hon. Friend should recall that there has been a dramatic drop in cereal prices this year, which has been to the benefit of the livestock industry. He should also remember that this year, for the first time, the guarantee thresholds should bite very hard on cereal prices. Our estimate is that they should lead to a reduction of 5 per cent. in cereal prices at the next price fixing.

Mr. John Watson (Skipton and Ripon): How strong an assurance can my right hon. Friend give that production by British dairy farmers next year will not need to be reduced as a result of over-production by some continental dairy farmers this year?

Mr. Jopling: I have every hope that that will not happen. In fact, that thought has never seriously crossed my mind. Certainly, we would strongly resist any such suggestion. As I said to the House the other day, people in the Community speak to me with a good deal of envy about the drought we had in the summer, which has greatly helped us to reduce our milk production level.

Mr. Mark Hughes (City of Durham): I am grateful to the Minister for making this statement on the Agriculture Council. I ask your advice, Mr. Speaker, about Questions Nos. 1 and 175 on today's Order Paper, which call for written answers. Both those questions were asked by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) and both asked for a statement on the Fisheries Council meeting which was held on the same day as the Agriculture Council meeting. It is curious that we need to have two questions about the same Council.

Mr. Jopling: I regret to say that I have not studied the Order Paper sufficiently to note that fact. With customary foresight, my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) has tabled questions on days when he thought it was likely that there would be a report on a meeting of the Council of Ministers.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Twice?

Mr. Jopling: If my hon. Friend has tabled the question twice, that is a totally admirable belt and braces policy.

Teachers (Scotland)

4.51 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's refusal yesterday to have an independent pay review for teachers in Scotland."

The matter is specific, because yesterday the Secretary of State for Scotland announced that he was refusing what the Opposition believed was a thoroughly justified claim. The Minister made the announcement by written answer, which gave the House no opportunity to call the Secretary of State for Scotland to account.

This matter is important, because, as a result of the right hon. Gentleman's intransigence, we are faced with the prospect of a protracted period of disruption in our schools which could be disastrous for teachers, for parents and, above all, for pupils. If the teachers are right in thinking that their salaries have fallen behind those of comparable groups, they deserve justice. If they are wrong, the Secretary of State has nothing to fear from an independent inquiry.

The House should have an immediate opportunity to probe the reason why teachers in Scotland can obtain redress only at the price of accepting a sharp deterioration in their conditions of service. If there is no debate, and Ministers do not reconsider their position, there will be serious consequences, deepening the mood of anger and resentment in our schools, a mood which the Minister responsible for education in Scotland—the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart)—described in the House last night in an insensitive and unhappy phrase as "hysterical".

The Opposition's sense of urgency is reinforced by the knowledge that there will be widespread industrial action in Scotland's schools during the next few days. Teachers expect the House to have flexibility and a sense of priority of such an order as to allow it to respond to their outrage. In that expectation, they will have widespread support from Scottish public opinion. For those reasons, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider this application sympathetically.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's refusal yesterday to have an independent pay review for teachers in Scotland."

I have listened carefully to the hon. Member's speech, but I regret to say that I do not consider the matter that he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No point of order can arise on that subject.

Mr. Buchan: On the contrary, Sir. I completely accept your ruling, but, it has been alleged that the Minister responsible for education in Scotland described the teachers' response as "hysterical". The hon. Gentleman appeared just now to deny that. Is is possible to give the Minister the opportunity to tell us exactly what he said if he did not use the word "hysterical"?

Mr. Speaker: That is not possible now.

4.54 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the postponement of the announcement of the introduction of phases II and III of the standard grade examinations in Scottish schools as a result of industrial action by Scottish teachers."

This is an important and specific subject. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said, last night the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland announced that, following consultation with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the Government have agreed to the postponement of phases II and III of the standard grade reform of the curricula in Scottish schools.

It is clear that phase I covers English, mathematics, science and social and vocational skills, and phases II and III cover all the other subjects. It is clear that the subjects in which there is to be a postponement of the reform cover a wide range. It is clear also that such an important reform of Scottish education is falling and crumbling around the Government's ears.

This matter is urgent because, although phases II and III were not scheduled to come into operation until 1985 and 1986 respectively, the important preparatory work to bring those phases into operation must be done now.

The hon. Member for Garscadden has referred to the industrial action, which is part and parcel of this matter, and which is holding up the reforms. That industrial action is related to the Government's action—or rather inaction—in dealing with the teachers' justifiable claims for an independent pay review.

I therefore submit that this is an important and urgent matter. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to grant this application and allow the House the opportunity to challenge the Government's educational policies in Scotland, which are rapidly pushing Scottish education into an ever-deepening crisis.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the postponement of the announcement of the introduction of phases II and III of the standard grade examinations in Scottish schools as a result of industrial action by Scottish teachers."

I regret to say that I must give the hon. Member the same answer I gave the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). I have listened carefully to what the hon. Member said, but I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing order No. 10. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

4.56 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order involves statements of ministerial speeches that are placed in the Library. Mr. Deputy Speaker will recall that, last night, I asked for the speech of the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland to be made available in the Library, and the Scottish Office

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Ministers courteously made such arrangements. The Library copy of the statement—I do not know whether it has the official status of the Hansard report—states that I asked:

"A what reaction—historical or hysterical?"

The Minister replied:

"I understood that there has been a hysterical reaction to this point."

That may not appear in the Official Report, but it certainly appears in the report placed in the Library. Does that Library report have official status?

Mr. Speaker: A paper in the Library does not have the status of a statement in the House. I cannot comment on any ministerial statement placed in the Library or the language in which it is couched. The report may have been uncorrected.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to delay the House, because I realise that my colleagues have important business to transact, and we are all looking forward to helping them.

It is clear that the Minister responsible for education in Scotland indicated forcefully when I made my Standing Order No. 10 application that he had not used the word "hysterical". The word appears in what I understand to be an official report. We shall check the details tomorrow. I presume that this will be a correct report. I hope that the Minister accepts that, in referring to the reaction of the principal teachers' union, he used a word which I regard as unfortunate — he said that its members were "hysterical".

Mr. Speaker: That is as may be, but it is not a matter for me.

Ordered,

That the matter of the Oil Industry in Scotland, being a matter relating exclusively to Scotland, be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Major.]

Orders of the Day

Local Government Bill

(Considered in Committee)

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clause 1

ABOLITION OF GLC AND METROPOLITAN COUNTY COUNCILS

4.59 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 8, at beginning insert

'After a Royal Commission has reported on local government in Greater London and the metropolitan counties and'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 2, in page 1, line 8, at beginning insert

'After a Parliamentary tribunal of inquiry has reported on local government in Greater London and the metropolitan counties and'.

No. 3, in page 1, line 8, at beginning insert

'After a review of metropolitan counties under the provisions of the principal Act has reported on local government in Greater London and the metropolitan counties and'.

No. 4, in page 1, line 8, at beginning insert

'After a committee of inquiry has reported on local government in Greater London and the metropolitan counties and'.

No. 5, in page 1, line 8, at beginning insert

'After the Audit Commission has reported on local government in Greater London and the metropolitan counties and'.

No. 6, in page 1, line 9, after 'force', insert

'and after the Secretary of State has laid before Parliament proposals for an independent inquiry into the administrative implications of the proposed reorganisation of local government in London and the metropolitan counties'.

No. 7, in page 1, line 9, after 'force' insert

'and after a referendum held in each of the areas of the Greater London Council and the metropolitan county councils in which a majority of those voting have approved the proposed abolition of the council in each of the areas concerned'.

No. 19, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such day as may be appointed by an Order by the Secretary of State after the Royal Commission referred to in subsection (1) above has reported'.

No. 20, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such day as may be appointed by an Order by the Secretary of State after the review of the metropolitan counties under the provisions of the principal Act referred to in subsection (1) above has reported'.

No. 21, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such day as may be appointed by an Order by the Secretary of State after the Parliamentary tribunal of inquiry referred to in subsection (1) above has reported'.

No. 22, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such day as may be appointed by an Order by the Secretary of State after the committee of inquiry referred to in subsection (1) above has reported'.

No. 23, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such day as may be appointed by an Order by the Secretary of State after the Audit Commission referred to in subsection (1) above has reported'.

No. 24, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such a day as may be appointed by the Secretary of State after a referendum has been held in each of the areas of the Greater London Council and the metropolitan county councils to coincide with the local elections to be held in May 1986 in which a majority of those voting have approved the proposed abolition of the council in each of the areas concerned'.

No. 35, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add

'such dates as the Secretary of State shall by order appoint, after he has laid before each House of Parliament reports of independent local inquiries setting out proposals and recommendations for the future administration of local government in the Greater London Council and each of the metropolitan counties, such order to be laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

Mr. Straw: The departure of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) as I stood up, was not designed to reflect upon anything that I was about to say. We have started rather late and the time coincides with a meeting of the parliamentary Labour party's parliamentary committee.

The purpose of these amendments, with two exceptions, is essentially the same — to provide that there should be proper inquiry before the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties is proceeded with. The inquiries are variously to be held by a Royal Commission, a parliamentary tribunal or the Audit Commission. In addition, there are other amendments which have the similar effect of ensuring that the proposals are subject to greater scrutiny. One of the amendments proposes that if abolition is to go through there should be direct elections to all the presently indirectly elected boards and quangos to which most of the functions of the present metropolitan counties and the GLC are to be transferred.

It is notorious that the Bill's proposals were cobbled together in haste without proper consultation or consideration even within the Conservative party, let alone outside it. As we have heard, and it has not been expressly contradicted, they were against the expressed wishes of the Conservative party policy committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland wrote last week to the Prime Minister to remind her that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) had said in the House, with all the authority that he commands, that the manifesto commitment was included nine days after the 1983 election was called and against the wishes of the Conservative party policy committee. A week later, we have had no reply from the right hon. Lady.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): The reply, the terms of which I have seen, is on its way. If it is of any help to the hon. Gentleman, and so that he does not go on flogging a dead horse, the date to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) referred in his speech was the date upon which the manifesto was published. The idea that the commitment was inserted on the day of publication is fanciful. On the hon. Gentleman's second point, it is not for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to make public statements about internal party committees.

Mr. Straw: If it is not for the Prime Minister, who should comment about the internal organisation of the Conservative party? It is she who runs the Conservative party.

I note with interest that this is the third intervention that the Secretary of State has offered on this important matter. At no stage has he explicitly denied the charge of his right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, his former Prime Minister, that the commitment was included in the manifesto against the wishes of the Conservative party policy committee. I see that someone is about to give me some information on this.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I shall give the hon. Gentleman information not on the Conservative party's manifesto but on that of the Labour party. Will the hon. Gentleman tell us why the Labour party manifesto says:

"we aim to end, if we can, the present confusing division of services between two tiers of authority. Unitary district authorities, in England and Wales, could be responsible for all of the functions in this area that they could sensibly undertake."?

Mr. Straw: That is an entirely unexceptional statement which talks about ending the division of services if we can and suggests that district authorities could be responsible for them. Had we been elected as a Government there would have been the most careful consideration of the matter. We should have listened carefully, as we have in the past and as our record shows, to representations made to us.

As so many Conservative councillors have made clear, whatever else the Bill does, it does not create unitary authorities out of the present two-tier structure; it makes a two-tier structure into a four-tier structure and transfers power to the Secretary of State. The result of the haste is that this measure is ill-considered and without merit. So much so, that the Government's case rests upon shifting sands. First, they said that the proposal was all about savings, and nothing else. We all know about the £120 million.

When the Minister for Local Government reached the Department he evidently decided that the argument about savings was not as strong as we had been led to believe. For 18 months the Government had been promising us details of that £120 million, but could never come up with it. The Minister then issued a statement saying that that was not the main issue but that the proposal was all about devolution to the boroughs. That is nonsense and a deception, according to the Conservative councillor, Mr. Robert Mitchell. I am sure that our ever-flexible Friend the Minister will offer some other explanation this afternoon.

The proposal is so ill thought out that the Government have failed to convince even those people on serious newspapers who at other times have been regarded as the Government's allies and supporters. Today, the Financial Times said:

"there are certain criteria which must be fulfilled for these changes to be accpetable. The first is that the new arrangement has a reasonable chance of being an improvement on the old. The second is that accountability is not reduced, so that pressure for efficiency and sensitivity to local aspirations is not diminished. The third is that democracy and democratic principles are neither weakened nor violated. The Bill fails on all three counts."

I could not have said it better myself. I notice the odd guffaw at that suggestion from the Financial Times, which is, of course, the mouthpiece of international capitalism — as people may say — and a supporter of the Government, but how about the "old thunderer" The Times which has been cerebrating in its support for this Administration? Two editorials attacked the proposals. One said:

"The abolition bill can be examined in vain for any expression of a general philosophy of the role of government in society, or doctrine of fiscal limits. It is a document lacking any sense of future . . . It is a document lacking coherent principles for local administration."

The second said:

"Ostensibly about devolving powers to districts and boroughs the local government bill becomes in too many places a recipe for decentralisation . . . this excess of ministerial discretion . . . they are a recipe for private government and the abuse of power."

Those views are backed by those who normally support the Conservative Administration—the London Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the British Roads Federation and even Alcoholics Recovery Project.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): They could do some good business in this place.

Mr. Straw: I am sure that that was an all-party reference.

The Government went through a consultation process. They denied the Library and hon. Members copies of the documents which were submitted to them by way of consultation, as well they might, because they were overwhelmingly against the proposals. Out of 780 submissions analysed by outside bodies, 750 were against, only 10 in favour and 20 could not be classified.

Why are the Government in this mess? First, because their motives for the change are fundamentally suspect. We know that the real motive for the change was not that they thought that change was needed on its merits but because they objected to the policies being democratically carried out by democratically elected Labour authorities.

The second and associated reason for the mess is that the proposals were not thought out before they were brought forward. As the Prime Minister told the nation in her Carlton club lecture last week, the Conservative party claims to be the party which respects the conventions and traditions of Britain. The Bill flies in the face of all convention and of all principles of good government.

Every previous change in local government has been preceded by a serious and independent inquiry in which the people concerned have been able to put forward their views before and not after the Government have made up their mind and set their proposals in concrete.

The establishment of the county councils—including the London county council, in 1888—was preceded by years of public debate and consultation. Recently the Secretary of State referred to the fact that Lord Salisbury had opposed the London county council in 1898, but I remind the right hon. Gentleman that it was Lord Salisbury who sponsored the establishment of the London county council in 1888. Later he may have repented for the same reason as the Secretary of State is now proposing the removal of an elected authority for London. Lord Salisbury repented later because the elections in London did not go the way that he had wished, but it was he who proposed the measure, and his hon. Friends helped to push it through this House. Whatever their subsequent comments about the policies of the LCC, at least previous Consevative administrations, even when the LCC elections went the wrong way, were willing to allow an elected authority for London to continue.

The London Government Act 1962 was preceded by the most serious consideration, not only by the Herbert Commission but within the wider confines of the London community. I remind Conservative Members that someone who was at that stage a leading light in the Conservative party, and is now the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), was a director of the London Municipal Society, which held an inquiry into the running of Greater London and produced serious and well worked out proposals—with which the Labour party did not agree — for London to be split into seven large boroughs. The Government did not say that they would act on those proposals. They looked at them and at other proposals and set up a Royal Commission, so that the matter could be considered with great seriousness, with people having a chance to put forward their views.

With regard to the government of the country outside Greater London, the Labour Government between 1964 and 1970 could have implemented proposals which suited their political book. It is a testament to the Labour Administration — as it is to the Conservative Administration under Macmillan—that they did not do so. They recognised that they were dealing not simply with party advantage but with a central part of the running of our democracy. So, again, there was a full inquiry, under Lord Redcliffe-Maud, before any proposals were made.

With regard to three of the six metropolitan areas, Lord Redcliffe-Maud recommended that there should be two-tier government. In paragraph 3 of Chapter I the report said:

"In the special circumstances of three metropolitan areas around Birmingham, Liverpool and Manchester, responsibility for services should be divided in each case between a metropolitan authority . . . and a number of metropolitan district authorities".

To the extent that Conservative Members are now recommending unitary authorities—that is what they say but it is not what they are doing—the case for unitary authorities is overwhelmingly the strongest in the shire areas, where there are free-standing towns without surrounding conurbations. I look forward to the Secretary of State at last recognising that that is where the logic of his arguments will lead. What will he say to the proposals of the last Labour Government for organic change in the shire areas, which were carefully worked out, the subject of the widest consultation, and supported by Conservative as well as Labour Administrations? Does he believe that what is sauce for the goose in the Labour conurbation areas is also sauce for the gander in the Conservative shire areas?

The Secretary of State for Transport and his right hon. Friends have called for an inquiry into the GLC's lorry ban. The Secretary of State—I understand his reasons—said:

"If people are adversely and discriminately affected by matters such as a new road . . . the Government have no hesitation in allowing a public inquiry."

He added that it was a question

"of individuals being adversely affected compared with others."

—[Official Report, 7 November 1984; Vol 2, c. 138.]

5.15 pm

If people are to be adversely affected by a lorry ban, how much more will people be affected by the abolition of the GLC? If there is a case for an inquiry into a lorry ban, there is an overwhelming case for an inquiry into the Bill's proposals, which would have a far greater impact on people in the areas concerned.

We have heard a great deal about the Conservatives' manifesto commitment and we have all read it. The Conservative party claims to be the principal upholder of the parliamentary system, so it should never be seen to override the will of Parliament and the need for important proposals, such as those in the Bill, to be scrutinised on their merits. When I talk of the will of Parliament I do not mean the use of a parliamentary majority to effect elective dictatorship of the offensive kind that Lord Hailsham once exposed and which the present Government have been practising.

I suggest to the Secretary of State that the manifesto commitment in no way precludes the reference of that commitment to a Royal Commission. If the Government were to set up such an inquiry, it would still be open to them, within the lifetime of this Parliament, to bring forward proposals, if they wished to do so, in exactly the same form as the pesent proposals. Such proposals would have a great deal more legitimacy behind them, having been the subject of independent scrutiny.

The Secretary of State should have listened more closely to his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who said:

"At any time it is possible to carry out a review of the 1972 Local Government Act, and for my money the longer the settling-in period the more factual evidence we shall possess upon which to make informed judgments."

The right hon. Gentleman said that in 1979. Only five years have passed since the first elections following a reform of local government—the first serious attempt at that task since Queen Victoria sat on the throne. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say:

"We are agreed that we do not seek another major reorganisation of local government because we are certain that change in this field is likely to be expensive and divisive."

The Secretary of State's Conservative predecessor was right when he said that in 1979, and he is right now.

Mr. Reg Prentice (Daventry): I voted for the Bill on Second Reading, I expect to vote for it on Third Reading, and possibly once or twice in between, but very selectively, because it is a Bill that I dislike in many respects. I particularly dislike the way in which it was born.

I voted for the Bill on Second Reading for one reason only. Given the fact that the Bill was before the House and that we had to make a broad decision on whether we believed in the continuation of the GLC and the metropolitan counties, my own view on balance was against them. I think that those authorities are too large to be local authorities and too small to be regional authorities; therefore, I want to see some change. But I dislike the way that the change was brought about.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the analysis of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). I suggest to my right hon. and hon. Friends that a major change in the structure of local government in Britain should take place only very occasionally, and then only after the most careful study and consultation. I suggest that about twice in a century is sufficient. Such a change should be preceded probably by a Royal Commission or by some other deep study of that kind. I think that we are due for a Royal Commission or some such study into the structure and financing of local government.

We have had several studies in the past, but they have tended to be either of structure or of the method of financing local services. All were unsatisfactory for that reason. We should now have a major study of both together. It would have been compatible with the election pledge to set up a Royal Commission now, for it to report during this Parliament and then for the Government to make up their mind on their proposals towards the end of this Parliament, to be implemented in the following Parliament.

At the very least, if we do not go down the road of a Royal Commission, I suggest that there should have been a much longer period of consultation before the Government ever made that firm commitment in the election manifesto. It is rather absurd to put such a pledge into a manifesto, at a late stage, without consulting the local government world in general, and without even consulting Conservative councillors up and down the country or even Conservative councillors on the GLC and the metropolitan counties. Many of them have resented that, and they are right to resent it.

It seems to me that the pledge went into the manifesto basically because in the last Parliament the Government had failed to find an alternative to the rating system. Having failed to do so, and having disappointed the expectations of people up and down the country who looked for a change, there seemed to be a move in the leadership of the Conservative party, saying that Conservatives had to do something about the rates and wondering what could be put into the manifesto. One outcome was the unfortunate Rates Bill and the second is the Local Government Bill. That is not the way in which such major decisions should be made. I might vote for the amendment, or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, by his eloquence, might persuade me to abstain. One way or the other, I cannot vote with the Government.

I do not seriously expect the Government to accept the amendment. I expect them to go ahead with the Bill. Given the broad choice facing us, I am in favour of a change away from the large authorities, but I suggest to my right hon. Friend and the Government that unfortunately in the past few years they have produced an atmosphere in their relationship with local government, including Conservative-controlled local authorities, that is very unhappy and has caused a great deal of resentment. Several of their friends feel that they take local government too much for granted and do not sufficiently respect its traditions and successes. If I am told that that is unfair, I can only say that that is what is often said to me by county and district councillors in my constituency, and by other people whom I meet elsewhere. I hope that the Government can, in various ways, begin to put that right. It is in that spirit that I speak briefly in favour of the amendment.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Prentice), because I agreed strongly with two of the points that he made. First, he argued that the existing GLC and the metropolitan counties are too large to be genuine local government and, in some respects, have the wrong boundaries and powers to be effective regional government. That is absolutely right. That is why there is a case for re-examining our metropolitan government in London and the metropolitan counties. Secondly, I agree that we make a great mistake in looking at the structure of local government and its financing in isolation. It means that we get the wrong structure and the wrong financing system, when we should look at the two together.

[Mr. John Cartwright]

The Government are most vulnerable on this Bill because it is not the result of any independent analysis. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) rightly said that before the London government reorganisation we had the Herbert commission report and before the reorganisation in the metropolitan areas outside London we had Redcliffe-Maud. It is fair to say that the Government of the day did not stick to the recommendations of either report—they produced different formulations—but the two reports provided a basis of independent assessment against which one could judge the Government's proposals. That is not what we have in this Bill.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman cannot be allowed to get away with that statement. We should compare what was finally enacted in the Local Government Act 1972 with the Redcliffe-Maud report which, after all, recommended 61 unitary authorities across the country, and we ended up with the present pattern of shire counties and districts. When one makes that comparison, how can the hon. Gentleman say that one decision flowed in any way from the inquiry that preceded it? It is as different as chalk from cheese.

Mr. Cartwright: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not want to misrepresent what I said. I was not arguing that the one flowed from the other. I said that the independent assessment provided a background and evidence against which to judge what the Government were doing. Many of us who thought that Redcliffe-Maud was right were able as a result to oppose the local government reorganisation proposed in 1972 by the then Secretary of State for the Environment. I was saying that the independent analysis was there, and provided some independent judgment. There is nothing of that sort available against which to judge what the Government are now proposing.

We are talking about a very important area—the government of the capital and of the most important urban areas of this country. To make a change on the basis of a sudden commitment produced at the beginning of a general election campaign, if not in the heat of the campaign, is not the right way to go about it. The effect is that the commitment that was given has had to be made good in a hurry. I am reminded of the experience of the noble Lord Shinwell, who has from time to time commented on the problems that he faced when he took over the Ministry of Fuel and Power. He was given the job of nationalising the coal mines and discovered that there were no plans to nationalise them. The same sort of problem seems to have befallen the Secretary of State. No doubt when he walked into the Department of the Environment after the general election in June 1983 and said, "Let me see the proposals for the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties," the civil servants had to say that no detailed proposals had been worked out.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Rubbish.

Mr. Cartwright: I should be interested to see what evidence the right hon. Gentleman has that there were any detailed—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] The Secretary of State has not signified that he wishes to intervene at the moment. If he has any evidence that detailed proposals had been worked out either in Conservative Central Office or in the Department of the Environment, I am sure that the Committee would be interested to hear it.

What we have to go on is the White Paper entitled "Streamlining the Cities". That document appears to have been cobbled together at such speed that the joins show. If one wanted evidence of that, I suggest that it came rapidly in that snowstorm of hastily duplicated consultation documents which came whistling out of Marsham street as civil servants discovered that many practical problems had not even been addressed in "Streamlining the Cities".

Two domestic problems in my constituency have still not been sorted out. One is the problem of Thamesmead new town. The Government have still not reached a conclusion on the final arrangements for Thamesmead, which is a new town of the 21st century being developed by the GLC. It falls within two London boroughs, neither of which is anxious to take it over or has the resources to take it over. The Government are saying that the best solution that they can find is to set up a trust to take over responsibility for the development of Thamesmead. At this point, they have no firm proposal for such a trust. We look forward with great interest to seeing how that idea works out.

5.30 pm

If the proposal for the abolition of the Greater London council had been worked out in such detail, the Secretary of State would have some difficulty in persuading me that at this stage we should be discussing what on earth to do about the problem of a major housing development like Thamesmead.

My second example is that of the Woolwich free ferry. It is now run by the Greater London council. Before that, it was operated by the London county council. After the abolition of the GLC, who is going to run the Woolwich free ferry? Neither the London borough of Newham nor the London borough of Greenwich has the resources or the capability to run it. When the matter was raised in the House and outside, there was a clear statement from the Government that the ferry would continue as a free ferry, but who is going to run it we do not yet know. When I took up this point with the Minister of State, Department of Transport, I received a very civil letter from her in which she said that it was a very good question and that if I had any solution to the problem would I kindly let her have it. This shows that on what is no doubt a minor matter for the Government but an important matter for Londoners, this proposal has not been thought through.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Does the hon. Gentleman say that the same kind of consideration as for the ferry occurs in relation to the upkeep of the Blackwall and Rotherhithe tunnels?

Mr. Cartwright: No. They are run on a different basis. They are not the direct responsibility of the ferry which has been operated on a free basis for generations by the GLC and the LCC. The argument I am putting to the Committee is that this is another example of legislation on the hoof, something which has not been thought through and which has been produced under pressure.

If we are considering that kind of approach to the government of major urban centres in this country, I do not believe that that is the way to go about it. I agree with the right hon. Member for Daventry. He argues that if we are going to change the government of these important parts of the country, we ought to produce the kind of change which will last for a very long time. I do not believe that the proposals which are now being put before the Committee can possibly last. They are being imposed for political reasons. They have not been thought through. They are confusing to the electorate. They will be costly to administer. They involve a major switch of power and influence from local government to central Government.

The case which can be made against the Government on this batch of amendments is that they clearly do not want the best available system of government for London and the metropolitan counties. They wish to impose their system without any independent assessment of what they are doing. I hope that, even at this late stage, they will grasp the opportunity provided by these amendments. I have little faith that they will, but, nevertheless, we shall support this group of amendments.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): I should like briefly to support the proposal for an inquiry before this legislation proceeds. My right hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Prentice) explained how he voted for Second Reading, although he had considerable reservations about the Bill. I did not vote for Second Reading, although I had and still have sympathy with some of the objectives of the Bill. I did not vote for Second Reading because I believe that the legislation is feckless and ill-considered. Therefore, it could only be very seriously improved if there were an inquiry. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Daventry said, local government matters are peculiarly unsuitable for rushed and ill-digested legislation. This Bill comes under that heading. I have every sympathy, therefore, for my right hon. and hon. Friends who are caught up with this legislation.

Let me give one example—waste disposal. Funnily enough, the GLC runs waste disposal very well, to the considerable advantage not only of London but of the surrounding counties. To break up that waste disposal activity would be irresponsible and would involve considerable disadvantages for Greater London and the home counties. That is just one example of the problems caused by a Bill being brought forward before the Government have thought through the matter. It will have very damaging consequences.

There has been no consultation about the Bill and there has been no attempt to obtain wide support for the Bill's proposals. As Conservatives, we ought to be aiming for that. Not even to try to hold consultations over local government matters is surely a considerable mistake and will result in grave problems.

When moving the Second Reading my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that he did not believe that anybody would wish to live with a structure that would inevitably lead to the sort of conflict that we have seen. That may well be true, but surely my right hon. Friend does not believe that these proposals will not lead to just as much conflict in the future. Indeed, they will probably lead to a great deal more conflict.

My right hon. Friend takes 123 powers in the Bill. Not all of them are new powers; nevertheless, 123 different powers are mentioned. I suggest that that will lead to a great deal of conflict, and probably even more conflict than last year's measure—ratecapping—is likely to lead to before very long. Therefore, an inquiry would be a great benefit.

Mr. Bernard Brook-Partridge, the GLC Conservative member, recently wrote an article in which he described this legislation as "the last-minute, unconsidered, un-thought-out, 'populist', ignorant, insulting and constitutionally illiterate proposals relating to the GLC and the Metropolitan Counties", and said that they "should be dropped immediately in favour of either a short, sharp, properly constituted public inquiry or an immediate acceptance of the fact that London-wide services should be discharged by a refined, 'slimmed-down' GLC or by a new London Assembly, democratically elected and publicly accountable".

Those are strong words. I would not go quite so far myself. Nevertheless, they contain a certain amount of truth.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I support all the amendments which stand in the names of my hon. Friends. In my view, these amendments expose very well the basic weaknesses of this squalid Bill. It is sometimes seen as a badge of honour for a Secretary of State to pursue a Bill which he knows is not acceptable to the country. It would be much more of a badge of honour and would require much more courage if the Secretary of State were to go back to his Cabinet colleagues, even at this late stage, and say that this hastily cobbled Bill is not worth wasting a large amount of time during this parliamentary session.

There is no denying that this Government have not been prepared to hold proper, meaningful consultations or a proper form of inquiry before deciding to ride roughshod over one third of the population of the country, including that part of the country which I have the privilege to represent. I refer to the area of the Tyne and Wear county council. In my opinion and in the opinion of the vast majority of my constituents, it has done an exceptionally good job, measured by any standards, during the 10 years since the creation of the metropolitan counties by the previous Tory Government.

My concern is that all the traditions of previous Administrations — of not being prepared to undertake major local government reform in advance of an independent inquiry or a Royal Commission—have been flung to the winds by this Government. The Local Government Act 1972 was preceded, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, by the Redcliffe-Maud Commission. In fairness to the Tory Government at that time I should say that they were implementing the recommendation to set up two-tier authorities in the metropolitan areas or major conurbations — hence the creation of the metropolitan county councils.

I am equally concerned that the review procedures that Parliament established by the 1972 Act, which required a review of local government to be undertaken within 10 to 15 years, have been completely ignored. Parliament decided that a major review should be undertaken within 10 to 15 years. We are in the 11th year, yet the Government have introduced a Bill which rides roughshod over one third of the population and over the will of Parliament.

At the Tory party conference, the Secretary of State announced a major review of local government finance. That was not done out of a genuine desire to consider what should replace the rates, a subject on which the Prime Minister waxed so eloquent two elections ago when she committed the Tory Party to the abolition of the rates. We are still waiting. The Secretary of State was so embarrassed when he thought of the hoo-ha that would occur at the Tory party conference if he did not give some sort of undertaking that he promised to set up an inquiry into local government finance.

[Mr. Robert C. Brown]

I give the right hon. Gentleman credit for promising at least to do something, but, having agreed to examine the financial structure of local government, the right hon. Gentleman should have gone on to look at local government as a whole.

I did not support the establishment of the metropolitan county councils. I make no apology for that, because I still believe that we should have major regional authorities, with all-purpose authorities under them. However, the best method of local government can be determined only by the sort of major inquiry proposed in the amendments.

The Bill is bound to have major knock-on effects. It will have implications for the whole of local government and not just for the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. The PA Management Consultants report has already pointed out that many shire areas have larger populations but fewer powers than the metropolitan districts. That is why there must be full consultation on the structure and financing of local government as a whole before any changes are made in the conurbations.

The Government have rejected consultation. Not only have they not commissioned an inquiry into their proposals, but they have paid little or no regard to the response to the White Paper "Streamlining the Cities". On their own analysis of responses, published in the summer, fewer than 10 per cent. of those consulted supported abolition. The Secretary of State has consistently refused to publish the responses to help us have a considered debate on the issues involved in the Bill.

We have not been told the views of 90 per cent. of those who responded to the White Paper, but I could quote ad nauseam hundreds of comments that condemn the Bill line by line, just as we shall be doing in the months ahead.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I had not intended to speak in the debate. I avoided speaking on Second Reading because I thought that if I showed any enthusiasm for the Bill I might be put on the Standing Committee. I came in to listen to the debate in the hope that I would hear some words of wisdom. I have been sadly disappointed.

I had the advantage in the years up to 1972 of serving on a county borough council—still, in my view, the best method of effecting local government in its proper sense. I also have the advantage of being on record as having opposed the establishment of the metropolitan county councils in general and the Merseyside county council in particular.

5.45 pm

In my political peregrinations around the country, trying to get elected to the House, I was at a by-election in Liverpool in 1971 when the few people who were then inclined to support the Conservative cause said that they had no wish to see the establishment of a Merseyside county council. They did not understand what it was, and nothing much has changed in the succeeding 14 years. Many people in that part of the world still think that the county council is something to do with the Liverpool city council.

In 1974, when I moved my political activities to Newton-le-Willows, which for some reason is now in the Merseyside county council area, though it has nothing to do with Merseyside, people asked what on earth they were doing in Merseyside and what Merseyside had to do with Newton-le-Willows.

I remember that the people involved in local politics at that time, either on the county borough council or on urban district councils, had to make judgments about their political futures. Without exception, they stood for election to the district councils within the metropolitan county council areas and not for the county councils. They could not see what the counties would do politically or how they would occupy their time. I took the same decision. Unfortunately, I was defeated by a Liberal, although I got back later.

No one of any political consequence chose to stand for election to the county councils. The young hirsute gentlemen who sit on those councils now perhaps do not have such long memories.

In 1979, I was asked why, as the metropolitan county councils had still not worked, we had not got rid of them. The same question was being asked during the 1983 general election.

It has been suggested that the people represented by the metropolitan county councils have some affection for them. That is not true. The Merseyside county council has gone to enormous expense to buy space in newspapers so that people can send me clippings saying that they wish to keep the county council. Some people have done that, but it is surprising to see how many altered the clipping to say that they agree with the abolition of the Merseyside county council.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): How many slips of paper has the hon. Gentleman received from people who support the abolition of the county council and how many people have told him that they disagree with abolition? I have not had a single call for abolition.

Mr. Porter: As the lady said, "You would, wouldn't you?" To be absolutely fair, about 60 per cent. were in favour of abolition and about 40 per cent. were against it. As it is a printed form to be sent to the person's Member of Parliament expressing disagreement with abolition, I am surprised that so many people have gone to the length of altering it and then sending it to me.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir Ian Gilmour) seemed to be suggesting that, as the GLC had run waste disposal services rather well, that was somehow a powerful argument for not abolishing it. Waste disposal no doubt took place before the GLC was set up. I do not argue about the situation in the GLC area, but on Merseyside, whatever I put in my dustbin was adequately disposed of before the county council came into being. I do not believe that it is beyond the wit of man to devise an equally efficient system under the new arrangements, so that seems a rather infantile objection to a major proposal.

Sir Ian Gilmour: I was simply saying that well-thought-out legislation would have dealt with the problem in the Bill, so I do not think that my hon. Friend's objection carries much weight.

Mr. Porter: I have no doubt that during the Committee stage, in which I intend to take little part after today and tomorrow, such matters will be dealt with, but I should not have thought that they constituted fundamental objections to the measure. I hope that those who take part in the Committee stage — [HON. MEMBERS: "This is the Committee stage"] I mean the Standing Committee upstairs. I hope that members of that Committee will address themselves postively to these matters rather than keeping people like me up all night for the next six months.

The Chairman: I share the hon. Gentleman's hope, but I also hope that he will address himself to the amendments before the Committee and not seek to make the speech that he might have made if he had caught Mr. Speaker's eye on Second Reading.

Mr. Porter: I am obliged to you for that reminder, Mr. Chairman. It might help if I had read the amendments. I shall call myself to order, conclude my remarks very shortly and leave it to the self-appointed experts to carry on.

Merseyside county council in particular and the metropolitan counties in general have achieved popularity, although some false affection has been generated by money, activity and noise from those running them. I am in fact advocating the abolition of my own father, who in the latter part of his local government career has subsided on to the benches of Merseyside county council. It is with the greatest pleasure that I abolish his office. I am sad that he should have spent the past few years in an activity of no real consequence when he would have been better occupied dealing with local government matters in the proper manner that the Bill will achieve.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The Government have put forward proposals for the reform of the metropolitan counties without proper consideration and almost without putting them to the public in the areas concerned. They have a very long way to go if they are to justify the wholesale massacre of local government structure. They have yet to show the logic of undermining local government in this way, as they have not yet provided the detailed analysis that both Opposition and Conservative Members have called for. In dealing with the most fundamental restructuring of local government this decade we need far more evidence to underpin the proposals before us.

One of the amendments calls for a series of referendums in the GLC and metropolitan areas. We set great store by that in Greater Manchester, where only 10 per cent. of the population strongly favour the Government's proposals. The proposals thus have almost no credible support in the area. It is not unreasonable to suggest that the people most affected by the proposals should have the opportunity to express their view. I also have considerable sympathy with the view that the proposals should be subject to detailed examination by a Royal Commission or similar body. Whatever the merits or demerits of the Bill, it is clear that the structure of local government after abolition will have to be reformed very quickly by a future Government, preferably a Labour Government, because the present proposals offer no credible structure for local government in the metropolitan areas.

The uncertainties caused by the Bill have not been adequately dealt with. The proposals for the police forces are a good example. Greater Manchester now has an integrated police force covering the whole metropolitan county, with a central headquarters and a centralised communications system. I understand that the Home Office itself, unofficially, strongly opposes the idea of breaking up that integrated force. If the Bill is passed there will be strong demands from the districts within Greater Manchester for the restoration of some democratic control over the police force because we wish a police force to be accountable. That is not the right way to achieve accountability. Having created an integrated force out of the former separate forces in the area, the correct way to proceed is to guarantee that democratic structure through a countywide body such as the present county council. The Government's proposal is unsatisfactory and unlikely to gain the support of Home Office Ministers. With such uncertainty built into the Bill, it is inevitable that the public in the metropolitan areas will look askance at the Government's proposals.

Despite the various assertions made by the Secretary of State, there has been no adequate discussion of the cost of the proposals. An annual figure of £100 million has been magicked out of the air by the Government, but there has been no in-depth examination or justification and there is not a shred of evidence to support the Government's assumptions. Credible examinations have been carried out by Coopers and Lybrand and others who have attempted to grapple with the complexities of the problem. We all admit that it is a complex matter and none of us would wish to pin our faith to the last pound on the figures in the Coopers and Lybrand report. Nevertheless, it has been the only attempt to analyse the situation and to tell the public the likely costs and benefits of abolition and people will naturally assume, in the absence of any other evidence, that the figures in that report are more reliable than those plucked out of the air by the Secretary of State. The public cannot possibly be satisfied while that uncertainty remains.

All those uncertainties point to the need for a Royal Commission to carry out a study based on something more substantial than the political prejudices of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State, who dislike the county councils because of their political composition, which is merely temporary. The Government dislike the authorities because they are all Labour-controlled. It is unlikely that a Royal Commission would approach the matter purely on the basis of party political spite. It is important that we get away from such spite and set up a body on which we can rely to examine the arguments in a more dispassionate and constructive way than has been achieved so far.

One amendment refers specifically to the Audit Commission. I have had cause to write to the commission in relation to the Price Waterhouse report on the abolition proposals. I am not totally enamoured of the Audit Commission, but that is a much more reputable body to look into these matters——

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): It was set up by the Government.

Mr. Lloyd: As my hon. Friend says, it was set up by this Government to control local government spending.

[Mr. Lloyd]

The Audit Commission ought to be given the opportunity to look into the costing of these proposals and the efficiency of the existing set-up. Not even Parliament has discussed improving the county councils and the GLC, and that should be put to the judgment of a Royal Commission or the Audit Commission. It is not good enough simply to bow to the prejudices of the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister. It is more important to establish a local government structure that will last and which, without the present uncertainties, will be safe for a considerable number of years ahead and not simply until the next Parliament.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Are not Royal Commissions, committees of inquiry and parliamentary inquiries just another form of parliamentary procrastination? Will they produce any shred of evidence which my right hon. Friend does not already possess? I think not. The Committee would be well advised to reject this group of amendments.

In 1975, to its eternal credit, the Labour party took the trouble to set up the Layfield committee of inquiry into the financing of local government. That document remains a major work on the financial aspects of local government. However, to its discredit, the Labour party did not have the courage between 1975 and 1979 to implement any of that committee's recommendations. To our credit, my right hon. Friend and his predecessors have since 1979 tried to grapple with the problem of financing local government. We have not yet been entirely successful, but at least we have taken steps which, it is hoped, will ultimately lead in the right direction. That must surely be the protection of the ratepayer against rapacious and greedy local authorities which seek to obtain funds from the ratepayer out of earned income to provide for services which are not necessarily best provided by the local authority, and which perhaps could be better and more prudently provided by other solutions.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Heddle: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. He spoke many times on Second Reading, and no doubt he will do so in Committee. I am sure that he will make his own views known in his inimitable manner.

This Committee should direct its attention specifically to protecting the ratepayer, because without the wealth which the ratepayer can provide, local authorities such as the GLC and the six metropolitan country councils would not have the money with which to provide the services which, in their infinite wisdom, they believe that the ratepayer deserves.

Both the Labour and Liberal parties are united with Conservative Members in wishing to seek a solution to unemployment, the most enormous problem which confronts us. We all want to find a solution which will create jobs. We are more likely to find that solution if we give the industrial and commercial ratepayers a greater opportunity to preserve as much of their after-tax wealth as they can. Without a doubt, there has been a flight of private sector capital from the GLC and the six metropolitan county councils because that sector has paid an inordinate amount of after-tax profits in rates. This has nothing to do with reducing the rate support grant, but it has everything to do with protecting the industrial and commercial ratepayer. My right hon. Friend's rate-capping announcement yesterday will do precisely that and will go some way towards protecting jobs in our inner cities and conurbations.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith) rose——

Mr. Heddle: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to finish my speech. When I sit down, he will no doubt have the opportunity of catching the eye of the Chair.

Some of the operational aspects of the Bill which will have to be further debated when it goes into Standing Committee — for example, waste disposal, planning functions, transfers of powers and transfer of rights and responsibilities under leases — are technical nuts and bolts to which the Committee will have to give deep consideration. However, these amendments simply suggest the fudge of a basic issue which affects all firms in the constituency of every hon. Member in or near the GLC and the six metropolitan county council areas. Relieving them of the additional burden of one expensive layer of bureaucracy, which takes democracy one step further away from them, will do nothing to create jobs. The Committee should reject this raft of amendments forthwith.

Mr. Wareing: As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, all previous major local government reorganisations have been preceded by a thorough review and investigation of the needs of those who live in the various areas. So important did a thorough investigation seem that, after 1926, a borough or urban district which sought county borough status was required to present a private Bill before Parliament so that it could be thoroughly investigated before a change was made. Between 1926 and the 1960s, only one county borough was established in that way—Doncaster.

Even relatively minor changes have been the subject of real inquiry. Between 1945 and 1949, two local government boundary commissions looked at the problems of boundaries only. In 1956, a Conservative Government published a White Paper on the structure of local government. However, that was felt to be insufficient, and that Government under Harold Macmillan passed the Local Government Act 1958 which established two local government commissions—one for England and one for Wales—which in 1963-64 reported on the establishment of a number of county boroughs in the west midlands area.

The Redcliffe-Maud commission provided a mountain of information and identified the disparity in size and resources of local authorities, the overspill problems in the conurbations and the haphazard allocation of functions between urban and rural districts and the non-county and county boroughs. It was argued that the Labour party has never been in favour of metropolitan authorities, but, following the publication of the Redcliffe-Maud report, the White Paper on the reform of local government in England was published in February 1970 by the Government of which the right hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Prentice) was a member.

A common theme of the Redcliffe-Maud report and the White Paper of February 1970 was that in the metropolitan areas of Greater Manchester, Merseyside and the west midlands the two-tier system was the correct one to deal with the disparity in resources, the haphazard allocation of functions and the overspill problems in those conurbations. Indeed, the Labour Government's White Paper went further. It added to the three areas mentioned in the Redcliffe-Maud report the conurbations of west Yorkshire and south Hampshire, including the Isle of Wight. In February 1971, the Conservative Government published a White Paper on local government in England. Again, it increased from three to six the number of conurbations which were to have metropolitan authorities. Those, of course, were the areas which were the subject of the Local Government Act 1972.

Redcliffe-Maud and all the previous reports and White Papers had something else in common. They were all concerned about the growing amount of central control. They argued that, if nothing was done to reorganise local government, central control was bound to become greater.

The motive for the Local Government Act 1972 was to hold back the tide of central control. The proposition before the Committee now has exactly the opposite motive. The aim of the Secretary of State is not to increase local accountability, but to increase central control. As the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) so eloquently put it, there are about 120 powers in the Bill—I had not realised that the figure was so large — by which the Government seek to increase central control.

In answer to the hon. Member for Lichfield and Tamworth——

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Mid-Staffordshire.

Mr. Wareing: I am sorry. The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) referred to the increasing burden on the ratepayer. However, the burden on the ratepayer must increase when the Government reduce the rate support grant from 61 per cent. of expenditure to 48 per cent. At a time when we are still suffering from inflation—even though it has become less severe—the only alternative is to cut services. That is what the Secretary of State has in mind. He is the agent of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. At the Tory party conference, the Secretary of State announced that there was to be a review of local government finance. However, before that review can be published, the Secretary of State presents us with a Bill to alter the structure of local government. That has never happened before.

Even on the Government's own admission, they have little support. I understand that the Government received 5,000 responses to their White Paper "Streamlining the Cities" and that less than 10 per cent. of the respondents supported the Government's proposition.

Throughout the arguments of the past year, the Government have provided no concessions whatsoever to informed opinion. There is still much that one can ask about the details. We know that under this measure a number of trusts are to be established. One will cater for the arts on Merseyside. There has been no thoroughgoing investigation of the right way of presenting the arts in conurbations such as Merseyside. I dare say that, even now, the Secretary of State could not tell me who will be responsible for the Philharmonic hall in the city of Liverpool. The philharmonic orchestra may be administered by the trust, but presumably the hall itself will become the possession of Liverpool city council—and the city council has had to close St. George's hall already in order to keep its head above water in the climate created by the Government's financial policies.

6.15 pm

Government Members have argued that the Labour party manifesto favoured unitary authorities. However, "Labour's Programme 1982" included a statement on devolution. In the consideration of devolution for Scotland and Wales, the point was made that if there is devolution in Scotland and Wales, we must also consider the democratisation of regional government in England. The Labour Government of 1964-79 published a document called "Devolution: The English Dimension". Many Labour Members would be fully in favour not of reducing the second tier but of extending democratic government to the control of electricity boards, gas boards, health authorities and water authorities. That is the question that we should be considering, instead of this squalid measure.

The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter)—the only Member from the Merseyside area who has been present on the Conservative Benches—said that most people on Merseyside are not in favour of the county council. What has he been reading? He has certainly not read Liverpool polytechnics' survey of opinion on Merseyside, according to which, 70·3 per cent. of those questioned were in favour of retaining the Merseyside county council. Some people were in favour of increasing its powers. Over 80 per cent. of those questioned were opposed to increased central Government control. No less that 86·8 per cent. were in favour of Merseyside county council's cheap fares policy.

That survey was a test of opinion. What test of opinion have the Government carried out? How can this measure be presented to the Committee as a matter of major importance to the country? What people in the conurbations are concerned about is how services can be provided adequately to protect them in their homes and their streets. They are concerned about how to find jobs. For such areas, the question that we should be considering is unemployment, and not this nonsensical measure which is before us, merely—as I said on Second Reading—at the whim of the Prime Minister.

On the authority of someone who was very close to the Conservative party working party on this issue, I can say that, originally, the manifesto was to state that there would be a review of the local government system under the new Conservative Government. That would have been entirely in accord with the amendments. Nine days after the general election was called, that commitment was crossed out by the Prime Minister. I challenge the Secretary of State to say whether that is true or false. I understand that that is what happened.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin rose——

Hon. Members: Give way.

Mr. Wareing: I will indeed give way in a moment. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) has confirmed what I say, in a sense.

Mr. Jenkin: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can have been in his place an hour and a half ago, when I replied to the same allegation when it was made by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw).

Nine days after the election was called, the manifesto was published. Thousands and thousands of copies of it were distributed around the country. The manifesto had taken some time to print. The idea that such a change could have been made at that time is absurd. I shall deal with the point again when I reply to the debate, but the hon. Gentleman must not be fooled by some of the statements that have been made on the matter.

Mr. Wareing: You will have noticed, Mr. Walker, that the Secretary of State will not confirm or deny that it was the Prime Minister who determined that, in the final manifesto, there should appear the abolition of the met councils rather than a promise to review the system of local government. Such a review would not have required legislation. The Local Government Act 1972, which was put through by a Government of which the Secretary of State was a member, presaged a review of local government in 10 to 15 years. Amendment No. 1 would put that requirement into effect. As a member of the previous Conservative Government, the right hon. Gentleman should promise such a review.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Further to the exchange between my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), my right hon. Friend must exercise care when dealing with these matters. It is widely known, as a result of the process of osmosis, that this matter was never properly discussed in Cabinet. As far as we know, it came up once at the tail-end of a general Cabinet discussion and was very much an afterthought. I must not transgress the rules and conventions on this matter but, as far as can be ascertained, it appears that two members of the Cabinet declared themselves in favour of the proposal and no one else said anything on the subject. My right hon. Friend must therefore be careful. I am sure that he is not trying to mislead the House, but he must refrain from giving the impression that the matter was given the conventional endorsement of the Cabinet, as we would expect in regard to such a controversial and sweeping measure. That is the sadness of the background to the Bill, which was referred on Second Reading.

During the Second Reading debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page) declared himself enthusiastically in favour of abolition of the GLC. I have not had a word with him about referring to what he said, but shall try to do so as soon as possible later this evening. After the Second Reading debate, one of my constituents told me that opinion in Harrow appeared to be evenly divided about abolition of the GLC and its replacement by a successor authority. I do not get that impression. I do not wish to make a Second Reading speech, but I must observe that I have been inundated with letters from people, including Conservatives, who have expressed gross dismay at the essence of the Bill and what it stands for. As several hon. Members have dealt with the metropolitan counties, I hope that I shall be forgiven for dwelling on the GLC.

Because he was interrupted so much, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West did not have time in his Second Reading speech to discuss the Bill or the proposal to abolish the GLC, but he referred to the disastrous effect of the GLC in regard to roads and said that, 15 years ago, he had tried to get a road in his constituency put right. The only problem is that the road was not in his constituency then and it is not in his constituency now. I hope to be able to bring that to the attention of my hon. Friend soon. However, that example shows how important it is, whether on Second Reading or in Committee, for right hon. and hon. Members to refer to the Bill.

Sadly, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) did not deploy a good argument and my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) came in but briefly and made a somewhat incoherent speech. Admittedly, he had not read the Bill or the amendments, but he has now disappeared, although right hon. and hon. Members might want to refer to what he said.

I shall now return to the valid objections to the Bill and therefore to an expression of support for amendments that are designed to ask the Government, with humility but forcibly and reasonably, to think again carefully about this proposal. Amendment No 1 proposes a Royal Commission. There are tempting arguments in support of that and I and other Conservative Members might consider doing that in the absence of my right hon. Friend advancing reasonable arguments to the contrary.

Several Conservative Members have proposed a formula that would produce an intra-parliamentary inquiry, which might take less time than a Royal Commission. It gives me no pleasure to support the Opposition amendment, but there are times when right hon. and hon. Members have to get up and say what they believe is right. A Royal Commission might be the right method. I mean no disrespect to parliamentarians here and in another place, but it is the only mechanism of getting a profound and outside independent inquiry which, by solemn political and constitutional convention, is an absolute engagement. It has always been the case that there should not be legislative and constitutional upheavals of local government structures without such an inquiry.

I should like to refer to what The Sunday Times said on 25 November 1984—just after the Bill was published. It said that there was not a strong case for keeping the Greater Manchester council. I disagree, but shall not go into that argument now. It continued:

"People do however talk of themselves as Londoners. The capital is a recognisable geographical and social entity. It requires a London-wide authority to maintain its cultural and economic viability, and we hope that in its passage through Parliament, the Bill will be amended accordingly.

Even then, the Bill will be a monument to a missed opportunity. Local government can only be reformed once in a while. What was needed, this time, was a radical, fully thought-through reorganisation, embracing finance as well as structure, thus treating the whole malaise. Instead, in its haste to despatch Ken Livingstone and his comrades, the government has produced a bosched job."

Two months before, the Financial Times of 20 September 1984 said, in what is now a well-known quotation which was referred to on Second Reading, similar things about London being a collection of villages but a cohesive capital city of international importance, and therefore needing commensurate treatment in its structural organisation.

I have always been naive in assuming, in an old-fashioned way, that the Tory party in government has not historically been in the business of creating huge political upheavals, least of all on a decision based on people being in a political bad temper and when that decision would not save money. Indeed, the proposition will cost London ratepayers more. If the Bill goes through without being amended as proposed, it will create such a disastrous upheaval in London that it cannot possibly go into Committee upstairs without the commitment of a huge amount of time to examine it properly. The Government have the opportunity to accept these amendments or later ones tonight. As The Sunday Times said recently:

"a lingering question hangs over the great investment of Parliamentary time and political energy about to take place. What relevance does all this re-jigging of boundaries and functions have for the real agenda of British political economy in the second half of the 1980s?"

I hope that my right hon. Friend and the Minister, who have the unenviable, indeed, hapless and miserable task of getting this awful Bill through will bear in mind that a change of mind in the face of overwhelming evidence from all parts of the House, far from being a sign of weakness, is a sign of political strength.

Mr. Heddle: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dykes: I have little time.

Mr. Heddle: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The Committee has listened, as it always does, with great respect to what he has said. As he prefaced his speech with a reference to my speech, perhaps he would make it quite clear how he stood on the abolition of the GLC in the general election of June 1983. From where I was in Mid-Staffordshire, I got the impression that a considerable number of voters in Greater London supported the abolition of the GLC, as is evidenced by the presence of many of my hon. Friends who perhaps owe their present position to the wealth of opinion against the GLC at that election.

Mr. Dykes: I gave way only because I referred to my hon. Friend's remarks. I am not sad that I did, because it gives me the opportunity to repeat that I was a co-author of the 1976 pamphlet, which the Minister also wrote. Pamphlets carry collective responsibility, especially when the chapters do not have attributional names attached to them. We all enthusiastically said that London needed a strategic Londonwide authority. [Interruption.] Whips do not normally intervene from a sedentary position, but I recognise the exception this time.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West) rose——

6.30 pm

Mr. Dykes: I shall not give way at the moment. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) has not been present for long. I should like to continue, because I do not wish to take up too much time.

The co-authors also said that such an authority could be called the Greater London council, or, as that was rather a corny name, something else. In January, February and March 1983, through the local press and local broadcasting in London, I made it crystal clear that I was opposed to the abolition of the GLC. That was manifest in my election campaign. I was asked two questions on the subject during the campaign and I made that clear when I answered them. Everyone, locally and throughout London, knew that that was my consistent position.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin rose——

Mr. Dykes: I shall not give way, although I shall on a later occasion. I am explaining my position. I have already taken rather a long time to do so, and I am aware that other hon. Members wish to speak.

It is definitely not a sign of weakness for a Government to listen to arguments and realise that second thoughts are a legitimate part of the democratic response of any great Government. Because such solemn issues about democracy and accountability are at stake, the Government would receive tremendous applause by doing so. Although it has been said before, I commend to the Committee again the utterances of a courageous Conservative at county hall, Bernard Brook-Partridge, in his article,

"Whither, not wither, local government?"

He said that this was not merely a disagreement about policy but

"a dispute about principle and constitutional legitimacy."

That is the anxiety that assails those of us who are against these proposals in detail and, therefore, in favour of this kind of amendment, and who are worried about the constitutional background to them. We know the history of the matter. On all previous occasions Conservative Governments have endorsed independent outside reports and external examinations that have concluded that London needs a Londonwide authority.

Once again we thank the wisdom of the Financial Times. A final paragraph of its leading article today entitled

"The reform of local councils", states:

"London is a conundrum."

Perhaps the paper is returning to the theme enunciated in September. It continues:

"At least in the metropolitan areas the major cities such as Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, will still have a city-wide authority after abolition. The capital will not. The Government has had no answer to critics who point out the absurdity of ignoring the common interests which exist between the disparate villages and communities which make up one of the world's largest and most important capitals. The case for abolishing the Greater London Council is clearly much weaker than for the metropolitan counties and, on present evidence, ought not to proceed at all.

An opportunity for sensible reform has been missed."

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West) rose——

Mr. Dykes: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me for not giving way. I am aware that I am taking up time. I know that the Government Whip would like me to give way, but I have given way several times already.

Without burdening the Committee with too many quotations, I commend to all hon. Members who want a genuinely constructive solution to the question of the future of London the article by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). In an article in The Guardian of 7 December he concluded:

"There is however another option which could meet the obvious need to curb the wildly excessive discretionary spending powers of the GLC, to rationalise the strategic government of London and yet retain an elected voice for our capital city".

He was referring to a total of 4 per cent. of the GLC's total spending, and the 1·5 per cent. of the most contentious areas of its spending, with which I also violently disagree. The 4 per cent. is the same ratio as that which existed when Horace Cutler was in charge of the GLC.

The article states that the option is "to institute a directly elected representative body for London whose functions and powers would be determined by Parliament, following a Select Committee Inquiry."

I shall not say any more about that in case I am out of order, because it will be the subject of a later amendment.

Whatever the form of the inquiry, whether it is a Royal Commission or not — there are arguments that that would be the best way—it might conclude that that would be its option because the present legislative proposal is a recipe for complete chaos, and disaster in future. That is why I support the amendment.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is a pleasure to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). If the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) wishes to speak, the House will be delighted to listen to him making a speech rather than to his comments from a sedentary position.

The hon. Gentleman made a good speech, as did the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on Monday night. It is often said that the Labour party is intolerant of opposition. My eyes have been opened to the intolerance of Conservative Members to dissident voices within their ranks. That is a matter of especial concern when those dissident voices are clearly talking good sense. I ask Conservative Members for one moment to lay aside some of the prejudices that they bring with them into the Chamber and to reflect on what their reaction would be, had a Labour Government brought forward proposals to restructure local government based on such a sketchy undertaking in a manifesto.

That is the point at issue, and the central feature of the amendment. It is intellectually insulting for the House to consider how the Bill was formulated. We have heard how the abolition of the GLC got into the Conservative party manifesto. There seems to be no argument that it was introduced at the behest of the Prime Minister and against the advice of her party policy committee. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) gave us that evidence.

I understand that Prime Ministers tend at times to say, "Put this in the manifesto, or else there will be trouble". The Labour party has experienced that. A previous Labour Prime Minister made it clear that if a proposal to abolish the House of Lords were in the manifesto, he would resign. I do not know whether the Prime Minister made that sort of threat to her colleagues, but the manifesto undertaking was clearly there because she decided that it should be.

On many occasions the Secretary of State said that discussions had taken place a year before the undertaking to abolish the GLC was written into the manifesto. However, he has not said with whom those discussions took place. Did they take place in the Cabinet or in the Department of the Environment? On whose authority did they take place? What was the outcome of the discussions? The only evidence that the House has is that the Prime Minister insisted that the abolition of the GLC should be written into the manifesto. That is the intellectual insult that has been delivered to the House and the country.

Mr. Maples: The hon. Gentleman pretends constantly that the proposal to abolish the GLC is a diabolical, secret Tory plot. How does he square that with the fact that the Labour party programme of 1982 called for the same thing? It called for a root and branch reorganisation, and stated:

"We favour the creation in England and Wales of unitary authorities."

Mr. Banks: That is not a valid point. There is nothing wrong with any Government considering the structure of local government.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Does my hon. Friend agree that that is precisely what this series of amendments proposes should occur? Therefore, the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) will presumably support them.

Mr. Banks: If we were debating a Bill that had been the product of a Royal Commission inquiry or a public inquiry, and it was based on a measured consideration of the needs of local government in London and the rest of the country, I admit that we might still oppose it. That is a function of opposition. But the Government's case would have been much stronger, because they could have prayed in aid the fact that the Bill was based on evidence taken by Royal Commission or by a public inquiry. They cannot say that. All they can say is that the manifesto said that they would do it.

I have some sympathy with a Government who say, "It is a manifesto commitment and we shall carry it out." However, to take up the words of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, it is still for the Government to prove their case to the House. As he said, that case has not been proved. It is symptomatic of the failure to prove the case that there have been so many weak arguments from the few Conservative Members who are prepared to speak in favour of the proposals.

The Herbert commission that sat between 1957 and 1960 took millions of words in evidence. It produced a unanimous report that had great standing in local government, in the House and in the country as a whole. Hon. Members should contrast the Herbert commission's report with the back-of-the-fag-packet undertaking that brought about this proposal. How can we contrast the 66 words in a Conservative party manifesto — by all accounts written in by the Prime Minister, unaided, and against the advice of her party policy committee—with all the words of the Herbert commission, which suggested the present structure of local government in London?

Most of the Herbert commission's views were supported by the Marshall inquiry of 1978. There were two major inquiries into the structure of local government in London, both conducted under Conservative Governments. That must be contrasted with 66 words in the Conservative party manifesto.

I hope that when the Labour party is in government it will carry out its manifesto pledges, but I hope—indeed, I know—that they will have been thought out in greater depth and with more intellectual effort than has this back-of-the-fag-packet policy.

I wonder whether Ministers have re-read the report of the Marshall inquiry. I am especially interested to know whether the Minister for Local Government has done so. I will not go through all the evidence that he gave to the inquiry, because I am sure that it will be mentioned many times during the long Committee nights until March. He will have to do better than to say that it was not really his evidence. He carries much responsibility for what he wrote in 1978, with much of which the Opposition agree. Many of his proposals were similar to those contained in the 1981 Labour party manifesto. I congratulate him on his prescience in that respect, and I am only sorry that he is now trying to distance himself from the views that he held those few years ago.

6.45 pm

Hon. Members will remember that the Labour GLC also made a manifesto pledge in 1981, when this trouble started. Had the Labour party not won the GLC elections in 1981, and had Mr. Kenneth Livingstone not been elected to the leadership of the GLC, I am convinced that we would not now be discussing the abolition of the GLC. The GLC's manifesto undertaking to introduce cheap fares in London was challenged in the courts by Bromley council—an authority that now supports the abolition of the GLC. Although the GLC prayed in aid the fact that there was a manifesto undertaking, the then Master of the Rolls, Lord Denning, said:

"A manifesto issued by a political party—in order to get votes—is not to be taken as gospel. It is not to be regarded as a bond, signed, sealed and delivered. It may contain—and often does contain—promises and proposals that are quite unworkable or impossible of obtainment. When the party gets into power, it should consider any proposal or promise afresh—on its merits—without any feeling of being obliged to honour it or being committed to it. It should then consider what is best to do in the circumstances of the case and to do it if it is practicable and fair."

When Lord Denning uttered those words in overturning the GLC's manifesto commitment to reduce fares in London, I do not remember many Conservative Members protesting that it was a manifesto undertaking that should be upheld. In the circumstances, it comes ill from the Conservative party to say that the manifesto is all, that the undertaking is the only relevant thing and that no other considerations should be entertained.

The Herbert commission, the Marshall inquiry and the Layfield inquiry have all considered the structure and financing of local government. I noted the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle). I tried to intervene because I wished to ask a question about a point that he made. I hope that in future, in the interests of good debate, he will give way rather than steadfastly refuse to answer the point. I shall gladly give way to him if he wishes to answer my question now. Does he support the idea in the Layfield report of a local income tax? Many Opposition Members argue that rates are not a fair form of taxation, mainly because they have a regressive impact and they take no account of the ability to pay of those who must foot the rates bill. Few Conservative Members have supported the idea of a local income tax. The Layfield inquiry also suggested greater local authority powers; that again is something with which the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire has not come to grips.

For many years, we have had major inquiries into the structure of government in London. Fights between county hall and central Government are almost part of our historical process. But every change in local government structure in London—I have confined my remarks to London for obvious reasons—has followed intense consultation and study. The Bill is not worthy of consideration by the House. It is a fag-packet proposal written into the manifesto by the Prime Minister in a fit of great passion. The House should not discuss it tonight in a fit of great passion.

Mr. Keith Speed (Ashford): I apologise to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) for not being here to hear his speech, as I was in another Committee.

I have been a Government Whip and was an Under-Secretary with responsibility for local government affairs when various new procedures were brought in in 1972-73, with the creation of the metropolitan counties. I take full responsibility, having been a Minister, for what we did then, but in retrospect I think that the creation of those councils was a mistake. However, I am extremely attracted by the arguments made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour), my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) and others who have said that at the moment, the Government, both with their rate-capping Bill and this Bill, are treating the symptoms and not the cause of local government problems. Therefore, what we need and what this and other amendments are suggesting, is a proper, independent look at both the structure and finance of local government, as the two essentially go together.

The Bill is a major reform of the structure, but with no independent inquiry. When I was shadow spokesman for local government from 1975 to the end of 1977, about the same time that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East was writing his pamphlets, I spent my time going up and down the country speaking with the full backing of the shadow Cabinet. I was saying that a Conservative Government believed in local government and wanted to see more powers devolved from central to local government, and not the other way round. I shall not bore my right hon. and hon. Friends with the speeches that I made then, but I draw their attention to a speech that I made in Gloucester, which sets out our philosophy in great detail. There was a Conservative Central Office handout running to 14 pages, so important was the policy statement on this. Time after time, I underlined that the fact that we trusted local government and wanted to devolve powers to it, because it was locally accountable. A considerable number of powers will be going from the Greater London and metropolitan county councils to the Government. That is against what I believed in at that time, and still believe in today, and it is a profoundly un-Tory approach to these issues.

There is a central problem, which has led to this Bill, and which could have been tackled by an independent inquiry or a Royal Commission. It is that at the moment we have taxation without representation in local government. In my constituency of Ashford, about 30 per cent. of the local government electorate pay domestic rates. In the borough of Lambeth, where I have a flat, 22 per cent. of the local government electorate pay rates. That is a farcical situation and it is no good wittering on about Mr. Livingstone, Mr. Knight or anybody else until we can put that right, so that when people are voting for local government they realise that they are not only voting but will have directly to meet some of the costs themselves. When only one in five in some of the London boroughs, and even fewer than a third in my constituency, pay rates, clearly something is wrong. To tamper with that through this Bill or through rate capping is putting the cart before the horse.

Since the Layfield inquiry, modern computer technology and other developments have made it easier to have a system of local income tax, should that be the way to go, or a local service tax, or whatever. In the 1970s, it would have been difficult to do that, because the technology was not there to do it without creating vast numbers of civil servants and bureaucrats. If we wished to introduce such a system now, the technology would be there.

This Bill has been introduced without a proper investigation or report. Many of us believe that such a report would be not only practically sensible but constitutionally necessary. All the facts that have been given tonight show that on every major constitutional reform—the abolition of the largest authority in the United Kingdom is certainly a major constitutional reform —there has been a proper, wide-ranging committee of inquiry or a Royal Commission.

[Mr. Keith Speed]

I shall not stray into the details of how this manifesto commitment was arrived at. I shall just say that there was a manifesto commitment about the reform of the domestic rating system, which I believe would still be possible, but that was put on one side. Therefore, we have establishd that manifesto commitments are not the Ark of the Covenant. Anyway, there is a way to get over this manifesto commitment, as Mr. Greengross, the Conservative leader in the GLC, has proved in his excellent pamphlet.

Finance is the key and heart of the problem of local government, not only in London but outside as well, but it is not being examined. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced at the party conference that another investigation would be set up, but by the time that that report is finished and there is an effective prospect of action, it will be after the next general election. By that time, the Bill will have been enacted, the GLC will have gone and there will be more central control. It will go against what many of us on the Conservative Benches, and, I am sure, even my right hon. Friend himself, who is as good a Tory as I am, believe in, which is to have local accountability and not to bring things back to Whitehall and central Government, which cannot be right.

It is breathtaking to go around the major cities in the western world and see how in each one people are either New Yorkers, Berliners, Parisiens or Londoners. Each one has a major, directly elected and accountable local authority looking after it. Once the Bill has gone through, this country will be unique in not having such a body for its major cities. What is more, that will have happened without the benefit of a rational report. That is not acceptable. I am sorry, but I believe that this is against the Conservative tradition, and I have been a member of the Conservative party for 34 years. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench to look at this again, not least because of the financial and other problems and not least because, while abolishing the GLC will abolish Mr. Livingstone, it will solve no problems for Londoners or the Conservative party.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I hope that the Government will listen to the comments of experienced and caring members of their party as well as to the arguments from Opposition Benches. Hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed) with experience of local government, and as a member of a Government, and other hon. Members should be listened to, if the Government are to restore any credibility to the claim that they have listened to anybody since they introduced the proposals.

Amendment No. 35 in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends is being discussed with this group of amendments and will be voted on at the end of our debate. My colleagues and I will vote in support of any of the amendments that are put to the vote because we believe that at this stage it is fundamentally important that the Government recognise that they cannot sufficiently impartially and adequately, and in the time that they have given themselves, allow for a proper reorganisation of local government in England. That is not possible, and it will not happen. Unless the Government allow some expertise, intelligence and advice to come their way, we shall be heading for an unsatisfactory and troublesome state in Britain in the years ahead.

The result of all this will be that the Government will go down in history with a reputation of having been arrogant and undemocratic. That will be to their detriment. Although they may not care to discriminate, Conservative Members who come from constituencies such as Harrow and other places on the boundaries of Greater London can speak with more authority of the feelings of their constituents on this issue than can such hon. Members as the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle). He could not have had the abolition of the GLC as the fundamental point on which he fought the last election, no matter what his colleagues were saying.

The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) made the most amazing and incoherent contribution. I hope that it will be reported back at his home that he came here to represent his constituents not having bothered to read either the Bill or the amendments. He said that he did not want to make himself a self-appointed expert. The trouble with the Bill is that the Government have effectively made themselves self-appointed experts. They could claim that they obtained their authority to be the experts from the election. Of course, we now have a new theory in the Conservative party's political philosophy—the doctrine of the mandate. But it must first be remembered that at the last general election the Conservative party's vote fell, and thus its authority with regard to this proposal is at least arguable. Furthermore, we all know that the election of a Government does not necessarily mean that each point of their manifesto was endorsed. It is certainly alien to the Conservative party to claim that it is committed to the doctrine of the manifesto. Many arguments have already been well presented on that point, and I hope that they will serve to debunk the idea that the doctrine of the manifesto lies easily in Conservative mouths.

The arrogance and undemocratic nature of the proposal is borne out by the fact that the Secretary of State and his colleagues regularly reassert that the counties' powers will be returned to the boroughs. In London's case that is so fundamentally inaccurate as to show that the Government obviously have not listened to the volume of accurate evidence that has been given.

The time factor is not a persuasive argument against there being some form of public inquiry, because if the Government so wished, they could accommodate an inquiry within this Parliament's timetable that would allow proposals to be put through thereafter. But there should be a public inquiry, because, unlike the occasion when the GLC and the metropolitan counties were set up, we are now seeing for the first time in the reform of English local government a dismantling and dismembering process. That is quite different from setting up such bodies. In the Conservative party's election address there was, indeed, a proposal to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties, but there were no details as to the destinations of those powers. Although we would all accept the proposition of the hon. Member for Ashford that as much power as possible should be devolved locally, that will not be the result of this legislation. Thus the Government cannot claim that they have put a simple proposition to devolve power to the people or that that is what they are doing in the Bill.

Mr. Maples: In the unlikely event that the alliance had won the last election, would the hon. Gentleman have proposed the establishment of a Royal Commission to consider its manifesto proposal to abolish a tier of local government?

Mr. Hughes: Quite clearly the answer is yes. Indeed, we specifically said so. We said that the order of events should be that we would establish, with consultation, regional government in England. I think that it is highly likely that, before the next election, the Labour party will also hold that view. I do not critisise it for coming to that view, but I think that that is the way that its policy is moving. Thereafter changes in powers between levels of local government within the regions would be the subject of discussion within them. If regions wanted slightly different forms, they could have them, because that is what devolution and decentralisation is all about.

It is not always appropriate to apply the same principles to all cities. As London has asserted over the years, it is certainly inappropriate that a capital should have the same local government structure as other cities. After all, it inevitably has a different nature. That is why it is always argued that the Metropolitan police must be under the direct control of the Home Secretary, as opposed to being under the control of a democratic police authority. Thus, we clearly said and would, I hope, never do other than ensure, that there would be an independent and proper inquiry before any fundamental local government change took place.

Until now, that was of course the Tory position. In 1970, the Tory manifesto—which was written after the Redcliffe-Maud commission had reported—said:

"We are convinced of the need for reform of the present structure of local government. Unfortunately, the Terms of Reference given to the Redcliffe-Maud and Wheatley Royal Commissions which examined this problem in England and in Scotland respectively were restricted. As a result, the crucial questions of devolution of power from the central government and of local government finance were not adequately dealt with in their Reports. We believe that these matters must be considered and that those concerned in local government must be fully consulted before final decisions are made."

Then, and perhaps most importantly, the manifesto said:

"We will bring foreward a sensible measure of local government reform which will involve a genuine devolution of power from the central government and will provide for the existence of a two-tier structure. There will be full consultation about the pattern of boundaries and the effect of changes upon existing resources of local government."

Even after the Royal Commission had reported, the Conservative party that gained office in 1970 — the Secretary of State was then a member of the party—said that there would be thereafter further and proper consultation. After that, the changes were brought about.

Whenever changes were made it was never even contemplated that such a substantial and radical constitutional change could be entered into without an impartial and objective inquiry. The Liberal party, together with its alliance partner, proposes a series of local inquiries. They have a specific role. Indeed, I hope that the Secretary of State will accept from me—as I am sure that he will in view of his legal background—that they have a perfectly proper constitutional role which could be used in these circumstances. The special report of the Council on Tribunals, which was published in January 1980, states:

"Powers to hold statutory inquiries have also existed for many years. Their essential purpose is two-fold: to provide Ministers with factual reports and recommendations which form a basis for policy decisions, and to ensure that citizens whose interests are affected have an opportunity of examining and probing the issues and putting their objections."

One of the most eminent constitutional lawyers of this century, Professor de Smith, had some relevant things to say in his last major book on this subject. I shall quote just two sentences, as they include examples that relate to this debate. He said:

"Local inquiries are used for three main purposes. As a means of consulting and informing local opinion, and gleaning local information as to the likely impact of a proposed administrative decision (for example, to alter constituency or local boundaries, or to amalgamate police forces)"—

among other things, this Bill involves changing the structure of police forces——

"affecting the interests of persons and bodies in that locality."

It was then said—and I accept it—that:

"This slows down the pace of decision-making but provides the decision-maker with a better fund of knowledge."

It is important that the fund of knowledge should be accurate and generally available, so that even if the Government ultimately choose to ignore it, they do so in full knowledge of what they are doing and cannot then be blamed for what they will be principally blamed for after this legislation, which is perhaps not that they carried out a reform but that they did not consult.

At the next election I imagine that politically the Government's greatest weakness—as many Conservative Members know—will be that there was no inquiry. It does not matter whether or not that inquiry was into matters such as those gone into by the report of PA Management Consultants on the metropolitan counties. The fact would be that there was no inquiry, the Government had not listened and they had no objective evidence. Those factors will lead to a weakness that they will never be able to justify later.

All commentators, and particularly The Times of 24 November, have said that, as a result, this Bill has an unstable impermanent air and is a breeding ground of discontent. Consequently, in five or six years' time the House will have to go through the exercise again. It will be the taxpayers and ratepayers who pay for that. The Government will not do so, because they have no money other than that which they glean from this country's citizens. If we make a mistake this time, it will be the Government's fault. Indeed, it will be an extremely costly mistake.

The advantage of our proposal is that there would be different solutions for different areas. Perhaps districts on the edge of metropolitan counties such as Merseyside—for example, Wirral or Sefton—could establish a case for running their own services rather than being encompassed by the broad brush approach of the Bill, which is a two-stage approach—in the first instance a joint board and then the opportunity to opt out at a later date. Such a proposal would allow local people, not in a politicised or polemical way—including representatives at district and county level, hon. Members and the public generally — to put before an inspector specific ideas upon which he could report, and which could provide a factual basis for discussion in the House. It would be without the quite clear prejudice that the Government have brought to the issue.

One argument must be laid to rest, because the Government continually seek to use it in support of their proposition. They say that it is not true that throughout western Europe there are authorities for capital cities. The Institute of Local Government Studies — a highly respected body—specifically studied the administration of metropolitan areas in western democracies. In its report it states:

"metropolitan structures and powers are generally the result of prolonged local study, debate and consultation, in order to set up arrangements which have as wide as possible multi-party consensus and may therefore be expected to be relatively stable. Commonly their operation is the subject of thorough review by independent commissions, as well as by parliamentary committees, and changes tend to be incremental . . . The direction of development is strongly towards . . . decentralisation."

The report ends:

"British local government is a frail and vulnerable plant compared with that in other Western European Countries, lacking their constitutional shield and their high levels of connection with central government."

It is untrue to say that in any other western European country there is not a tier of government between central Government and the lowest tier of local government. I hope that the Secretary of State will not use that argument again, because there is no evidence to support it.

There are two options tonight. We either have quick justice or we have good justice; we either have quick law or we have good law. I hope that at even this late stage the Government will accept that, because the matter is of such fundamental importance. As we go into this long, proper and considered period of Committee, it is far better to have a good law at the end of the process. We shall achieve that only with independent evidence and an independent inquiry. If we do not, there will be muddle, it will be a mistake, and we shall all pay for it and regret it.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Like the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), I hope that the Government will listen. However, judging by their recent record on local government legislation, there is not much hope of their doing so. If they do not, although they will get their legislation through Parliament I fear that they will create a banana skin of proportions that even they have not yet discovered.

I wish to take up a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples). He asked what a successor Londonwide authority would do. I am not saying that Lord Marshall was 100 per cent. right, but it is worth recording that he undertook an inquiry at the behest of the last Conservative leader of the GLC. He was given a free hand to respond to any criticism and to make any recommendations that he felt inclined to make after his inquiries—including the possibility of the abolition of the GLC. He did not reach that conclusion. Indeed, he identified 38 functions that a metropolitan authority should fulfill.

The GLC currently exercises 27 of those 38 functions. The London Boroughs Association, in its response to the White Paper "Streamlining the Cities", also identified 27 functions that should be managed by a Londonwide authority, and which could not be managed by individual local authorities. It is not good enough to say that there is not a job for a Londonwide authority.

Mr. Maples: I accept that some functions remain, but it is difficult to accept that any of them is important enough to necessitate the creation of a special Londonwide authority to manage it.

Mr. Morrison: I am not saying that Lord Marshall is absolutely right. However, he recommended an increase in the number of functions, not a decrease. At least he went into the issue in some depth, as others have done —for example, Mr. Alan Greengross, who was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed). Those with experience of London government believe strongly that it is impossible for London to be administered properly without some Londonwide authority. If an inquiry was set up, I believe that it would reach the same conclusion. That is why the Government do not want an inquiry. I intend to support the amendment.

Our manifesto said that we would abolish the metropolitan counties and the GLC and return most of their functions to the boroughs and districts. In principle, I am not against the abolition of the GLC or the metropolitan councils. There is plenty of scope for evolving the GLC. However, it is absolutely certain that most of the functions under this Bill will not be returned to the boroughs and districts. Many of the functions being taken from the GLC and given either to boroughs or quangos have never been administered by the boroughs, so there is no question of returning them to the boroughs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) has already referred to the leading article in today's Financial Times. I suppose that the nearest the Financial Times comes to being a Socialist newspaper is the fact that it is printed on pink paper. It is generally thought to be a Conservative paper, albeit one that believes in good administration and good sense. The article stated:

"But there are certain criteria which must be fulfilled for changes to be acceptable."

The article went on:

"The first is that the new arrangements stand a reasonable chance of being an improvement on the old. The second is that accountability is not reduced, so that pressure for efficiency and sensitivity to local aspirations is not diminished. The third is that democracy and democratic principles are neither weakened nor violated.

The Bill fails on all three counts."

Later the article stated:

"The three key areas requiring amendment are the Government's reserve powers, joint boards and London. The Bill is littered with reserve powers to give a degree of centralised control over local issues which makes efficient service provision less, rather than more, likely."

As I have always understood it, the Conservative party's principle and, perhaps, part of its philosophy, is that there should be the maximum possible distribution of power; yet in this Bill the Secretary of State tends to take unto himself these reserve powers. Day after day, week after week, month after month, leading politicians and great statesmen—even Lord Stockton, in his maiden speech in the other place—have criticised the degree of centralisation in the state. The Government's response is to make the state more centralised. That is an extraordinarily contradictory attitude. It is true that, under this Bill, some powers would go to the boroughs, but many more would go to the quangos or, indirectly, to Whitehall. Worst of all, there are rows of reserve powers.

The GLC has rightly been criticised for wasting an enormous amount of money on advertisements. The natural inclination of some of us who support the Conservative party is to believe that the advertisements do not tell the true story. Last week, not for the first time, a number of national papers contained an advertisement headed:

"Who Patrick Jenkin plans to put in the place of London's democratically elected councillors."

Beneath the heading, there were nine photographs of my right hon. Friend who is described as the head of education, planning, traffic control, fire service, housing improvements, arts, waste disposal, grants to voluntary groups and flooding and land drainage. I said to myself, "Rubbish, that simply cannot be true." Unfortunately, on looking into the matter one discovers that, because of the reserve powers, there is a degree of truth in that advertisement. Again the point is made that the Government intend centralising power.

I do not want to go through the justification for each of the nine claims, except with regard to education. If enacted, the Bill would give the Secretary of State the power to review the functions of the Inner London education authority and to transfer education to any of the inner London boroughs either before or after 1991. The Secretary of State for Education and Science will have the power to control for the first three years staffing levels and budgets. Apart from the fact that no other education authority is subject to such controls or to the permanent threat of break-up into smaller units, the provisions that leave my right hon. Friend with these powers are guaranteed to ensure that ILEA will live in a state of total uncertainty until 1991, or possibly later. I doubt that that will lead to good administration. Perhaps my right hon. Friend will be able to assure me that it will lead to good administration, but it is difficult to believe that that will happen.

I am utterly convinced that, if there is not a proper inquiry into the future of London and the metropolitan boroughs before this legislation is passed, we shall end up with a measure which will provide, at best, poor administration and, at worst, complete chaos.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I support the amendments. I suppose that it is a character defect on my part that I expect others, when I discuss issues dispassionately, rationally and intellectually, both inside and outside the Chamber, to respond in the same fashion. I am always confounded in my expectations, and I am afraid that that happened once again as a result of the Second Reading. My doubts about these amendments have been resolved. This morning, as I came to the House, I had grave doubts about the desirability of setting up a Royal Commission. I am now absolutely convinced of its desirability.

On Second Reading, I raised two issues — first, damage to the arts in Hackney and, secondly, the visual arts and the continuing control of the Hayward gallery by the Arts Council, which would result if this legislation were passed. I then wrote to the chairman of the Arts Council, Sir William Rees-Mogg, and suggested that I and a couple of my advisers should see him to discuss some of the issues. Hackney and the visual arts and the control of Hayward gallery were the only issues I suggested we should discuss.

Imagine my astonishment when, this morning, I received a letter from Sir William Rees-Mogg which stated:

"Dear Mr. Sedgemore

I do not see any point in having a discussion with you until you have made a further study of the Arts' Council's work. If you believe that our support for the Regional Arts Associations or such institutions as the Notting Hill Carnival, the Everyman Theatre in Liverpool or the Whitechapel Gallery represent the notion of an 'exclusive Mandarin art', or that they are 'restrictive, elitist, oligarchic and discriminatory', then it seems to me you insult the institutions that we do support. If you are not aware of our support for these institutions, then you should reconsider your position in the light of the work that we actually do."

Leaving aside the complete irrelevance of that letter to the concern I expressed about the Arts Council's marginalising, rejecting and defining as bad the work of women artists at the Hayward gallery, the chairman of that unelected quango is saying that he is not prepared to talk to the elected representatives of this country about major items of legislation before we reach the relevant clauses in Committee. That is one of the most powerful arguments one could adduce for setting up some type of inquiry or some type of Royal Commission to discuss some of these issues.

I shall bring out some of the constitutional issues involved in supporting these amendments if I read briefly what I am thinking of saying in reply to Sir William Rees-Mogg. My handwritten draft states:

"Dear Sir William Rees-Mogg,

Thank you for your letter of 10 Dec, which I was disturbed to read. You are a public servant and the staff under your control at the Arts Council are paid in part out of the taxes of the people of Hackney. For good or ill I am one of their elected representatives. As such my constituents want me to discuss with you or your officers two issues, namely,

(1) what the Arts Council will be able to do for Hackney when the GLC is abolished and, with it, its policy for the arts and the funds which accompany it, and

(2) what the Arts Council intends for the future of the South Bank if it takes over the complex under the Bill, and what plans it has to change its damaging policies over the Hayward Gallery, particularly in relation to the Gallery's treatment of women artists.

At our discussions, which I am sure that you will agree on mature reflection should take place, my constituents will expect me both to listen and to make suggestions. I have never heard of a public figure in your position refusing to see a Member of Parliament. If Ministers, chairpersons of nationalised industries, leaders of professional association, quango chiefs, and editors of great national newspapers can do so, I am not sure why you are refusing. As the Committee stage of the Local Government Bill proceeds, Conservative Ministers will be asking you for your briefings to deal with various amendments to the Bill which I shall put down in clauses which deal with the arts. In that context, your refusal to talk to a Labour MP whom you have in the past been only too happy to invite to PR luncheons will be seen as political bias. Although you are a Conservative, you are supposed to appear to be even-handed about these matters."

I then go on to explain that Sir William Rees-Mogg does not seem to understand the important practical and ideological issues involved in the Bill and that it is important for Members of Parliament to have access to him to discuss the issues involved.

7.30 pm

Mr. Tony Banks: There is one small textual amendment that my hon. Friend might like to make to his letter before he sends it. Will he make the abolition of the GLC conditional—"if" rather than "when"?

Mr. Sedgemore: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. We were discussing matters this afternoon in an unnamed Committee Room of the House, and I am sure that he will get his way. "If" will be the paramount word in the letter. I undertake to write that excellent amendment into my letter.

It is pathetic that the chairman of an unelected quango, when asked to discuss future major issues that we are dealing with in Committee, should, in effect, put his finger in his mouth and say, "I am not prepared to talk to Brian Sedgemore." We should not perhaps be too worried about what Sir William Rees-Mogg says, because anyone who can do what he did 10 years ago, and write a book and say that our economic problems could be solved by God and the gold standard is no doubt capable of writing a load of tosh about the Arts Council and misunderstanding the ideology of the authority that he runs.

We should send a clear message to Sir William Rees-Mogg from the House this evening. It is that his arrogance and ignorance are not just damaging to the impartiality of the Arts Council: they make it important that we have new procedures for considering Bills in the House. The amendments that we are talking about provide for an excellent procedure that we should have, perhaps not just on this but other Bills.

Mr. Soley: Any Secretary of State should be deeply disturbed by the number of people from all parts of the Committee and by the individuals and groups outside it who have condemned the Bill, not just because it is a bad Bill in terms of organisation, but because it is thought to be undemocratic. That is extremely important.

The problem for the Government is that many people inside and outside the Committee are deeply suspicious of their motives. It is important to put on record why we are suspicious and why many people outside the Committee, across the political spectrum, are suspicious of their motives. The first reason is that the authorities whom they seek to abolish are controlled by their political opponents. They are Labour authorities and a Conservative Government are seeking to abolish them.

I shall not build on my points in too much detail now but I may at another time in another place. The second point that needs to be borne in mind and which we have from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is that, because the Conservative party does not like the GLC's policies, it will abolish it.

Thirdly, the Government have made the point a number of times, inside and outside the House, that they want to cut public expenditure. We all know that they were elected on a ticket of cutting public expenditure and we all know that they have failed to cut central Government public expenditure. They have ended up trying to make local authorities cut their public expenditure for them. It is a classic case of, "Don't do as we do; do as we tell you."

The fourth reason for questioning the Government's motives is that it is becoming increasingly clear that they want to silence opposition. Let me spell that out. It is not just the silencing of Labour-controlled authorities, but what is perhaps more important and deeply disturbing, they wish to silence some of the minority groups that they do not like. That is why they have picked on the GLC.

I believe that the GLC has been far-sighted and brave in supporting many of the groups that it has. I wish to encourage it to do so, but the Government do not like that. No one gave the case away more than the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) when he went down what I regard as a profoundly dangerous road. He was saying that if we do not like what a local authority is raising money for, we should abolish that local authority because that level of rates should not be imposed on the individual. It follows that if a Government are spending the public's money in a way that is not popular, we should abolish the Government. I am all for abolishing the Government, but I wish to do it through the ballot box. I want that for local authorities as well.

This is a bad Bill. It is not just that the alternatives have not been thought out or that the many minority groups — the Victim Support Scheme, the ethnic minority groups—and major groups such as the police and fire service will be disrupted and disorganised as a result, but people here and outside profoundly distrust the Government's motives, and the Government must justify their actions.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: We have had an interesting and useful debate. I am sure that the Committee will forgive me if I say that much of it was a repeat of the arguments that were deployed by both sides of the House on Second Reading. I hope that the Committee will forgive me if I do not rehearse the arguments of principle on the main substance of the Bill.

The amendments call, in a variety of ways, for some form of inquiry from a Royal Commission at one end of the scale to a local inquiry of some kind, to which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) spoke briefly.

I shall start by reminding the Opposition Front Bench what their environment spokesman said about the Labour party's attitude to structural reform of local government about three months before the 1983 election. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) told a Labour party conference:

> "We shall therefore legislate to create unitary district authorities which will be responsible for all the functions in their area that they can sensibly undertake. We shall, of course, consult carefully and genuinely before we introduce our legislation. However, we shall set up no more inquiries. We shall legislate and we shall legislate so that these reforms will be in force during the lifetime of the next Parliament."

If that was the view of the Labour party spokesman on the environment, I fail to understand how the Opposition have the effrontery to table and speak to this group of amendments. It is absurd. They make clear what they were going to do and that they would have no inquiries.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): We said we would consult.

Mr. Jenkin: I am coming to consultation. I take the point, but there is a second large hole in the arguments that have been addressed to the Committee about that. They said that they would undertake their reform of structure, with unitary authorities devolving to the local level as far as could sensibly be done. I repeat the words of the right hon. Member for Gorton:

"we shall set up no more inquiries. We shall legislate".

Mr. Tony Banks: In the context of those remarks by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), will the Secretary of State comment on the position of the Greater London council? Secondly, will he accept it from me that I disagree very strongly with the views expressed by my right hon. Friend? I ask my hon.

Friends to be as rational in approaching those remarks as I have asked Conservative Members to be in approaching the Government's proposals this evening.

Mr. Jenkin: I can understand that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) may disagree with what one of his party's Front Bench spokesmen said, but the point is undeniable. The Labour party made it clear at its national conference on local government that that was its intention. According to my research, the right hon. Member for Gorton, who was the Opposition spokesman on the environment, and who presumably held that shadow portfolio throughout the 1983 election, campaign, appears not to have addressed one word on radio, on television, or to any audience to which he put out a press release, on the subject of the Conservative manifesto commitment to do the same in the metropolitan areas and in Greater London.

The hon. Member referred to what the right hon. Member for Gorton said about the GLC. His view was clear and I quoted it on Second Reading. He said:

"We shouldn't regard the existence of the GLC as sacrosanct. In my view it is an enormous bureaucracy which has a dubious role to play."—[Official Report, 3 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 30.]

The right hon. Member for Gorton has never made any secret of his dislike of the metropolitan county councils and of his desire to see local government powers returned to the city of Manchester, where his constituency is. He has never made any secret of his views about the unsuitability of the GLC. He made it perfectly clear that if a Labour Government had been elected they would have legislated without any inquiry.

Therefore, I listened with some cynicism to speech after speech from Labour Members saying how disgraceful it is for the Government to proceed with this sensible reform of local government without having indulged in a Royal Commission, a committee of inquiry, an audit commission, a local inquiry or anything else. It is a lot of humbug.

Mr. Straw: It is not humbug, because we have a record in government of consulting to a very great degree, as the Secretary of State knows, in the area of local government. He knows that we did so in setting up the Redcliffe-Maud Commission. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) also consulted extensively before bringing forward proposals for a much more modest measure than the Bill before the House.

The Secretary of State apparently disagrees — I understand why — with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Therefore, should not the Secretary of State have established a proper inquiry into the proposals before going ahead?

7.45 pm

Mr. Jenkin: I am not expressing a view on whether I agree with what the right hon. Member for Gorton said. I am saying that it is sheer hypocrisy for Labour Members to chide us for proceeding with this reform without having an inquiry, when it is clear and on the record that their own Front Bench had committed their party to do precisely the same thing. [Interruption.] So let us hear no more about that. We have consulted widely on our proposals, and I shall itemise them. In response to the views expressed, we have made a number of changes in what we originally proposed, and we have now brought legislation to the House. I found it very strange to have to sit here for nearly three hours listening to abuse of the Government for not having an inquiry before proceeding with the Bill.

With regard to consultation, there is a huge hole in the arguments which have been addressed to the Government Benches——

Mr. Favell: My right hon. Friend has dealt with the humbug of the Labour party. The 1983 manifesto of the alliance says on page 24 that the alliance would

"revitalise local government, restoring its independence and its accountability to the local electorate by . . . simplifying the structure of local government to make it more effective by abolishing one of the existing tiers of local government. This will be done by stages against the background of our proposals for the development of regional government. It would inevitably involve the eventual abolition of the Metropolitan Counties."

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend is right. I think that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) quoted the provision in the 1970 Conservative party manifesto, where it was said that inquiries would be set up.

There has been complete inconsistency in the arguments from the Opposition. On the one hand, we are accused of not having consulted properly on all the details of the proposed reform, and I refute that accusation. The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and one or two of my hon. Friends, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmore), charged the Government with preparing proposals which were not complete in every jot and tittle. We were accused of not having a proposal in the Bill for dealing with the Woolwich ferry. We were accused by my right hon. Friend of not having provided for precisely how the refuse disposal arrangements for London were to work. Yet, almost in the same breath, hon. Members have accused the Government of failing to consult.

Within a month or two of the general election we published a White Paper. As I said at the time, it was a White Paper with very green edges. It dealt in great detail with how the main proposal would be carried forward. Every chapter of the White Paper ended with a series of questions addressed to the readers. We made it clear that we were very prepared to listen to detailed arguments about the proposals.

Mr. Tony Banks: Yes, but the Government ignored them all.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is wrong, and I can give numerous examples showing that we took the fullest account of the views put to us by a wide range of people. We were prepared to listen to all the views that were put forward.

If there has been any lack of effective consultation on the details, the real blame rests with those authorities and those trade unions which have refused to enter into sensible bilateral discussion with the Government, with the staff commission or with anybody else, because they hoped that the whole thing would go away.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Secretary of State explain why he has refused to offer the same amount of money to the staff affected by abolition or by transfer as his right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) did in regard to the housing transfer order in 1982 dealing with former GLC housing?

Mr. Jenkin: The short answer to the hon. Gentleman is that if the interests that he represents—I understand that he is sponsored by the National Union of Public Employees——

Mr. Corbyn: And I am proud of it.

Mr. Jenkin: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman is proud of that; he would be proud of almost anything. If the union that sponsors him, which represents many local government employees, were prepared to respond to the invitation of the staff commission to discuss precisely that question, he would get the answer to it. As it is, his union has refused point blank to take part in any discussions. I do not know how he has the effrontery to stand up and ask a detailed question about the staff proposals. We published a lengthy document and invited the unions to discuss the matter. So the hon. Gentleman missed the point.

I should like to refer to the origins of the proposals——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: What about the changes that the Government have made?

Mr. Jenkin: If the hon. Gentleman would like it, I shall deal with the changes that we have made now. We were accused by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) of ignoring consultation. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said that Ministers had not listened. The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) said that there were no concessions to informed opinion. I have to tell them that they were all absolutely plumb bang wrong. The Opposition have welcomed warmly the decision, which was not in the original White Paper but which is now in the Bill, that the Inner London education authority should be a directly elected authority. In making that decision, we were impressed by the cross-party weight of opinion from Inner London that that would be an improvement in our proposals, and we accepted it.

Our original proposals on planning in the six metropolitan areas and London were criticised by planning experts as unnecessarily complicated. We therefore came forward with a radical change — the new idea of a unitary local plan, which has met with much more support. No doubt it will be debated during proceedings on the Bill, but it represents a significant change from the original proposal.

In our original proposals, we were accused of failing to take adequate account of what I might call regional arts institutions. We therefore came along with proposals, which again have been widely welcomed by the arts lobby, for more central funding of regional arts. It has almost ceased to be a factor in the abolition argument.

We were criticised that in the White Paper we were not making sufficient provision for the continuity of local government support for voluntary bodies. On Second Reading I spelt out the four measures that we have introduced, all since the White Paper, in response to consultation, to improve support for the voluntary bodies.

Originally, we envisaged that a local district council would be able to run its own bus service, but we made no provision for the fire service and the police service being devolved to the district council. In response to the many powerful representations from district councils in various parts of the country, particularly the west midlands and Merseyside, which wished to get back the powers that they had as county boroughs, we included in the Bill the power, after a reasonable period, to make an application to the appropriate Secretary of State.

On a relatively less important matter—but it was important to the people concerned—we were charged that in the White Paper we had not taken account of the value of the mobility scheme within London offering the choice of exchange of houses. We have brought forward proposals, which were spelt out in the Yellow Book, for a mobility scheme. Therefore, to say that the Government have ridden roughshod over public opinion and that we have paid no attention to people's views is a travesty of the truth. I hope that we shall hear no more of it.

I was asked a perfectly fair question by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and, I am sorry to say, some of my hon. Friends made the same charge against the Government, that somehow the proposal was dreamed up in the last few days before the manifesto was published.

Mr. Straw: Come on.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman also made that charge. I regret that some of my hon. Friends made the same charge. Nothing could be further from the truth. The argument about whether the GLC should change has been going on for years in London. Motions have been passed in London borough councils, in council after council, calling for the abolition of the GLC. We all know that the metropolitan county areas have never had the support of the metropolitan district councils from the day they were set up. Resolutions were being passed, councils were subscribing to the Sheffield resolution, letters were being written——

Mr. Wareing: Which councils on Merseyside?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman knows that only in 1982 Liverpool city council passed a resolution calling for the end of the Merseyside county council, under the leadership of Sir Trevor Jones. Therefore, it is all the more surprising that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is criticising the proposals. These arguments have raged for years. There was plenty of cross-party support for the proposal that we have now put forward. I understand that people may criticise some of the details. That is what the Committee stage of the Bill is all about, but to imagine that the proposal was somehow conjured out of nothing in the last few weeks of the 1983 election campaign is a travesty.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) made specific charges about the lack of consideration of this specific proposal within the Conservative party in the period leading up to the election and said, among other things, that it had gone to the Cabinet for the most cursory of examinations, when two Members spoke up in favour of it, and that was it. Was the hon. Gentleman correct?

Mr. Jenkin: Neither the hon. Gentleman nor my hon. Friend the member for Harrow, East has been a member of a Government. Perhaps they do not understand how the Cabinet committee system works. The details of such a proposal are most unlikely to be handled in Cabinet. The papers all go round. Those who are members of the Government know that perfectly well.

I can tell the hon. Member for Blackburn that on the issue of local government reform we had more piles of paper and hours of discussion in the year that led up to the election than on almost any other subject when I was Secretary of State for Industry. I shall refer to the point made by the hon. Member for Woolwich. There was a substantial amount of preparatory work in the Government before the election. When I arrived in the Department of the Environment after the election it was clear that a great deal of preparatory work had been done before the election in my Department and the other Departments concerned. As the Secretary of State for Industry and a member of the Cabinet, I had been aware of what was happening and was taking part in the decisions. The fact that a final decision was taken only shortly before the election does not mean that the analyses on which that decision was based were not exhaustive.

It does no credit to the case of those who seek to attack the proposals if they try to pretend that there was not a great deal of care and discussion. We did not discuss all the details because we were going to consult on them. We have put out many detailed consultation papers and have responded in considerable measure to the points that were made to us—

Mr. Dykes rose—

Mr. Jenkin: I have given way to my hon. Friend, and he refused to give way to me. My hon. Friend said that there was massive opposition to the proposal in Harrow. Harrow borough council supports it. The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) said that there was no support for it in Greater Manchester. He is a member of the Trafford council which supports this measure. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed), who has great experience of these matters and to whom I listened with great care, attacked the measure as creating massive centralisation. If one measures it by the budgetary expenditure this year, 95 per cent. of the expenditure will go to the boroughs, either individually or jointly. In the case of the metropolitan county councils, virtually 100 per cent. will go to them.

We shall examine the powers during the Committee stage of the Bill. This is not a massive centralising piece of legislation. It represents substantial devolution to the boroughs and districts. The hon. Member for Woolwich and many other hon. Members said that no local government reform has been carried out without it being preceded by a substantial inquiry. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Redcliffe-Maud. The fact is that the changes that took place following Redcliffe-Maud bore almost no relationship to what his committee had recommended. It reminded me of the examination question to a student who was asked to describe the principles of the Archimedes pump. He replied, "I know nothing about the Archimedes pump, but here is a list of the kings of Israel and Judaea."

When in opposition, the Labour party wants nothing but delay and indecision. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) was absolutely right. These amendments are a recipe for more delay, more uncertainty and more indecision. There is a mass of information based upon the Herbert report, the Redcliffe-Maud report and the Marshall report. Those reports give us all that we need by way of analytical background to all forms of local government. What then was needed was judgment in the light of experience. We have made that judgment. We have looked at the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council, made our judgment and brought forward our legislation. I ask the Committee to reject these amendments.

Mr. Cowans: Before dealing with the reply of the Secretary of State may I congratulate the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who has just become the father of a boy. Perhaps the Secretary of State would set up a Royal Commission, part of whose job should be to consult on the name.

I understood very well the speech of the Secretary of State. It went like this: "if you do not have a case and if you do not have any facts, try to attack everybody else." During the course of the debate, to all of which I have listened, there were seven Labour speakers, two alliance speakers and five Tory rebels. I know what rebels are because I have been a rebel. The total number of Tory Members who support the Bill is three, one of whom immediately admitted that he had not read the Bill. He made a fantastic speech. The hon. Member had not read the Bill but he spoke about abolition, which proved to me that he had not read the Bill. It would be interesting if the Secretary of State could convince the members of his own party. He has not done so up to now.

The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) who had not read the Bill——

Mr. Tony Banks: Or the amendment.

Mr. Cowans: If the hon. Member had not read the Bill it is exceedingly unlikely that he would have read the amendment. If one has not read the Bill one cannot amend it. The hon. Member succeeded very well, not having read the Bill. He spoke at great length. If the hon. Member for Wirral, South were to read the Bill he might be able to convince the chamber of trade on Merseyside. I do not know any rabid Socialists who are members of the chamber of trade on Merseyside. Even the chamber of trade says that Merseyside county council has been successful in promoting the economic and business life of the region and has done much to promote tourism and the arts.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman will know that earlier in the year Merseyside chamber of commerce expressed views that were against the abolition of the Merseyside county council. Subsequently, it thought again about the matter and in September decided that it was prepared to support the abolition of the Merseyside county council. One or two of its members expressed doubts about the original meeting. They said that it was not a very well attended meeting. It came back a third time last month, in November and by a decisive majority decided to confirm the opinion that it supports the abolition of the Merseyside county council and the main principles of the Bill. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will now withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Cowans: So it is one down, with 55,000 to go. If the Secretary of State is right about the Merseyside chamber of commerce, stand by—here we go. Against abolition are the United Kingdom Association of Professional Engineers, the School of Advanced Urban Studies, the university of Bristol, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, and, for the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire, (Mr. Heddle) the National Union of Ratepayers' Associations. They are supposed to be on the side of the Government. Also the CBI—there are no rabid Socialists in the CBI, are there?—the National Trust and the Royal Town Planning Institute are against abolition. If the Secretary of State stands up and says that Merseyside county council has changed its mind, he ought to stand up and say how many of these other bodies have changed their mind. So it is one to the Secretary of State and eight to me.

It is absolute nonsense for the Secretary of State to stand up and talk about my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). He suggested that what my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton said was bad and that the Government would do better. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton said that the Labour party would consult before legislating. If the Secretary of State believes that to be bad, why does he not do better and accept the amendment about the Royal Commission? The Secretary of State should not accuse somebody of doing something badly when the Secretary of State is doing it even worse. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said that this legislation had been cobbled together on the back of a cigarette packet. That may be true, but I fancy that it was cobbled together on the back of an old grocer's bag.

The Secretary of State assures us that this is long-standing, well-planned legislation. If he is right, there was something wrong with his predecessor, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who on 23 February 1983, which is not so very long ago, said that he did not have any plans to change the existing system. So it cannot be all that well planned. Need I remind hon. Members of today's date?

Before talking about a long-standing, well-established well-thought-out plan, the Secretary of State ought to start talking to his colleagues in Cabinet. That might be infra dig, because there is only one person in the Cabinet, but the right hon. Gentleman might start a precedent, and it would be helpful if he did.

I could go on for a long while, but I am conscious of the time. I thought about preparing a few notes for the debate, but I decided against it, because I thought that I should come here with an open mind and to listen to the debate—unlike Conservative Members who have been dragged screaming from the Tea Room to support the insupportable.

I have kept an open mind and, leaving aside the speeches of my hon. Friends, the arguments that have convinced me about the merit of the amendment have come from the Tory Benches. Conservative Members have made some tremendous arguments.

I do not accuse the Secretary of State of not listening, but I do accuse him of not hearing. The right hon. Gentleman has accused the trade unions of not coming forward on this issue. But they have bombarded him with paper, left, right and centre and he has not looked at any of it. He would not even publish the replies so that hon. Members could read them. If he cannot convince his own Back Benchers and will not publish documents so that unbiased observers can read them, where is his case?

No one on the Opposition side opposes an examination of local government. Far from it. We should welcome such an examination across the board, with those who serve in local government, and those who are serviced by it having an input. Instead of that, the Secretary of State has drawn up legislation on the back of an old Woodbine packet. It means nothing to anyone on his side and nothing to anyone on the Opposition side. More important, it has got everybody outside completely confused.

As the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) said, it is not too late and it is not a sign of weakness to have another look. The Government have had another look at some matters. Dare I mention student grants? When the second look revealed 150 Conservative votes against the Government, lo and behold, the Government changed their mind. I do not think that there will be 150 Conservative votes against the Government on the amendment, but, although the case has been well made by my hon. Friends, it has been made even better by Conservative Members. The Secretary of State's hon. Friends have made our case for a Royal Commission or an independent body to examine the matter in detail. The test of any amendment is whether the case for it has been made. I submit that the Government's case for refusing to accept the amendment has not been made.

The Secretary of State's action in refusing to accept the amendment is like accusing a man of murder, taking him to court and hanging the jury.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

8.30 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 1, line 9, after 'force', insert—

'and after the Secretary of State has laid before Parliament proposals for an independent inquiry into the implications for the unit cost of local government services and local government spending in London and the metropolitan counties'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 9, in page 1, line 9, after 'force', insert—

'and after the Secretary of State has laid before Parliament a detailed analysis of the implications for public expenditure in the three years following the abolition date'.

No 30, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add:

'such day as may be appointed by an Order by the Secretary of State.

(3) No order shall be made by the Secretary of State under subsection (2) above until the Secretary of State has presented to parliament a report on—

(a) the percentage of the expenditure of those councils in the financial year 1984-85 which would have been the expenditure of London boroughs of metropolitan districts had this Act been in force during that year;

(b) the percentage of the expenditure of these councils in the financial year 1984-85 which would have been the expenditure of bodies other than London boroughs, metropolitan districts or ministers of the Crown had this Act been in force during that year; and

(c) The percentage of the expenditure of those councils in the financial year 1984-85 which would have been the expenditure of Ministers of the Crown had this Act been in force during that year.'.

No. 31, in page 1, line 15, leave out '1st April 1986' and add:

'such day as may be appointed by an order by the Secretary of State.

(3) No order shall be made by the Secretary of State under subsection (2) above until the Secretary of State has submitted an analysis of the savings he anticipates from the abolition of the Greater London Council and the metropolitan county councils to a Select Committee of the House of Commons.

(4) The Select Committee referred to in subsection (3) above shall be empowered to commission such studies of the costs and savings likely to result from abolition of those councils as it sees fit.'.

No. 39, in page 1, line 15, at end add:

'provided that the Secretary of State has by that date laid before Parliament a report setting out the basis on which the provisions in subsections (3), (4) and (5) below shall be given effect.

(3) For a period of three years from the abolition date no increased expenditure shall fall on the Consolidated Fund other than expenditure set out in the Financial Memorandum to this Act;

(4) For a period of three years from the abolition date no borough or district shall receive greater or reduced financial support from the Exchequer or from other local authorities as a result of the provisions of this Act;

(5) For a period of three years from the abolition date services provided before the abolition date by the Greater London Council and metropolitan county councils shall be continued by successor authorities at the same level and same unit cost as in the financial year 1984-85'.

Dr. Cunningham: From the outset of the announcement of this policy, the Government and sucessive Ministers have made great claims about the savings which would result from the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. Indeed, in the beginning the savings were said by Ministers to be of primary importance. That has changed somewhat, particularly since the appointment of the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who in a short time has slightly changed the emphasis of Government policy.

These amendments address themselves to this crucial issue. It has been our contention, and the position of the councils, from the outset that, far from large potential savings, at best there will be no savings to ratepayers or taxpayers as a result of these cobbled-together proposals. The likelihood is that there will be significant costs.

It has not gone without notice that the Financial Times today carries a withering leading article about the Government's proposals, and argues that on none of the tests it applies does the Bill stand up to the questions posed. It is a devastating criticism of what the Government are proposing. That is not surprising, because on this issue perhaps above all others, the Government are in a terrible mess and have indulged in claims, counter-claims, contradictions and in some cases plucking figures out of the air in briefings to their own supporters for this and previous debates.

The Government began by claiming that savings of £120 million per annum would result from the abolition of these seven Labour councils and that 9,000 jobs would go. There was no apology for getting rid of 9,000 people who are at present employed by these authorities. However, there has never been — and there still is not — any systematic or authoritative justification for that claim, which incidentally has in the latest briefing now slipped to £100 million per annum. In reality, it is likely to slip much further.

The Government have simply never gone beyond assertions and generalities in attempts to justify their claims. Those attempts have never been taken seriously in the House by the majority of the Government's own supporters, let alone by my hon. Friends and myself. They have never been taken seriously by the GLC or the metropolitan county councils, nor by any of the independent bodies and organisations which have systematically examined them.

The Government seem to have been relying on abolition to make savings related to policy. That in itself is an interesting question. It implies that the real reason for abolition is not that there was some unnecessary tier of government but simply that the present Administration did not like the policies pursued by the Labour-controlled authorities. There has been a considerable change since, following a Conservative victory in the GLC, the Prime Minister said:

"This is our greatest prize."

That was the Prime Minister's description of Conservative control of the GLC at that time.

During Second Reading on 4 December, a former Conservative Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)—I wish that the right hon. Gentleman was in his place now—said that the proposals were pushed into the Conservative manifesto a few days before it was published and after the election had been announced, and that that was done against the wishes of Conservative party policy committee, After the right hon. Gentleman made that speech, I wrote to the Prime Minister to ask her whether that statement was true. I received a reply from No. 10 Downing street early this evening. The letter is not very long, and if the Minister would like a copy I should be happy to provide one for him. In no sentence in her reply does the Prime Minister deny what her right hon. Friend said. In the final paragraph, she says:

"You should be aware . . . that the commitment to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan Counties was the result of long and detailed preparatory work and members of the Cabinet were involved in that policy-making process."

The Minister for Local Government is not a member of the Cabinet, much as he would like to be and much as some of us would like him to be too. If he were, it might be a more sensible body. However, if the proposals before us are the result of that simply shows what a confused and convoluted state of mind exists collectively in the policy thinking of the Conservative Cabinet. That will be no surprise to the 4 million people who are out of work and the many others who are suffering as a result of the Government's policies.

"long and detailed preparatory work",

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): When I heard something about this matter, I asked the Prime Minister in a written question on what date she had become publicly committed to these proposals. The Prime Minister replied —I speak from memory, and will correct myself if I am wrong—that the date was 18 May 1983.

Mr. Cunningham: I have seen the instructive reply to which my hon. Friend refers. There is no evidence that there was much preparatory research, consideration or discussion of what, by general consent—not only in the House but outside—is a shambles of a Bill.

However, during the period between the publication of the White Paper and the publication of the Bill, other people with real interest in these matters, principally in the GLC and the metropolitan counties, have put their considerable expertise and experience—and that of other bodies such as Coopers and Lybrand—to work on these issues. Some serious analysis of the cost of the proposals has been done. As the Minister knows, the Government have never responded to those reports and documents. Coopers and Lybrand found, in brief, that with a high level of co-operation between district authorities and boroughs, a saving of £4 million to a cost of £9·5 million per annum could be expected. That is a minimal saving, and it assumes the best possible level of co-operation. Those eminent consultants thought it more likely that co-operation would be limited. In that case, they said, instead of any savings, abolition would involve a cost of between £36 million and £61 million per annum.

8.45 pm

With the publication of the Government's yellow document or statement a few months ago, Coopers and Lybrand were commissioned to produce an update of their estimates in the light of the Government's proposals. They concluded that an extra cost of up to £69 million would be incurred in the six metropolitan councils.

With the publication of the right hon. Gentleman's statement on 29 November, Coopers and Lybrand again considered their findings. Given that no new evidence was contained in the right hon. Gentleman's statement, they stood by their estimates. There will be a real cost to the taxpayer and ratepayer from abolition. The officers of the GLC have estimated that there will be transitional costs of about £65 million in 1986-87 for redundancy payments, administrative costs, the setting up of the new joint boards and quangos, and other odds and ends in this mish-mash of a Bill. The figures do not include the substantial costs likely to result from less efficient delivery of services.

Ministers should try to reconcile the independent consultants' estimates with the Government's arguments.

They have made no attempt to do so. The reports and investigations have been brushed aside, dismissed, and in some cases derided, and no realistic attempt has been made to counteract the arguments. Such behaviour sits ill on a Secretary of State—I understand why the right hon. Gentleman is not in his place at the moment—who, at a Conservative party conference in 1983, said:

"I am a Tory, and I have been brought up as a Tory, and I believe that the burden of proof is upon the man who advocates change, and if he does not satisfy that burden of proof, then change should not be made."

The Opposition endorse those sentiments. In this case, on the question of costs and savings, there is no proof; what is worse, no serious attempt has been made by the Government to produce any proof.

A number of questions arise about the proposal to establish residuary bodies. The proposals are a mess. It is plain that the Government do not have much idea what the residuary bodies are to do or how they are to do it. They are to take over certain responsibilities such as debts of the MCCs not specifically allocated elsewhere, superannuation functions and funds, and property of the MCCs not specifically passed to the district councils. Those are almost all long-term functions.

The same is true for the GLC. The Secretary of State is giving himself power to pass debt management and superannuation functions to one district council in each area if all the districts ask him to do so. What are the chances of that being agreed in practice? We should like to hear the Minister's thoughts on and answer to that. What will happen if the districts do not agree? What will happen to costs and savings and the management of those functions?

The residuary bodies are enjoined to secure that their work is completed within five years but, as their work is ill-defined and as such bodies have never before existed on this scale, is that realistic? If they are to be under pressure to dispose of assets and land holdings in that time, is there not a real danger that the value of those assets will not be realised to the public good? Is that not a hidden cost to the public?

Residuary bodies are to be required to make proposals for their own demise. They are to wind themselves up. However, such proposals can include proposals for successor bodies or for keeping the residuary bodies in being in some other form. There is no estimate of the cost of any of that either. In addition to the well-known and much-rehearsed arguments about the costs of joint boards, the quangos and the seven new precepts or charges on the district rates, a bombshell was dropped recently when Mr. Maurice Stonefrost of the GLC reported that there were likely to be significant real costs because of the way in which the GLC has funded its operations from its capital fund and from the results of winding that fund up.

I must draw attention to the fact that the fund was established when the GLC was under Conservative control. It has been used efficiently and effectively by successive administrations to fund projects. On 29 November 1984, the Minister for Local Government wrote to the chairman of the council concerning arrangements for its outstanding debts. He had set out his proposals in a written reply which appears in the Official Report for 16 November. He reported that account had been taken of representations received on the White Paper "Streamlining the Cities". It is clear from examination of his proposals that, like the rest of the burden of evidence which was submitted following the publication of that White Paper, little if any account has been taken of the main points made by the GLC in response to the White Paper. That is especially true of the implications of the GLC's capital fund.

To service its debts and accounts, the authority has made repayments of £113 million a year. The charging of a market rate of interest enhances the value of the fund and ensures that all services are treated equally and bear the full economic cost of their consumption of capital. The fund has been built up from some £58 million in March 1978 to £820 million in March 1984. It is a significant fund. It is important to note that the GLC finances 26 per cent. of the total debt under its management. That was £3·18 billion in March 1984. That should be compared with the 2 per cent. which is financed from the London boroughs. All these statistics are provided by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy.

More than 60 per cent. of net capital expenditure on the council's services is now financed from the fund. At the end of March this year, the fund's value—£820 million—represented 65 per cent. of the total debt of directly administered GLC services. That way of funding its activities brings major benefits to the council, such as a reduction in public borrowing, which is in line with Government policy and a strengthening of the council's borrowing position. The council has relatively low interest costs which average £15 million a year. That is lower than the London boroughs for the past five years. The fund also safeguards the credibility of the council's reputation, thus enabling it to contribute to present and future financing of London's capital programme.

This is an important issue. The implications of writing the capital fund off will—no doubt this is one of the Government's subterfuges—probably result in short-term rates reductions through the cessation of repayments. However, in the longer term, writing the fund off is likely to lead to an increase in public sector borrowing. According to Mr. Stonefrost's argument, it could lead to an increase in the medium term of perhaps £750 million, given that the boroughs are likely to finance only a small percentage of capital expenditure from their capital funds. Writing off the fund is also likely to lead to an increase in rate costs in the longer term of about £20 million a year because of the relatively higher average interest rates borne by the boroughs as compared to the GLC and because rates of interest charged to market lenders to finance a constant volume of assets are greater than those required by a capital fund.

It appears that the Government have taken none of that into account. I understand that the Minister or the Secretary of State—I am not sure which—has sent an urgent message asking for consultations about the implications of all this. That shows that, here again, there is a glaring hole in the Bill and in the Government's thinking and preparation for what they are proposing.

To take all the evidence into account, the reality is that there will be no savings, except perhaps as an expedient in year one or year two. There may be a reduction in the rates, which the Government seek to engineer for their own political purposes. The reality is that, in the longer term, it will cost everyone much more. It will cost significantly more for less effective services, less democratic control and less accountability and for organisations which will be more remote and obscure to the people of London and the metropolitan county council areas. There is no case, argument or evidence for or substance in what the Government have said about savings through these proposals.

It is also significant that the widespread calls from the Labour party, other political parties, the House of Lords, CIPFA and other bodies are for an independent investigation into the financial implications of the proposals. The Government have brushed them aside and ignored them. That confirms our belief that the Government have no evidence to substantiate their case.

Even Government supporters, such as the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, say of the Government's existing claims:

"These targets, however, seem unduly modest. If the whole exercise of abolition, which carries the considerable risk that non-co-operation between district councils might damage certain services, is to prove worthwhile in the long run, substantial savings for business ratepayers . . . must be obtained."

The Association does not even think that the Government's present, false, transparent and unsubstantiated claims make abolition worth while, not to mention the reality of the real costs to those who will be affected.

That sums it up. The Government have no friends, no arguments and no evidence. They deserve no support.

9 pm

Mr. Maples: I wish to spend some minutes addressing one aspect of the pubic expenditure and cost implications for local authorities. It relates to the way in which block grant and grant-related expenditures will be redistributed among them, and how the London boroughs in particular will have to pay for the services that they will have to take over from the GLC.

In the White Paper the Government made the correct and acceptable statement that no authority should be unduly financially advantaged or disadvantaged by the change. They then published two consultation papers in the original round of consultation papers. One was about block grants and the other about the London rate equalisation scheme. It would not understate the case to say that both papers left various questions unanswered. The paper on the London rate equalisation scheme, which is clearly the more complicated, states:

"It is not possible at this stage to produce a detailed model of the effects on individual London Boroughs of the disappearance of the GLC precept."

It is disappointing that in the Yellow Book published in the summer the argument is taken no further. We seem to be left in a position where discussions are still continuing on a complicated and extremely important matter, especially for the London boroughs which are effectively subsidised by the GLC rate now.

I shall ask my right hon. Friend to deal with two specific aspects. Regarding the block grant, will the GREs that are allocated to the boroughs in respect of the GLC expenditure that they take over be at the level of the GLC's present GREs, or will they be closer to what the GLC actually spends? If it is to be somewhere between those two points, how will it be calculated? If a borough takes over services which are similar to those which it provides now—for example, by taking on an extra park or leisure service—will its new GRE in respect of that be less than the sum of what it had before and what the GLC had? Will it always be a case of adding the two?

For many London boroughs, especially my own, it is not the GRE that is important but the expenditure limit and the target. Therefore, most important, how will those two figures be set? How will the target be set, and how will the expenditure limit be set for rate-capped authorities? Will it be set in relation to the GLC's GREs in respect of the expenditure that is taken over, or in relation to what is actually spent? I expect that it will be set somewhere in between, and I shall be interested to know how that will happen. I hope that the boroughs will not be asked to adjust the GLC's expenditure to their GRE assessments immediately.

As the difference between what the GLC will spend next year, even under its expenditure limit, and its grant-related expenditure assessment is over £2 million, this matter is important, and we shall wish to know how the Government envisage it being adjusted by the boroughs. I fear that the shortfall, if there is one, will impinge, as always seems to happen, more heavily on the poorer boroughs, of which mine is one.

If the boroughs are to attract additional block grant in respect of GLC expenditure, which the GLC does not presently receive, from where will that additional block grant come? If the overall figure for block grant remains fixed, some of it must come from the existing grants to the London boroughs to pay for expenditure that they are taking over. By the mechanism of the block grant, the boroughs will probably be worse off.

It is not enough to make up the GREs. We must know how the targets and expenditure limits will be set, and how the penalty system will operate. Even if a borough spent below its target, could it lose block grant if it failed to reduce expenditure to the level of the GLC's previous GRE? I am sorry that there are so many initials in my speech, but I did not invent them. The purpose of block grant is set out most clearly in the Government's consultation paper, which states that a central aim of the block grant system is to compensate authorities for differences in their expenditure needs and their rateable resources so that, in broad terms, local government in each area can provide similar services by charging their ratepayers the same rate poundage. It would be comforting to have an assurance that that will be the effect of the changes, that similar authorities will charge similar rate poundages, and that the re-allocation of the GLC's expenditure and targets will not result in their being prejudiced.

Will my right hon. Friend develop the Government's thoughts on how the London rate equalisation scheme will be extended? One of my few worries about abolition is that the GLC carries out the redistribution of resources from the wealthier boroughs to the poorer ones. We know that three of the 32 London boroughs subsidise the others. The two boroughs that pay most—Westminster, including the City, and Camden—which contain only 6 per cent. of London's population, contribute 36 per cent. of the GLC's income. That is a subsidy to the other London boroughs of 30 per cent., or £240 million at present. In addition, those authorities contribute to the existing London rate equalisation scheme by about another £80 million a year. The total subsidy from those three boroughs to the other 29 is about £320 million. I do not know Lewisham's share of that, but if it lost only £10 million on a pro rata basis, that would mean another 30p on the rates. I am sure that the Government will ensure that that will not happen, but I wish to know a little more about the mechanism by which they will ensure that it does not happen. The consultation paper recognises the difficulties, but neither it nor the Yellow Book takes the argument much further.

Will the London rate equalisation scheme be extended by equalising expenditure and subsidy on the GLC's present grant-related expenditure assessments, or on the GLC's present expenditure? Will the boroughs have to find the full £320 million, or will the sum be calculated on the basis of the GREs? If it is the latter, the boroughs will have considerable difficulty, because the expenditure that they take over will, of necessity, be higher than the GREs. It is considerably higher at present. It is impossible to envisage the boroughs reducing it to GRE level in the foreseeable future—it certainly could not happen within a year or two. Although some reductions could be made, if the rate equalisation is based on GREs, the other 29 boroughs will be seriously prejudiced.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman is making a characteristically thoughtful speech about local government finance. Does it not occur to him that the pertinent questions that he is directing to his Front Bench are the questions that should have been answered during the long consultation in the run-up to the proposals, about which we heard?

Mr. Maples: I thought that that was what I was seeking to do. I said that I was disappointed that the Yellow Book did not come up with answers to these questions. I asked my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government to say where the Government think that they will find solutions to these problems. I would rather hear my right hon. Friend's reply before saying whether I agree with the hon. Gentleman.

On the London rate equalisation scheme, will the subsidy be extended on the basis of the GREs or on the basis of the GLC's expenditure? If it is somewhere between the two, how will that be done so that the boroughs are not prejudiced? What mechanism will be used for doing this? Are we to have a negative block grant, which would have serious implications for the principles behind the rating system, or is it to be done on some other basis? If so, is that other basis to be statutory so that we know that it will go on in the future? Of paramount importance, do Westminster and Camden agree to whatever arrangements the Government have in mind? Under the present system of levying rate by the GLC, this is not open to debate, but it might be if we were simply asking them to write the cheque for a pool or to accept a negative block grant system.

If I understand it correctly—I may be wrong because every time I think that I know something about local government finance I find that I know far less than I thought — the London rate equalisation pool at the moment is distributed to the other boroughs on the basis of their total rateable values. That is a strange way to do it because, by distributing the pooled subsidy on the basis of a borough's total rateable value, it is likely that the wealthier boroughs will do rather better than the poorer ones. Would it not be more appropriate for whatever goes into the London rate equalisation pool in the future to be distributed like the block grant, with the intention of equalising, as far as can be, the rates that have to be charged in different boroughs for the same services, and not simply on the basis of a borough's total rateable value?

These are matters of general importance. They are the remaining points about which I have concern if the GLC is abolished. I think that the figures for my borough are that the GLC spends about £25 million a year and raises about £10 million in rates. Effectively, we are subsidised to the tune of £15 million. I would be concerned if I felt that any of that £15 million had to come out of the already heavily picked pockets of the ratepayers of Lewisham. I would welcome my right hon. Friend's assurances about that and his reasons as to why that will not be so.

Mr. Chris Smith: I rise to support the amendment. I do so because I do not think that the Government have told us the whole truth, or even very much of it, about the costs of the abolition proposals. That is especially true of the Greater London council. I shall pass briefly over the obvious costs of the operation of the abolition—the new offices, the new boards, the servicing of the network of enterprises that will be set up, the cost of any redundancy payments if the Government go ahead with their proposals for the sacking of staff and so on. Anyone with any common sense will know that the proposed operation of abolition, with more diverse operations being brought in in place of a centralised organisation and existing functions being carried out by those diverse entities, will cost more rather than less.

Having looked briefly at that, one has to look at what lies behind the Government's claims of potential savings. My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) touched on the reality when he spoke about the Government seeking policy rather than administrative savings. It is surely true that if the Government are to achieve the savings that they have so far spoken about both inside and outside the House, they will have to do so by means of policy changes and by the removal or diminution of functions presently carried out by the GLC.

9.15 pm

I shall briefly consider two areas of policy. I want first to ask the Government what they have in mind as to how funds will be devoted in those areas, and as to the costing of the future operations of the various boards, quangos, enterprises and boroughs that are to take over the GLC's functions. If the boroughs take over the housing functions that the GLC now has, what will the provision be for the repair and maintenance of the transferred GLC stock? At present provision flows through the housing investment programme allocations made to the GLC and thence to the boroughs. What also will be the fate of the projects in support of the single homeless that are presently carried out by the GLC?

There are brief references in the yellow document, although there have been none in ministerial speeches or in the Bill, as to what will happen to the houses in Thamesmead and Tower Hamlets. What will be the exact fate of the seaside and country homes to which the GLC now has right of access? The yellow document promises us a guarantee in the legislation of continued allocations for Londoners, yet the Bill has only an extremely vague and broadly worded clause that does not offer the guarantee being sought.

What will happen to the fund of housing association schemes, including those in the pipeline and those that might have been expected to be built with GLC funding? Above all, what will happen to any mobility schemes for those wishing to transfer across London from one property to another? At present all of those functions are carried out by the GLC. They cost money, and if the Government have their way and seek to produce the savings that they say that they can make through these proposals, some at least of those functions will have to go, and the Government should tell us which. Alternatively, to which of those functions will they dovote less money than is at present devoted?

The funding of voluntary organisations is a matter of great concern to Londoners. It is estimated that the GLC will spend about £53 millon this year on the support of voluntary organisations. What are the Government's intentions? A later clause talks about provision for boroughs jointly to fund individual organisations and projects. It specifies a limit that the Secretary of State can set. So far we have been told that it is likely to be £10 million, so what will happen to the remaining £43 million? The Government speak about making large savings as a result of the GLC's abolition, but if they are to make them by reducing the funding of those organisations, as we can only suspect from the details that have so far been given, they should come clean and tell the people of London what they will stop funding and what they will continue to fund. We can then have a sensible and reasonable debate on these issues.

I have cited only two specific policy areas. I could go through a whole list of functions carried out by the GLC, and ask the Government exactly which of them will go and which will be carried on. But over and above that, there is the overall question raised by the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) — which is especially important for the poorer areas of London — and relates to the GLC as a redistributive mechanism in taking money from the richer parts and peoples of London and putting it into the areas of greatest need. Who or what will perform that function when the GLC is abolished? What arrangement do the Government have in mind to ensure that that happens?

The Government must either accept the amendment, which would ensure some independent analysis of costs, or they must be far more honest about the amount of money that they expect to save and from where it will come. If it is to come from services and functions carried out by the GLC, which are likely to disappear with abolition, they must tell the people that so that they can make up their minds about the Government's plans.

We are asking for some honesty from the Government. I know that it is a rare commodity these days, but we have the right to expect it.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): The amendments and the preceding debates have been about abolition — will it be simpler or cheaper and has there been any in-depth inquiry into the costing? The response from the GLC and the metropolitan counties makes it clear that the impression given by the Secretary of State that their observations about the proposals and the costings had been carefully considered was not true. The Government have ignored arguments in favour of the retention of county councils. They have rejected the argument about the effect on services. They have rejected the argument about the future of transport, consumer services, economic development, art, culture, leisure and emergency services — especially the fire brigade, the police, planning, conservation and waste disposal.

Does the Secretary of State seriously believe that the public will accept the claim that an in-depth study has taken place into the financial implications and effects of the abolition measure? The Government have been dismissive of the majority of the replies that they have received. The whole exercise is one of deceiving the public — an attempt to persuade the public that the Government are going through a democratic process before any decision is made. Yet the decision has already been made—the die has been cast.

This is an ill-conceived piece of legislation that will be forced through despite the protestations of the GLC, the metropolitan counties and the voluntary organisations.

Although the latest proposals differ from the original, the Government have given no further scope for consultation. They stand accused of making major changes without meaningful discussion and without realising the consequences of their actions. Is it any wonder that such proposals give the impression that this legislation is nothing more than a politically motivated act to take control of and undermine local democracy — which, in turn, means the loss of accountability? That danger has already been recognised by the amended proposals to allow ILEA to become a directly elected authority.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science claimed that the nature and scale of the importance of the education service in inner London, taken together, justify a directly elected authority in this special case. If that is a special case, what about the Greater Manchester council and the met counties which are responsible for police, the fire service and public transport? The joint boards will not have the same accountability as these bodies. They will be indirectly elected and will not be answerable to the electorate. Why should the Secretary of State make a concession with ILEA, yet have a blinkered approach to the overtures of the met counties? That is gross inconsistency, and that fact is recognised.

The observations put to the Secretary of State about the fact that he will be empowered to control for the first three years the expenditure and manpower of those boards and the fact that they will be administered by nominated representatives can only lead to the conclusion that this legislation is a further attack on the responsibility of local government, especially in vital respects such as police accountability. The police authority in Greater Manchester spends about £10 million above the sum the Government say should be spent. About £4 million above the Government's figure is spent on fire services. The multi-function GMC has the necessary flexibility to determine its priorities in the light of local needs.

What real consultation has there been about the cost of police and fire services? The GLC and the met counties cannot accept the statement by the Secretary of State that the proposals will lead to a transfer of power to the London boroughs and the metropolitan district councils. Those councils would claim that the suggestion by the Secretary of State—that functions will devolve either individually or jointly to local democratically elected councils, thereby decentralising powers at the local level—is totally false and misleading. The major and vital functions, such as police, fire and public transport services, and minor functions, such as the registration of animal trainers, will be allocated at the district level. Fewer than 20 per cent. of the services will devolve to district councils, where full acountability will be preserved.

The Government's arguments about the spread of local democracy are extremely bogus. Bodies will be able to precept the district councils and will at the same time be acountable only to the Secretary of State. The Government have not shown where savings will be made. The Government do not know what the financial outcome will be. The GLC and the met counties are urging the Government to publish as a matter of urgency their detailed estimate of the minimal savings that will be made, with information of how those savings will be achieved by successor authorities.

For all their arguments, the GLC and met counties know that the abolition die is cast. The Government have closed their ears to any intelligent argument. As the Times editorial on 1 August said:

"Ministers will seem to believe that in this matter assertion can substitute for argument."

Does the Secretary of State truly believe that the GLC and met counties take him at his word when he says that the abolition issue has not been settled yet? The Government believe that they have a mandate to abolish those county authorities and, at the same time, to rid themselves of political opposition. The name of the game is to rid themselves of Ken Livingstone and the GLC. That is why the Government are willing to take these draconian steps which put democracy at risk.

The Government have completely ignored local government. Mr. G. A. Harrison, the chief executive of the Greater Manchester council, said:

"The Bill is very similar to the White Paper 'Streamlining the Cities' and, quite clearly, the Government have ignored the mass of comment received when only 9 per cent. of respondents supported the proposals. If the Government is serious about wanting to make local government cheaper, simpler and more local, the Bill must be regarded as a failure in that all the information available confirms that none of these will be achieved. What is more likely to happen is that the proposed successor bodies will be blamed for not making the system work. An independent inquiry must be held if yet another costly reorganisation of local government in the metropolitan areas is to be avoided in the very near future."

The question has not been answered. Will those arrangements lead to simpler, cheaper and more accountable local government? The Opposition know the answer; I do not believe that the Government have considered it.

9.30 pm

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): If one were looking for an object lesson in how not to go about reforming local government, I suspect that what we have seen over the past 18 months would be a good example.

First, we have had no Royal Commission to discuss the functions, role and structure of local government. Secondly, we have introduced proposals that apply to a percentage of the country only, under the bogus argument that we are abolishing two-tier local government whereas, in relation to the shire counties, we are maintaining two-tier local government, and the Government seem pleased to be doing so. Thirdly — this is the point of the amendments—we are making major structural changes in local government without any understanding of the costs involved.

The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) made a thoughtful contribution. I congratulate him on being the only one, I suspect, to understand the language of local government finance. He may be seated in the wrong position, in view of the contribution that he can make. He pointed out some of the many difficulties involved in financing the new structure. Those questions should have been answered by the Government or by an independent inquiry before we reached legislation.

If one studies the history of these proposals, one sees that the Government have tried throughout to obscure the issue of costs. During last year and the early part of this year, we considered the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 which took the right to vote from people in the GLC and metropolitan county areas. In the run-up to that Act, the Government talked glibly about the possibility of savings from the metropolitan counties being about £120 million. In all, 12 parliamentary questions asked the Government to detail and substantiate that figure. At no time did the Government say how that figure was arrived at. We went into a legislative procedure whereby we took away people's right to vote on a blank cheque and blank prospectus. People lost the democratic right to vote on their services without understanding the costs involved in the proposed changes.

I should have thought that any responsible, decent Government, before taking away people's right to vote, would have told them what the costs or savings were. Some of my hon. Friends would rightly point out that no financial saving is as great as losing the right to vote and exercise a democratic choice. We went through the first part of the year losing the right to vote without the Government substantiating that figure of £120 million.

We have now come to the latter part of the year and to the Local Government Bill. The Government are now saying that there will be savings of £100 million, half of which will apply to the metropolitan counties. During the past 12 months, the savings in relation to the metropolitan counties have been halved. The Secretary of State may well leave the Department of the Environment in the same way as he left the Department of Industry. If this process goes on much longer, we will have a Government who will say, "We shall make a loss on the proposals rather than a saving." With the present rate of inflation, in terms of the potential costs, and deflation in terms of the potential savings of devolution, if the Government are managing the country's money in the same way, we have a great deal to worry about. I suspect that all the evidence is that they are managing the Government's money in exactly the same sort of way. The figure has changed during the year but yet again we have a figure that the Government are not prepared to spell out in detail or put to any independent inquiry.

I am not saying that the Coopers and Lybrand report or the PA Management report—both of which cast doubts on the Government figures — are correct to the last penny but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, it is up to the Government to substantiate and support change. One would have thought that the Government would produce the figures rather than spend time sniping at the Coopers and Lybrand report and the PA Management report. The Government have significantly failed to do what they should have done.

We are now legislating without any indication whatever of the costs. I take the simple view that if a large organisation, enjoying certain economies of scale, is abolished, there is a cost to the ratepayer. In other capacities the Minister has often talked of the advantages of economies of scale, but in terms of local government some of those advantages seem to have disappeared.

Waste disposal in west Yorkshire is very eficient. It is now to be moved from a county level, where there are considerable economies of scale, to five individual districts. In regard to land, labour, computer services, secretarial and legal services, additional costs must be involved.

I believe that the Government can deliver cost savings. Conservative Members should recognise how those savings can be delivered. They are not intrinsic to the Government's proposals and do not flow from them. They can be delivered only by taking away our right to vote, so that those of us in the GLC area and in the metropolitan counties do not have the right to make a choice, and by rate-capping the new joint boards and committees, so that Whitehall sets the level of service, of expenditure and of jobs.

The Minister can get his savings, but he will not get them honestly. He will get them by imposing on all of us who live in the metropolitan areas a loss of services and of jobs. The measure is not about saving money by the reform of local government; it is not about creating a better local government structure. It is a further attempt to reduce services and jobs and to ensure that those in local communities who depend on local government will have less to look forward to in the future.

Mr. Cartwright: I support the group of amendments because I believe they are crucial to our discussion of the Bill.

The Government's claim that cost savings will result from abolition is a central factor in the argument for the Bill. The Government have regularly argued that streamlining cities, and removing a bureaucratic tier of government which is no longer needed, will produce substantial savings for the ratepayer. But, as other hon. Members have said during the debate, it has been impossible to get any clear and convincing evidence to support that claim.

The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) rightly drew attention to the very different assessments made about the transitional costs by GLC officers and by the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill. Both accept that there will be transitional costs, but there is a wide variation between the two calculations. Ministers will no doubt argue that the GLC officers are interested parties in making their calculations and producing their figures, but it is just as easy to say that the Department of the Environment is an interested party and that its figures might be open to some challenge and doubt.

The situation gets even more complex in regard to the metropolitan counties, where we have celebrated firms of accountants reaching very different conclusions. The Coopers and Lybrand report was referred to earlier. It states clearly that savings will not result from abolition. Its study concluded:

"the proposed structural changes cannot be expected to lead to savings in themselves . . . Savings, therefore, can only be sought as a result of policy changes about the levels of services, and hence expenditure in an area."

That was the judgment of Coopers and Lybrand. Price Waterhouse, an equally celebrated firm of accountants, was retained by another group of interested parties—a consortium of district councils. It came to a different conclusion. Having looked at three of the metropolitan counties, it said in its study:

"in the area of rationalisation alone, excluding any policy or efficiency changes, a saving in staff costs of around £20 million can be made."

Therefore, those are two very different judgments by two firms of accountants of national repute. Surely it is difficult for hon. Members to reach a balanced judgment when there is such conflicting evidence. That alone is enough to make a case for an independent and impartial judgment.

What do our constituents make of all this? I think that my experience will be like that of many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Committee. My constituents make a simple judgment that every time we reorganise local government, it costs them money. I was reminded of that when I read the editorial in this evening's edition of The Standard. It had some unkind things to say about the Secretary of State, for example that he "has a credibility problem." The editorial goes on to say:

"As a gift bringer to ratepayers, he is about as believable as Santa Claus, and a lot less jolly."

That seems unkind, but The Standard goes on to advance some criticisms about the claims made by the Secretary of State yesterday about the impact of rate capping and the great benefits that it is held to bring to ratepayers. The judgment of The Standard is:

"The trouble is, most people just don't believe it. We certainly don't . . . Much the same goes for the plans to sweep away the GLC. Most people just don't believe they will save money or improve matters."

Faced with such a judgment from a newspaper such as The Standard, I suggest that the Secretary of State would be well advised to take on board the idea of an independent inquiry into the financial implications of the Bill. Whether he does or not, I shall advocate that course by voting for the amendment.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I agree with the sentiments expressed by hon. Members who have spoken so far in the debate. I share the concern of the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples), who has forebodings about the effect on local authorities in the London area of the abolition of the GLC. There will be financial consequences, particularly on poorer authorities such as my own in Waltham Forest.

In my time in the House I have never seen a Bill so shoddily presented in terms of its financial consequences. The explanatory and financial memorandum is vague in the extreme. In the Secretary of State's speech on Second Reading there was little of substance on that important point, yet the savings to be made were one of the major arguments put before the people of London—to the extent that any arguments were put before them—in the general election and subsequently. If one judges by the Secretary of State's speech on Second Reading, the main area of savings that the Government estimate will be made will come in the area of local authorities taking over services. That means either that the functions transferred to local authorities in London and the metropolitan counties will not be adequately funded or that money will be handed over and pressure will be put on them through the block grant, penalties, and so on to reduce their expenditure.

What is being proposed will put pressure on local authorities' existing resources when the GLC's and other functions are transferred. It will mean a crowding out, a pressure on existing local authority services. Local authorities in London will be in a real dilemma. Those which accept their responsibilities to the ratepayers and electors in their areas for maintaining services as far as possible within the rate-capping legislation, will have to put up their rates to cope with the consequences of transferred functions, particularly if they are not adequately financed, which is probably the Government"s intention.

9.45 pm

The extra costs that will be incurred by local authorities have not received much attention. The Bill will mean that in both the Greater London area and the metropolitan counties an increased burden will be placed upon local authorities and their councillors. The extra work that is to be transferred has to be carried out not merely by public servants employed by local authorities but by democratically elected local councillors. I challenge the Minister to deny that there will be more local authority committees and quangos, which will have to be attended by local authority councillors. This will impose a heavier burden upon councillors. They will be unable to carry out their job as well as they carry it out now because of the extra functions, which they do not want, which will be thrust upon them. This will have an impact upon the services that they can offer to their electors.

In addition, there will be extra expense. Councillors obtain allowances for attending meetings. There will be many more committee meetings. There will also be many more outside committee meetings, which councillors will have to attend. I do not know whether the Government have taken that point into account. The Government claim that there will be financial savings. I invite the Secretary of State to undertake to conduct an inquiry within a year after abolition into the savings made so that after the Bill is passed we are able to judge whether savings have been made.

In the case of hospital closures, one of the main arguments for closures put forward by district health authorities is that financial savings will be made. My own experience is that if one tries to find out whether financial savings have been made after a hospital has been closed it is impossible, because of the accounting arrangements, to do so. If we do not pin down the Secretary of State we shall find that he will make assertions and claims that can never be contested after the event because figures will never be available.

Mr. Tony Banks: By any objective standards, the Government's failure to make out their financial case is manifest. It is interesting to note that only one hon. Member on the Conservative Benches stood up to state his position. A number of very important and leading questions have been asked. I look forward to the summing up by the Secretary of State as, I am sure, will the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) who could refer to an internal Department of the Environment document, reference LGFIDG, which indicated that the Government were concerned about the fact that the passing of the GLC functions to the boroughs would result in rates being raised. If GLC expenditure at 1983-84 levels were maintained, an 8·2 per cent. rate increase would be required in Lewisham.

The Department of the Environment document states that some form of safety net should be written into the calculations. There are three ways in which this could be done. I ask the Secretary of State to say whether these ways are being considered by him and his Department in order to engineer rate reductions in the boroughs, following abolition. This could be by means of an enhancement of the take from the rate revenues of the three boroughs which provide the vast bulk of the GLC's finance: Camden, Westminster and the City and to enhance the take from rate revenue by the London equalisation scheme. The second way would be substantially to increase GREAs and targets within the individual boroughs so that they could obtain the whole of the GLC's disaggregated GREA and target and thereby be eligible for a greater block grant. The third option would be so to engineer the GREAs and targets for the boroughs in 1986-87 as to ensure that major reductions in costs are achieved.

These are the ways I assume the Government will operate if they are to produce savings but, as has been said by Labour Members, that could be achieved only by a substantial increase in unemployment through cuts in services and large numbers of redundancies.

We are in great difficulty, because we do not know precisely what the Government's financial case is or the background to their calculations. In their 1983 manifesto, the Government justified abolition by saying that the GLC and the metropolitan counties were wasteful and unnecessary. The estimates of savings have gradually diminished almost to the point of disappearing—from £120 million down to transitional costs.

We need to know the figures and we need to have them judged objectively. It is for the Government to make their case. If the Government would accept an independent and impartial audit of their financial claims and the counter-claims made by the GLC and the metropolitan county councils, the public would be able to judge for themselves who is speaking the truth.

I give the Minister the undertaking that I gave on Second Reading, and I should like him to respond to it. I have full authority to say that, if the Government will commission an independent audit into their claims on savings and the services that will be devolved to the boroughs, the GLC will co-operate with him and the inquiry and will provide all necessary facts and figures to the independent auditors so that at last the electorate can see who is speaking the truth—the Government or the local authorities.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): The debate has ranged more widely than the amendments. I shall seek to answer some of the broader points that have been made as well as those related to the amendments.

The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) referred to an article in the Financial Times by Mr. Robin Pauley, who wrote about the capital debt. As we announced in our White Paper "Streamlining the Cities", we proposed to write off the debt to internal capital funds. However, that is not real debt; it is simply a method of internal financing by which the ratepayers have paid over time for the GLC's capital spending programme. Writing it off does not lead automatically to an enormous increase in public sector borrowing.

It will be for the successor authorities to decide, within the capital control system established by the Government, how far they need to replicate the GLC's capital programme and whether to finance that spending through internal sources, including capital funds, or from external borrowing.

Attempting to make this rather old story a little more interesting, Mr. Pauley speculated about the Treasury beginning to worry and Department of the Environment officials asking the director general of the GLC for urgent advice. As usual, the truth is a little less exciting. I am at one with my Treasury colleagues and I have followed the usual path of consulting the local authority associations and the GLC about our debt proposals before reaching final decisions. They have been invited to comment by the end of January.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) made a well-informed speech about GREAs and targets. Those will be debated in detail and, no doubt, at length on clauses 64 to 78, but I draw my hon. Friend's attention to a letter that I placed in the Library yesterday. It was written by an under-secretary in my Department to the chief executives of the London boroughs. It is a detailed letter, but the passage on targets also answers the point made by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks):

"Ministers have made it clear . . . that if targets are set, they will not be looking for a higher level of savings on those services transferred to the boroughs than would have been sought from the GLC. What we envisage is that the target which the GLC would have been given would be split between the successor bodies along with the expenditure concerned."

On GREAs amd block grant it is also rather detailed. It reads:

"As stated above, our aim will be to ensure that the post-abolition arrangements as a whole maintain the existing balance between ratepayers in different parts of London, and between ratepayers in London and those elsewhere."

The actual details will, of course, have to be worked out in the spring of next year on the grants working group. Our proposals would lead to a report being placed before the consultative council on local government finance in July.

On rate equalisation, the letter states:

"At present we believe that this is likely to require the continuation of London rate equalisation arrangements in order to avoid a windfall gain to ratepayers in the high resource authorities in central London at the expense of those elsewhere. Nevertheless, the new arrangements will be designed to ensure that all London ratepayers stand to benefit if expenditure on former GLC services is reduced after abolition. In particular, Ministers have made it clear that, provided savings are achieved, London authorities can expect to benefit from the grant which the GLC has forfeited as a result of its exceptionally high rate of spending in recent years."

Mr. Maples: I had hoped that my right hon. Friend would go further into that as it is important to many of us to know exactly how it will operate, whether it will be a statutory obligation, what Westminister and Camden think and whether they are willing, as well as the level and whether it will be related to the GLC's GREAs or its spending. I hope that we may have that information at an early stage.

Mr. Baker: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. As he would expect, I have a working group on this. We certainly see the continuation of rate equalisation as an important part of the financial arrangements. It is a statutory scheme at the moment.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) spoke of problems that could arise from policy changes not taken into account in the explanatory and financial memorandum. He raised a mass of questions about housing and voluntary organisations. I believe that voluntary organisations are best dealt with when we reach clause 46, although the subject will come up on several other clauses, as will the subject of housing. The GLC's HIP allocation comes out of London's allocation and would go direct to the boroughs. The mobility scheme will continue as a statutory scheme.

On the more general issues actually relevant to the amendments, the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) raised broad questions of accountability. I do not criticise that as, all Committee debates on the Floor of the House range fairly widely. It has been suggested that joint boards will not be truly accountable and that they will not be as representative as the present arrangements for fire and police committees. I wish to draw attention to certain anomalies in the present system. I am told that on the Greater Manchester police authority there are no county councillors from either Bury or Rochdale, which have a combined population of 380,000, whereas in the future both will be represented.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: As a constituent I can approach my county councillor who has access directly to those on the police committee and is also a member of the parent body, the county council, the police committee being a committee of that council. With joint boards that access will no longer exist.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman supports my point. At the moment the county councillors representing the areas covered by those metropolitan districts do not serve on the police authority. The fire service is different because that is a committee of the authority. I think that it is fair to say that there will be direct representation in the future. Solihull, with a population of 200,000, is also not directly represented on the west midlands police authority.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Central asked about the distribution of money among successor bodies. In the metropolitan counties, only a fractional part—less than 1 per cent. of current spending — will become the responsibility of bodies outside local government. For example, the Arts Council is taking on certain responsibilities in the metropolitan counties, but it is a fraction.

Much has been made of the proportion of expenditure that will become the responsibility of the joint authorities, but I remind the Committee—

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report Progress.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Local Government Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Baker: I was referring to the split between the responsibility for expenditure now and in the future. In London the situation is clear. The GLC proper has current spending of about £530 million this year. That is not in dispute. That excludes ILEA and the payments to LRT. That is a reasonable measure of the level of service activity. A small amount of that—about 5 per cent.— will go to bodies outside local government, for example, the Sports Council and the Arts Council. The boroughs jointly or individually will be responsible for the rest— about one quarter for the fire service and three quarters for the other activities taken over by the boroughs.

Mr. Tony Banks: We are back where we started, and there are arguments on both sides about the figures. The figures provided to me for 1984-85 expenditure show a GLC net expenditure of £950 million. Is the Minister leaving out of his calculations debt servicing, housing deficits and waste disposal? If he is, he should not. If he is not, the figures just do not tally.

Mr. Baker: I would be happy to answer a question and to set out how the figures reconcile. The £530 million to which I have referred covers waste disposal and housing deficit. It does not cover debt interest, which is additional.

That brings me to my next point about residuary bodies. Those bodies will really be trafficking the money provided by the lower-tier boroughs. They will provide that money to service the debt and the pension obligations, but it will be the obligation of the boroughs to do that as this is borough money. Indeed, half the GLC capital debt today is already the responsibility of the London boroughs, although it is paid through the GLC because the housing has been transferred. For that function the residuary body will, as it were, stand in the place of the GLC.

Various points were made about the Coopers and Lybrand report. It is certainly a professional job. However, just the other day I read a cutting from the Liverpool Daily Post and noticed that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), when asked about costs and savings in this report, said with his rather earthy wisdom:

"My experience of management consultants is that in the main they do the job they are employed to do. They come up with the answers that are required by their 'masters'. It in no way surprises me."

On our estimates for savings, we have made it clear from the outset that a detailed assessment of the savings that will result from abolition will depend on the various separate decisions made by all the authorities involved. At this stage, therefore, one can only make broad statements, and that is what we have done. We have stated our views in the financial and explanatory memorandum, and I gave the background to those estimates in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey).

We identified three areas where savings will be made. I am not talking about policy savings, as the hon. Member for Islington, South, and Finsbury suggested, but savings resulting from the abolition. Savings will be made in central administration, in connection with highways, and in planning. The county councils will cease to be planning authorities.

I shall reiterate the key points in our estimate. First, I find it hard to believe—and I am sure that other hon. Members share my view—that the elimination of a whole tier of government will not bring savings. The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) said that there would be more committees. At present, the GLC has 60 committees, sub-committees and panels to administer its affairs. When the Tories were in command, they needed only about 30.

An Hon. Member: How many Cabinet Committees are there?

Mr. Baker: When a Minister is asked how many Cabinet Committees there are, even if he knows the answer—which I do not—he is not allowed to give it.

The existence of large bureaucracies in the authorities brings with it inevitable overheads. Those overheads will go.

Secondly, in the case of some services, the existence of two tiers with related jobs means overlap and duplication. Even the MCC consultants agree that savings might be found in central administration and central services. I certainly agree with them on that point.

The expenditure of the councils under consideration is some £432 million a year above their targets and some £600 million a year above their grant-related expenditure assessments. To say that there will be no savings from better adminstration and from an examination by the boroughs and districts of——

Mr. Tony Banks: It is done by manipulating the GREAs.

Mr. Baker: No. As I have said, the savings are not policy savings. They are made in the areas of administration, highways and planning—in the internal organisation.

The hon. Member for Copeland has said that some people consider the savings to be modest. As the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) rightly said, there have been other reports. It would be fair for me to draw the attention of the Committee to the Price Waterhouse report.

Mr. Fatchett: It would be useful if the Minister could tell us how much of the overspend is derived from additional administration, and how much from the provision of services. If it is derived from services it is true that there is a policy objection to the metropolitan counties; if from administration, we are talking about the structure of government. Which is it, or what is the balance between the two factors?

Mr. Baker: I will answer that question as soon as I have dealt with the Price Waterhouse report. That report considered some of the metropolitan counties and districts and estimated that there would be a manpower saving of some 3,500. That is close to our own estimates.

There was also a joint report by the chief executives and borough treasurers of Bury, Rochdale, Stockport and Trafford. They suggested a saving of £11·5 million in the Greater Manchester council alone. Such figures point to levels similar to those that we have estimated in the Bill.

There has also been a report by four London boroughs —Bromley, Kensington, Wandsworth and Westminster —which estimated that they would save about £35 million on the administrative side—this will interest the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett)—and that by changing policy they could save another £65 million, making £100 million in all. We have not included those policy savings. If the hon. Gentleman presses me about whether it should be administration or policy, I should say that there are substantial savings to be made in the administration of the GLC. I have mentioned its tremendous number of committees and the superstructure that has been built up. In the 12 months from September 1983 to September 1984, its staff records show an astonishing increase of 1,280 in the number of staff in post. That is a 6 per cent. increase in staff in an authority which has little more than one year to live.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Baker: Perhaps I might be allowed to conclude as I think that the Committee wants to move on to the next group of amendments. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friends in some part of our proceedings. There are substantial savings to be made from efficiencies, changes and the elimination of duplication and from the removal of a tier of unnecessary, costly and remote government. For those reasons I hope that the Committee will reject these amendments.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The Minister has failed to answer major criticisms about the Government's proposals concerning savings. If the Minister is convinced that savings are justified, why is he afraid of these amendments? Why is he afraid of amendment No. 8 which asks for an inquiry into the implications for local government unit costs? If what he says is to be believed, he would not be afraid to accept it. Why is he afraid to lay before Parliament, as requested by amendment No. 9, a detailed analysis of implications for public expenditure? If his arguments are justified, he could give us such an analysis. Why is he afraid of amendment No. 30, which would enable us to know what percentage of expenditure of the councils that are to be abolished will be borne by the districts and London boroughs, what percentage will be borne by the quangos and joint boards and what percentage will be the responsibility of the Minister? If what he says is true, and there are savings to be made, why does he not accept that amendment and tell us the facts? Why is he afraid of amendment No. 31, which would set up a Select Committee to examine the costs of his proposals? We should remember that it was the Conservative Government who established Select Committees for such purposes.

As suggested by amendment No. 9, Parliament must be entitled to assurances that the same costs and levels of expenditure will be maintained by the London boroughs, the metropolitan districts, the joint boards and the quangos. Has the Minister given the game away? Will there be significant savings only if there are changes in policy? That means cuts in services and job losses. Is this not another attack, not on councils, but on people most in need, who are served by the councils that are to be abolished?

I should like to consider the Government's argument that they are streamlining the cities and getting rid of two-tier local government. Earlier today, the Labour party manifesto was quoted as favouring one-tier local government where possible. The Redcliffe-Maud commission favoured one-tier local government where possible but concluded that it was not possible in urban areas and conurbations. The Bill does not set up one-tier local government. It establishes and maintains two-tier local government, but one of the tiers is not to be democratically elected. That is the difference. If the Government really were streamlining the cities and getting rid of a local tier of local Government, we might accept that savings could be made.

Irrespective of the arguments about joint boards and other proposed arrangements, none of them can work without management costs. The Government want to replace seven authorities with at least 19 joint bodies, a host of joint committees and other co-operative arrangements often with statutory backing. Where will the administrative savings come from? Seventy per cent. of Merseyside county council's expenditure will go not to the districts there but to the joint boards and quangos that will be established. How can we therefore envisage administrative savings? Has the Minister given the game away? Are not the savings those which will result from changes in policy and from the continuation of the trend that the Government have established, in which 61 per cent. of local authority expenditure funded by central Government has dropped to 48·8 per cent? Grant has been cut in metropolitan areas, and indeed, throughout the country, which is causing cuts in services and the rate increases, for which the Government criticise the GLC and metropolitan counties.

10.15 pm

The tremendous upheaval that abolition will cause will not be justified by the estimated savings, which could be a mere 2 per cent. of the metropolitan counties' total expenditure. Local government expenditure as a proportion of GDP and public sector spending has fallen during the past five years, while central Government expenditure has risen.

To take Merseyside county council as an example—this is true for all authorities—much of the increase in costs borne by the local authoritiy, which is to be abolished, has been caused by matters outside its control. I refer to police pay, the needs of the regions, penalties on grants and so on.

If the amendments are not accepted, these proposals will be a recipe for increased bureaucracy, the continuing duplication of services, and the continuation of two tiers, one of which will no longer be democratically elected. The proposals are opposed by the Labour and alliance parties and by all informed opinion outside the House. Despite what the Secretary of State says, they continue to be opposed by voluntary organisations, which see their funding cut and the duplications that the system will create, and recognise that that will cause them and the electors great difficulties.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

10.30 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 1, leave out line 10.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 12, in page 1, line 10, after 'Council', insert

'shall be replaced by a directly elected authority representing the area presently administered by the Greater London Council, such authority's functions and powers to be determined by Parliament following an enquiry by a Select Committee of the House of Commons into the functions and powers of the Greater London Council.'.

No. 46, in page 1, line 15, at end add—

'(3) On the abolition date there shall be established for each metropolitan county and for Greater London a body corporate to be known by the name of that county with the addition of the words "Precepting Authority" or to be known as the Greater London Precepting Authority, as the case may be.

(4) The authorities established by subsection (3) above shall consist of members elected by the local government electors of the metropolitan county of Greater London, as the case may be, in accordance with this Act and the Representation of the People Act 1983.

(5) The authorities established by subsection (3) above may in respect of any financial year, or part year, beginning with the abolition date issue precepts to the appropriate rating authority for the levying of rates to meet, to the extent the authority considers reasonable in all the circumstances, the expenditure of the bodies or persons or joint committees (other than directly elected bodies) to whom functions are transferred by this Act.'.

Mr. Hughes: I have the privilege to move this amendment which stands in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends in what I sense is the most important debate on the most important amendments to the most important clause to be debated during the Committee stage of this most important Bill.

The amendment would delete the GLC from the list of councils that the Government propose to abolish. The effect of all the amendments would be to ensure the continuance of directly elected government for London across London. We seek to do no less than to take the heart out of the Bill. We seek to do so because we believe that to do away with a single tier of Londonwide government without any proposal for a better Londonwide alternative is mindless as well as heartless. We seek to do so because we believe that the obsession with abolition that only as recently as last year entered the mind of the Prime Minister and her Government, if carried into legislation, will take the democracy from the city that is at the heart of our nation.

To abolish the GLC and to put no Londonwide democracy in its place is to decapitate democracy in our capital. So it is to retain the GLC that we move the amendment, with retention as its first objective. We know that the GLC is not and has never been perfect. We also know that, before it, the LCC was not perfect. The GLC is not the model regional authority that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I would wish, but it is easier and, we believe, cheaper to improve government in our capital city by extending and improving the existing structure than by knocking down the edifice that was first erected in 1889 and making no real attempt to replace it with any structure at all.

It is not that there will not be one structure to replace the GLC, but that there will be no replacement and many replacements at the same time. The Liberal party has always been in favour of regional government for London, as for elsewhere, and we have a record of consistency that is unparelleled for any party that has been in the House since before the Herbert commission reported. Compared with all our partners in Europe, Britain does not have a happy track record, and this is not a very happy, altough unique, proposal.

The report of the Institute of Local Government Studies was published last year, comparing the proposal for London with other metropolitan and capital cities in western Europe and north America. Page two states:

"The turbulent history of recent local government change in England amazes our continental neighbours . . .While reform outside the United Kingdom has generally been gradual, through a long programme of amalgamations which give priority to initiatives by local municipalities and tailor metropolitan institutions to the particular case, the English metropolitan areas have undergone one traumatic reorganisation in recent times, and in the case"—

not our concern at the moment—

"of the West Midlands, two in the space of eleven years."

The report continues with this telling phrase:

"Amongst European democracies British local government must now seem a very tender plant."

The Government intend to pull up by the roots the best example of the tender plant of local government primarily and quite clearly because they do not like the colour of the flower. Our objections are clear. The proposal to abolish the GLC is not based on an objectively strong or argued case. The economies asserted have not been proved. But, even more important, the clause that we seek to amend would try to ensure that instead of London logically having, as it does have, a unity throughout its area, there would be no co-ordinating tier of government. We believe that there should be a tier of Government to co-ordinate and complement the functions of the boroughs across the square miles of Greater London, the boundaries of which are, for most people and most purposes, artificial and of little day-to-day relevance.

We say also that to abolish the GLC will not, as has often been said, result in government not being carried out for London—it will be carried out in a much less co-ordinated, much less simple and much less accountable manner. This clause, unless amended, will result in the fragmentation and dispersal of the functions of London's government.

The proposal was put forward in the manifesto because the Government said that the GLC was wasteful and unnecessary. They said that they would return most of the functions to the boroughs. Of course, that is untrue. Most of the functions were previously not with the boroughs, but were at county level. If the proposals go through, two thirds of the expenditure will go elsewhere than to borough councils. Only 15 per cent. of the services will go to them.

The Government accept that only 12 per cent. of the cost of local government in Greater London is borne by the GLC, so on any scale of values it cannot, even at its worst, be that wasteful. In the argument about what is necessary, the Government do not appear to have struck a supportive chord among the people of London and its surrounding areas.

We do not accept that joint boards are an acceptable alternative. If the Secretary of State does not understand that, I can tell him that, rather than a GLC, whose councillors I and the other residents of London elected four years ago, working for London, there will be running London a Secretary of State whom I did not put in the job, a joint board which I did not choose for the job, or a quango appointed to the job by other than those who pay for the services.

Rather than 33 relationships across London, there will be 500 different relationships—different bodies levying the moneys from the ratepayers to pay for services. At the end of the day, the process of democracy will not work. Democracy is about choosing between priorities — making choices to do one thing rather than another. When the roads are the responsibility of one department, industry and employment policies of another, and the fire service of a joint board, when planning is the responsibility of the Secretary of State advised only by a planning commission and when waste disposal goes elsewhere, choices about priorities—which is what democracy is all about—can no longer be made.

It is untrue to say that decisions will be left with democratically elected representatives. Under the Bill, those who take over the government of London will have an enormous plethora of controls ultimately exercised by the Secretary of State and his right hon. Friends at the top of the bureaucratic tree of the Civil Service and Whitehall Government.

The overwhelming view of Londoners—50 per cent. in January and 74 per cent. when they were last polled —even in the constituency of Finchley, represented by the Prime Minister — and, I have no doubt, in the constituency of Enfield, Southgate, as we shall see tomorrow — is that the Government must think again. The chaos and confusion, let alone the inevitable job losses, jobs that the transition will cause are complex and unnecessary.

From 1885, when the metropolitan board of works was set up, London has had an unbroken line of multi-functional, democratically elected governors for its services. This Government propose to break that line. Our amendment would solve for the Government the problem of the embarrassing position they have got themselves into by their political misjudgment of the views of the people whom they are meant to represent.

I end with a quote from the report comparing these proposals with those affecting other European capital cities. The report states:

> "It is easy in the United Kingdom for a government to abolish an institution. It can almost invariably find support from those who see themselves likely to gain powers from its abolition. It is much more difficult to replace it with sound and robust alternatives that will have the public support on which they will depend to succeed."

I ask the Committee to accept either the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) as a second-best alternative, or our amendment as an even better alternative, and to reject the proposal to abolish the GLC. The proposal is unacceptable. We resist it, and we ask the Government and those hon. Members who would normally support the Government to think again on this issue and to change the Government's mind.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) was kind enough to trail my amendment, so perhaps I can make it plain to hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber that I intend to confine my remarks to amendment No. 12 which stands in the name of a number of right hon. and hon. Friends and myself and which is preferable to the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey.

The Government are guilty of reflex politics in this regard. It all began on a night in 1981 when there was a putsch or pogrom, or whatever one likes to call it, and Mr. McIntosh was replaced by Mr. Livingstone. Incredulity became hostility, and a Tudor attitude of "off with his head" became the whim of the moment. We found in last year's manifesto a commitment which, I suggest to my hon. Friends, had not been sufficiently clearly thought through — a commitment to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties. I know that many of my hon. Friends feel strongly about manifesto commitments, and that is reasonable. Manifestos are a general expression of intent by a political party; but we still have a constituency system. Each of us is individually answerable to our electorates.

It so happens that in my constituency we had 50 copies of the Conservative election manifesto. I think that we got rid of 23 of them—I believe that three were bought and 20 were given away. I know that 53,000 copies of my election address, or thereabouts, went out and that the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties did not feature in the document—comprehensive and excellent though it was. Therefore, I do not feel that I am at all bound by that last-minute pledge, rushed in as it was without adequate consultation. Yet, at the same time, I am deeply sensible of the susceptibilities of my hon. Friends who feel that the otherwise excellent document that emanated from central office has a binding effect. That is why my right hon. and hon. Friends and I have devised this amendment.

10.45 pm

We have accepted the logic and logistics of a large majority. We understand that the metropolitan counties, which a Conservative Government of whom my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was proud to be a member brought into existence a decade ago, are likely to be swept away. We accept that there is strength in the argument and that the cities within those metropolitan counties will have directly elected authorities governing their affairs. We also accept that many legitimate critcisms can be made of the GLC, although I rather think that if Sir Horace Cutler had been returned to power in 1981 we would not be debating this measure.

My biggest objection to the Bill—that is why I have not and will not vote for it on any occasion—is that it is entirely peripheral to the major issues facing our nation today. Be that as it may, my right hon. Friend and the Prime Minister have decided that the GLC will go. So, in a spirit of conciliation and compromise, which used to be the hallmark of the Tory party before it exchanged a philosopy for dogma, we are prepared to say, "All right, let it go, but at the same time"——

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): My hon. Friend will never make PPS now.

Mr. Cormack: My hon. Friend talks about PPSs. We have in this Government more PPSs than in history. It is the largest collection of eunuchs in high places since the Pope disbanded the castrati.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Just because my hon. Friend did not become a PPS.

Mr. Cormack: I was a PPS long before my hon. Friend was out of nappies. I found it a delightful but somewhat restricting experience and I did not continue.

We are saying, "All right, we will accept what you are seeking to do in respect of the metropolitan counties, albeit reluctantly; we will accept what you are seeking to do with the GLC, albeit reluctantly, but we will not accept that London, the flower of cities all, the greatest city in the world, should be without a directly elected council".

It is a sad coincidence that this week we should be commemorating the 200th anniversary of the death of Dr. Johnson, who said of London:

"when a man is tired of London, he is tired of life; for there is in London all that life can afford"— in 1984, all that life affords apart from a directly elected council. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend's knowledge of history is about as profound as his knowledge of parliamentary tactics. I just wish that he would listen for a moment. He can have his own go later if he catches your eye, Mr. Armstrong.

In the amendment we are seeking to say to the Government, "Here is an opportunity to heed the words of those who, over the past few months, since the paving Bill"—that iniquitous measure—"was brought before the House have said, 'Please think again.'" We are not calling in aid a galaxy of pseudo-intellectuals of the Left; we are calling in aid men of great experience who have served local government well and nobly for many years. They are people like Sir Horace Cutler and Lord Marshall——

Mr. Dykes: Bernard Brook-Partridge.

Mr. Cormack: And Bernard Brook-Partridge. My hon. Friend can mention many Conservatives, and doubtless he will do so. There is also Desmond Plummer. All those who have had deep and proper experience of London government believe that it is necessary that London should have a centrally elected co-ordinating authority.

This week a letter came into my possession. It was written by an eminent elder statesman of the Tory party. He said:

"No one person or a collective is entitled to take the Conservative party along a course fraught with difficulties during the necessarily long gestation period without keeping an ear to the ground to see that the earth is not shifting."

They are wise words, uttered by a very eminent Conservative local statesman, as I shall call him. [HON. MEMBERS: "Who was it?"] I shall reveal the source later. I was given the letter by a colleague who received it from the person in question and does not wish the writer's name to be revealed at the moment. I hope that hon. Members in all parts of the Committee are prepared to accept my word.

I should like to quote from a speech made by Neville Beale, the GLC member for Finchley, who happens to represent an area that is not entirely unfamiliar to the leader of our party. He says:

"Sir Horace . . . commissioned a detailed study of local government in London by the man who is now Lord Marshall and, until recently, vice-chairman of the Party. Whether everyone agrees with Lord Marshall's conclusions or not, it is a matter of some regret that the incoming Tory Government in 1979 appears to have ignored his report."

He says of Mr. Livingstone:

"the case against Ken Livingstone is not the same as the case against the GLC. Nor is the case against the GLC the case for the particular proposals in the Abolition Bill which received its Second Reading in the Commons . . . It is painfully obvious that many Tory MPs and many Tory Peers are deeply troubled by what is happening, even if reluctant to defy the Whips."

I suggest to my hon. Friends that there is deep unease throughout the country at what is being proposed. Supporting amendment No. 12—modest proposal that it is—would give my hon. Friends an opportunity to say to the Government,

"You do not have to tear up your whole measure but you can rethink this particular central provision in it".

I should be disappointed if we did not get a positive and helpful reply from the Secretary of State this evening.

Infallibility is a characteristic of few Governments. It is no answer to cogent arguments to ride roughshod over them. We have seen that happen too often in recent years. We have seen the attitude that there is a God-given right to govern. There is sometimes a case for a little humility when looking at the voting figures. A few weeks ago Mr. Walter Mondale polled in the popular vote roughly the same as the Conservative party polled in the popular vote in this country last year. He has retired from politics; we are assuming that we have a right to do whatever we want to do.

I urge my right hon. Friend to remember that he was a distinguished member of a Government who brought in the very apparatus that he is now seeking to destroy. He has a great knowledge of London. His own county councillor has told him that on this occasion he might well be advised to think again. He should listen to Alan Greengross, Horace Cutler, Neville Beale and the voices on his own Back Benches. I hope that he will——

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Don't knock me over.

Mr. Cormack: I must apologise to my hon. Friend. The last thing that I would wish to do is knock her over. Her contributions to our deliberations are always elegant and enlightened.

Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State please think carefully before he rejects the amendment? We do not wish to press it to a Division, but press it to a Division we most certainly will unless there is a categorical assurance that there will be a directly elected authority to represent this great capital city.

Mr. Pavitt: The House always enjoys listening to the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), because he is one of the few Members who not only enlighten the House but relieve some of the acres of boredom that my late right hon. Friend Nye Bevan warned us about when we first came to this place.

I should like to go back into history and say why, much to my regret, I think that the hon. Gentleman's case is falling upon deaf ears on the Conservative Front Bench. I should like to refer to directly elected representatives. I suppose that I am the only person in the Chamber who spent long and weary hours in 1963 on the Standing Committee of the Bill that created the GLC. During my 20 years in the House I have been bedevilled by two Tory Ministers—one is the right hon. Member for Leeds, North East (Sir K. Joseph), who inaugurated that Bill and afterwards had a disastrous reorganisation of the National Health Service—I served on that Standing Committee—and the other is the present Secretary of State for the Environment, who later had the task of undoing the mess that had been made of the NHS. Of course, I served on that Standing Committee. Now we reach this Bill.

[Mr. Pavitt]

The history has been made plain in previous debates. In talking about the colour of the flowers, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) put his finger on the important point. The purpose of the original Bill in 1963, which this one now seeks to obviate and obliterate, was entirely the political motive that Herbert Morrison's LCC had to be changed because it had been Labour-controlled since it was established. To do so, that original 1963 Bill incorporated pieces of Kent, including Bromley, and eliminated the Middlesex county council, to arrange boundaries. It looked as if two things would happen — first that the GLC would become Conservative-controlled instead of Labour, and secondly that many of the 32 boroughs that were created would also be Conservative. Neither of those things happened.

When the Secretary of State for the Environment, who followed the history of that first Act closely, was consulted about the Bill, he realised the great mistake in the Conservative party's judgment: following the establishment of that new large body, there were elections. Therefore, when the Bill was first mooted, there was a good deal of discussion in the contacts that the right hon. Gentleman was having with the Prime Minister of whether or not to have an election or how the Government would get out of having one. The right hon. Gentleman is a serious political operator. He was not going to face the possibility again of having a directly elected responsible body in charge of all the strategy that is needed for the greatest capital city in the world because the last time that was done by his right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East, the Tory party lost out. Therefore an excellent case has been made out by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who moved the amendment.

Throughout our debates a plea has been made from this side of the Chamber that the Conservative party should not desert its democratic principles, but it has fallen on deaf ears. Although I hope that the Secretary of State for the Environment will come to the Dispatch Box and say, "We shall return to the philosophy of Disraeli, Iain Macleod and Macmillan. We will accept the amendment so that there will be democracy for an elected authority" I do not believe that it will happen. I have passed the age when I believe in miracles.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): I do not intend to spend long upon discussing the merits and demerits of Amendment No. 12. Even though I may take no further part in the debates I believe it to be essential that one hon. Member for London should endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) has proposed.

I supported the Bill on Second Reading. I believe that it is desirable to abolish the Greater London council and to redistribute its functions. I have also supported the Government in defeating various amendments. However, I do not favour abolition unless some of the strategic functions can be replaced. I cannot agree that 7 million Londoners should flounder at the mercy of a disparate collection of 32 boroughs. This will lead either to chaos, or to a vacuum, or to an alternation of both.

If the amendment is passed I shall be glad to continue to support the Government in their efforts to abolish the GLC. If the amendment is not accepted or if, worse, is defeated, I shall give no further support to what I believe to be a fundamentally deficient Bill. I shall oppose it if it remains unaltered after the Report stage, at its Third reading.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I do not wish to apportion blame. All hon. Members on the Government side of the Chamber agree that the Greater London council should be abolished. Our only concern is what should replace it. We are concerned about accountability, a point which was made frequently during the debate on Second Reading. I do not wish to deal with that subject tonight, but with the provision of a framework for London that is both effective and efficient. If the Bill remains unamended it will create a multiplicity of precepting bodies. They will impose precepts upon the boroughs either individually or as a group.

Secondly, each precepting body will be orientated towards its own functions and will not have an overall view of London. Each precepting body will require its own premises, equipment and staff and it will also require borough councillors to serve upon it. This could impose an intolerable work load upon them, given their borough duties.

Lastly, I do not believe that my right hon. Friend can deny that as a result of the quangos and joint boards there will be fragmentation, which will lead to less efficiency.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have listened with some astonishment to my hon. Friend. He does not appear to have taken on board that there are no extra precepts for the outer London boroughs. There is one extra precept for the Inner London boroughs. There is to be one joint board for London. During the last few minutes my hon. Friend has spoken as though there is to be a plethora of precepts and joint boards. I must ask him to address himself to the proposals contained in the Bill, not to a figment of his imagination.

Mr. Leigh: All that I can do is to refer my right hon. Friend to those who are involved in local government in London and particularly to members of the Conservative group on the GLC, who have studied the proposals carefully and are convinced that there will be major rate increases in outer London. The difficulty with the new structure is that it will not be directly elected and, therefore, it flies in the face of accountability.

My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) is asking for a new structure which will be directly elected and primarily concerned with policy-making and not with executive government. It will not be a local authority for the purposes of the Act and will not have section 137 and 142 powers to abuse. Its functions will be precisely defined. It will not be able slowly to acquire powers and thereby become a GLC Mark II.

Mr. Wheeler: I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend's argument. Can he tell us precisely what function he would give to the new authority? As he is proposing a new authority, he ought to be able to tell us what he would give it to do.

Mr. Leigh: I am about to deal with that. The authority's functions would include the fire brigade, civil defence, flood prevention, land drainage and refuse disposal. It would also have planning functions and be involved with the structure plan and the resolution of conflicts between the boroughs. It would also have financial functions.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): My hon. Friend started by saying that the strategic authority would not have executive functions, but he is now outlining functions that are all executive functions.

Mr. Leigh: I say that all the powers that can possibly be devolved to the boroughs should be so devolved. As my hon. Friend knows, some powers cannot be devolved to the boroughs and have to be vested in some sort of authority.

The new authority could have financial functions for debt management and rate equalisation, and ad hoc functions, including responsibilities for historic buildings, arts, regional policy and the green belt. Those are all Londonwide functions. For funding, the authority could make an annual bid to the Secretary of State.

What are the advantages of such an authority? It would be accountable, cost-effective and efficient. It would not be a local authority, and it would provide a voice for London, avoid the multiplicity of joint boards and quangos, provide a framework for policy-making, avoid the centralisation of power in the Secretary of State, provide an easy mechanism for rate equalisation, eliminate duplication, strengthen and not weaken the executive arm of the boroughs, by ensuring co-ordination, and standardise delivery of services.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): My hon. Friend stressed that the authority should be accountable, but he says that it could be financed by a direct bid. I have always understood that one of the essences of accountability is that the authority raises money. According to my hon. Friend it will not raise money, but will simply apply to the Secretary of State. Is my hon. Friend commending that form of accountability to the House?

Mr. Leigh: I am simply trying to be helpful to the Government. I am not proposing a GLC Mark II. We are trying to devise a framework that is efficient.

My hon. Friends who support the Bill face a difficulty. What will they do about the functions that cannot be devolved to the boroughs? There must be a Londonwide voice for London.

Let me throw out a last lifeline to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. If he is not prepared under any circumstances to accept a directly elected body, I hope that he will listen to Mr. Bob Vigars who is a member of the GLC and is worried about the Bill. He does not believe that the good government of London would be helped by fragmentation. I do not say that his solution is a desirable one, but it is better than we have at the moment. He is asking for a statutory LBA. I do not believe that that is necessarily the best solution but at least it would provide a Londonwide framework and a voice for London. If my right hon. Friend is not prepared to accept the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South, I hope that we will consider that alternative.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Earlier this week I said that the Opposition were the true democrats and custodians of democracy and that we wanted an extension of democracy. It is painful to hear the reactions of the Conservatives who are in the process of taking democracy from the people in the GLC and metropolitan county areas. I make no apology for my position. It is absolutely clear. I am for the continuation of the GLC and all the metropolitan councils. I shall take the example of Tyne and Wear to illustrate my points.

In an area of high unemployment, deep economic problems and all the consequent social problems, it is essential to have elected representatives accountable to the people through a strategic authority which can help to solve some of those problems despite the attitudes of the Government. That is why I support amendment No. 46.

Democracy must also be simple and clearly understood. The Government's proposals will make the situation extremely complex and difficult to understand. One authority for Tyne and Wear is to be replaced by seven authorities, each with its own functions. That is absurd. How people in the area are to understand the differences in how the bodies operate is beyond imagination. I have personal experience of a similar situation, having lived in a new town, where there was a development corporation, controlled centrally, a elected town council, an elected district council and an elected county council, and many people were confused about the functions of those bodies.

In my area things are fairly simple at present. There is the borough council—in this case, Sunderland—and the county council. In place of that, we are to have eight different bodies directly accountable to the Secretary of State, the joint boards and joint committees accountable to a body consisting of elected representatives from the district and borough councils, and then the local council.

Despite what the Government say, it is clear that only minimal power is to be transferred from the strategic county authority to the borough council. It is estimated that it will amount to a maximum of 20 per cent. in terms of spending power, while the joint boards, joint committees and residuary authorities will have 80 per cent. In other words, the main services now administered by Tyne and Wear county council will go to three different bodies.

By no stretch of the imagination can Conservative Members claim that that is an extension of democracy. It is an extension of confusion and of Government control and an increase in centralisation. We want an increase in decentralisation. We believe in accountability. We believe that elected representatives should do what they believe is right in their elected authorities for three, four or five years and then come before the electorate to answer for their actions during that period. How can that be accepted when there will be a plethora of committees? In fact, no one can forecast how many committees there will be.

11.15 pm

Mr. Cowans: My hon. Friend is making a tremendous case. While the case put forward by Conservative Members in respect of the GLC is valid, it is equally valid in respect of every metropolitan county. The case is that there is no need for residuary boards if there is another authority in London, and that applies to every met county.

Mr. Boyes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for putting the argument so succinctly.

I guarantee that, as a result of this reorganisation, the job prospects and conditions of the people of my area will become worse. When Labour is in power in a few year time, it is absolutely inevitable that the outcry will be such that it will be necessary to reintroduce a tier of strategic government to carry out the functions needed to get our people back to work and to raise their standard of living.

Mr. Dykes: Although as time goes on some of the peripheral and tangential arguments change about what local authorities should do, the central arguments always persist. That theme was part of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), who ably presented the amendment on behalf of a number of my hon. Friends following the amendment proposed by the second Bench below the Gangway.

Whatever may now be said by Ministers in their awkward position—and we all sympathise greatly with the dilemma faced by my right hon. Friend and his colleague—the essential truth always remains.

I hope that colleagues from outside the capital city will accept our apologies for talking about London. The central function of London government was best summed up and encapsulated — despite the fact that he had recent difficulties over another political battle of a totally different kind—by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science in his former capacity as Minister for Housing and Local Government. During Second Reading of the London Government Bill he rightly, and with great conviction and enthusiasm, quoted the "masterly Report of clarity, humanity and vision" of the Herbert Commission and said that it formed

"the basis of the . . . Bill".

He said that

"Greater London is, in a very real sense, a single city"

unit needing a directly elected Greater London council. He added:

"One would have thought that this proposal that Londoners should have an effective say in the shaping of their own environment would have an obvious appeal".

He continued:

"Those who find it unpalatable must face up to the question of what they would have instead".

He also rejected specifically and with great clarity and enthusiasm the use of joint boards or a joint board for Londonwide strategic functions. In the same debate, he said:

"No solution can be found by submitting these great tasks to delegates of local authorities responsible for part only of the area and its problems and some of which have responsibilities which are not only different from but often in conflict with the interests of London."—[Official Report, 10 December 1962; Vol. 669, c. 51-53.]

If we examine these matters in a dispassionate way, there is no reason why we should conclude that the basic rationale for the creation of a Greater London authority is no longer valid. It has not been changed by the short-term political considerations that may have arisen in various accidental ways since the last general election.

The basic arguments remain entirely valid. None of my hon. Friends could say tonight, in all honesty and with conviction, that everything has been fundamentally changed by a multitude of tangible factors that necessitate an entirely different basic structure for London's Government, which must now be devolved to some extent to the boroughs but mostly to central Government or to quangos and joint boards. In the old days such an idea would have been anathema to any Conservative Government. I find it most disappointing that my right hon. Friend and his colleagues on the Front Bench do not have the courage to admit the solemn obligation of Conservative Governments to the traditions of our own policy, which I had assumed to lie in devolution, decentralisation, passing down local functions, though at the same time they could encompass creating—as we did in the early 1960s—a dramatic new authority to undertake the strategic planning of the whole Greater London area.

There is no reason for any basic change. My right hon. Friend and his colleagues use an entirely spurious argument when they say that some or most of the functions would be returned to the 32 borough councils. On all the evidence, that is entirely wrong. Most of the GLC's citywide functions were inherited from the London county council, Middlesex and other county authorities. They cannot easily be divided among the boroughs. Hence there is to be an elaborate jungle—a nightmare structure—of quangos, joint boards, trusts and agencies, all relying on the patronage and decision-making powers of the Secretary of State.

The abolition scheme is designed to look like a plan for decentralisation but we know that in practice it is a very different thing. The financial breakdown reveals the true position in clear statistical terms.

As a traditional old-fashioned Tory, I will resist to the end of time — like my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst)—the idea that all power should end up in Whitehall. That was the traditional philosophy of the Labour party. Indeed, it still is that party's philosophy, although for tonight's purposes the Opposition are pretending that that is no longer so.

The Bill is a sad reflection of the opportunistic change in the Government's proposals since the general election. It results from an ill-thought-out, ill-considered proposal. Because it was not discussed with anyone in the Conservative party structure at any level, even the Cabinet, we are now lumbered with pretending to want to pass this ill-judged proposal into law.

The amendment is a valid proposal and should be supported not only by Conservative Members but by hon. Members in all parts of the Committee. The Government have achieved only very modest majorities on the previous amendments. They should think again before the Bill goes upstairs, and have the courage to change their mind.

Mr. Tony Banks: Although I have sat through so many debates about the GLC and the met councils since June 1983, I still find it unbelievable that this proposal is seriously made. I know that I should not, but I find it unbelievable that, after 95 years of directly elected citywide government in London, the Government are proposing that that voice is no longer needed. The Government might not have agreed with the noises that have come from county hall. They certainly have not agreed with the politics of those who control it, but surely that is not an argument for abolition of the GLC—that is an argument for getting out on the doorsteps and campaigning through the ballot box to get a change in that political control, not to steamroller it aside saying, "We do not like its politics and the people who control it, so we shall abolish it."

It is monstrous to suggest that 32 London boroughs can speak for London or, indeed, that the Secretary of State can speak for London. I understand that his Department has rejected the idea of a Minister for London, so who will speak for London?

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Quango speaking.

Mr. Banks: It is marvellous how strong tea can produce so much wit. It is amazing that the Government should persist in the idea that 32 boroughs can speak for London. The London Boroughs Association has never been able to speak for London. Even if it were suggested that it should be a statutory body, I do not believe that its ability to speak for London would be improved. People on that association are there to represent their boroughs. They will, as is their right, fight their corner and for their boroughs, not with a Londonwide voice. The continuing battle between county hall and this place has gone on for many years. I shall quote from a pamphlet written by the Progressive party in 1898, when a Conservative Government under Lord Salisbury again proposed the breaking up of London's government. It was called tenification at that time. The pamphlet said:

"There cannot be a town of Kensington or a town of Whitechapel, because the town life of a Londoner is not restricted to his own parish. Live where he may, the interests of his life are metroplitan, and no paper constitution of local mayors and councils can make it otherwise."

That is as true today with 32 London boroughs as it was then.

If the GLC's powers are devolved, not to the boroughs but to indirectly elected boards, as is suggested in the Bill, the following factors will arise. First, the boards will have a single purpose orientation. They will look after only one service. There will not be the argument on those boards that is found among Labour groups in county hall, or among Conservative groups, about conflicting demands of service. Secondly, the board will have no mandate for its services. It will have no programme for action on a citywide basis. Thirdly, it will be ineffective in resolving conflict because, as with the London Boroughs Association, representatives on indirectly-elected joint boards will argue for their small part of London. That is not good for London. It does no make good Londonwide sense. Although I have grave reservations about amendment No. 11, I share the desire of the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) for citywide government. We have it at the moment—it is called the GLC—and this amendment will in no way act as a substitute.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): In moving Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said:

"To most Londoners London is a series of separate local areas with very diverse characteristics. Camden has little in common with Croydon; Hackney has little in common with Harrow; Redbridge has little in common with Richmond."—[Official Report, 3 December 1984; Vol 69, c. 27.]

That is correct to an extent, but I do not believe that it is possible to consider London, our great capital city, merely as a collection of 32 Greater London boroughs. There is a need for a central voice to discuss many issues—for example, traffic. The GLC proposes very soon to introduce a ban on lorries in the London area at night and at weekends. That is a dotty proposal, which will do great damage to commerce in London if it is implemented.

11.30 pm

Under my right hon. Friend's proposals, those matters will pass to the Ministry of Transport. I have no great quarrel with that, but if the Department gets it wrong, where will we be able to criticise the proposals and discuss them? I doubt whether we will be able to do so on the Floor of the House, although I believe that it should be within the ambit of Parliament.

The issue of roads transcends the interests of individual local London boroughs.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Will my hon. Friend clarify one matter? In common with other hon. Friends and Opposition Members, he calls for a city wide voice. Is he asking that the authority should be merely a talking shop, capable of expressing opinion, or that it should be cloaked with executive powers? They are not one and the same thing.

Sir Philip Goodhart: I am not arguing for executive powers. The mere impact of debates has an influence on Ministers and the civil servants who prepare Ministers for them.

Mr. Cormack: Is it not interesting that many of those who are most vociferously against our suggestion are most vociferously in favour of the European Parliament?

Sir Philip Goodhart: I am not sure whether it has executive powers or not. I think that it is limited. The debates on some matters may have only a degree of interest.

The issue of roads transcends the interests of the individual Greater London boroughs. At least once a week I travel on the south circular road. If ever one wanted a monument to a lack of planning ability on the part of the GLC, the south circular would prove the case. At long last the Secretary of State for Transport has asked for a survey of needed improvements to the south circular. It may get it right, but it may get it wrong. The matter must be discussed by a central body.

Public transport also transcends the interests of one single Greater London borough. Obviously, our constituents have an interest. We are delighted that at long last politicians have been removed from the day-to-day control of London Regional Transport. To think that our constituents will not have an interest in the plans, performance and policies of London Regional Transport is absurd. We cannot spend one or two days a year discussing this on the Floor of the House, nor can it be effectively discussed by the London Boroughs Association.

We need a special Committee of the House to discuss such Londonwide issues, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will introduce an amendment on Report showing that the Government support the idea. I note that my right hon. and sometime Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) did not think much of the idea on Second Reading, when he said:

"Such a Committee would not have been democratically elected for London."—[Official Report, 4 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 191.]

I could not believe my ears when I heard him say that, but I checked it in the columns of Hansard, and there it was. It is difficult to imagine a more nonsensical argument against the concept. Whatever one may say about hon. Members who represent London constituencies, all of us received a higher proportion of votes at the general election than did any candidate at the GLC elections. To suggest that such a Committee would not be democratic is to misunderstand the meaning of democracy. I hope that the Government will be able to support this concept.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): As a London Member of Parliament, may I begin by making it clear that I regard the GLC as outdated, expensive and outmoded, and I have no hesitation in welcoming its departure. However, in January 1983 I chose to have a public debate in my constituency—my colleagues will tell me that that is a dangerous precedent — and invited for that purpose one of my hon. Friends and colleagues from London. We were to discuss the need or otherwise for a Londonwide body. We had a good, ding-dong debate that covered all the issues, and at the end of the meeting it was clear that a large majority of those present — most of whom were Conservatives—concluded that there was a need for a Londonwide body.

Invigorated by my practical demonstration of accountability, I was a little nonplussed a few months later when the election manifesto arrived, and I realised that the odd problem had appeared. As a consequence of that commitment, the Government are no longer addressing the central question, which is how best local government should be organised in Greater London. Instead they are addressing the question how best to dispose of the functions of the Greater London council. That is a very different matter, but one that, in the context of the way in which the debate has developed, has become almost the inevitable one, rather than the one I would wish.

It is true to say that one can distribute services in almost any way and they will still work.

The Government's proposals will work with fewer problems than has been suggested by the Opposition and with more problems than my hon. Friends have suggested. However, I am concerned that they lay great stress on the operation of joint boards. I speak as the former leader for several years of a large outer London borough, with all the powers, such as education and social services. My experience led me to believe that arguably the weakest role in local accountability was the operation of joint boards. It requires members who have been elected in a borough or district capacity to position themselves instead on a county or boroughwide basis. Above all, the role tends to fall on the shoulders of those who are not necessarily the most competent, but on those who happen to be available for day-time meetings, and those whom the Leader can rely on, rather than on those who have great expertise in the subject under discussion. Therefore, I am concerned at any proposals that would increase existing joint board activity, and remove a Londonwide authority elected for that purpose.

My colleagues will be relieved to hear that I do not want to make a long speech, but I should like my right hon. Friend to bear in mind my fears, and those of other hon. Members who have spoken. If this amendment is unacceptable, for whatever reason, will he at least keep an open mind on the subject, because many of us remain concerned, through public debates and private conversations? We want to see more than we have so far seen to be satisfied that the current proposals are necessarily the best.

Mr. Ashby: In debating this amendment, we have to ask ourselves what the current functions of the GLC are. We have had a lot of nostalgia from hon. Members who were members of the GLC some 15 years ago, but they do not know that the GLC is now a eunuch. It is a body with no powers. I was a member of the GLC between 1977 and 1981. I was vice-chairman of the development committee for a year. In that year, I drew up a list of all the land that the GLC possessed, which extended from Land's End to John o' Groats. Little of it was in London, and little of it was of any relevance to London. We got rid of it, and so the GLC ceased to have a relevant function.

I was chairman of the legal and parliamentary committee, where my prime function was to prepare the Greater London Council (Money) Bill, which I notice went through on the nod the other day. That is an unnecessary function of the GLC. My next role was three years as chairman of the housing committee, and in that time, we devolved housing from the GLC to the boroughs. If housing had not been so devolved, we should not be able to debate this Bill, because that was the major function of the GLC. Once the housing was gone, there was nothing left for the GLC to do.

Parks are virtually non-existent, and what parks there are could easily be devolved to the boroughs. What importance is there in the parks? The GLC makes no impact on the environment. Road repairs are nearly all done locally, and the major thoroughfares are looked after by the Ministry of Transport. The only major road being built is the Rochester way, which will soon be finished. The fire brigade runs itself — [Laughter.] Oh yes it does. Hon. Members should reflect that the GLC had the ambulance service for a few years until it was taken from it. There was no outcry about that, and the ambulance service runs very well. What happened to the fire service before 1964? We had a first-class fire brigade service in London, which was running very efficiently. We could easily return to that.

11.45 pm

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashby: I shall not give way for the moment.

The GLC's real function was strategic and was to produce the development plan. I believe that the development plan must be updated from time to time, but that is something that could easily be done by an ad hoc forum composed of the various elements of the boroughs. The only great hope for the GLC was docklands, but it is not developing that, because that has gone to the docklands development corporation. The board is doing a first-class job. After docklands what else was left?

I believe that the support for the GLC that we have heard represents a misunderstanding of its present lack of functions. I well remember the pamphlet of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). But 1976 was before housing was devolved. Once housing had gone, what was left——

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend is saying only that the Government can take more and more powers away from the GLC. We know that, but does he or does he not believe in democratic accountability?

Mr. Ashby: It is not a question of democratic accountability. The fact is that those functions have gone. What is left? Well, something very important is left.

Mr. Dykes: I do not want to prolong the debate, but as my hon. Friend has asked what is left, perhaps I can refer him to page 15 of that pamphlet, which states:

"There are three main principles to put forward:

1. The GLC must become a proper strategic authority within the South East Region.

2. There must be clearer lines of responsibility between the GLC and the boroughs.

3. The boroughs must be seen to be the primary units of local government in London."

Quite apart from housing, what about that?

Mr. Ashby: My hon. Friend is saying that we should get rid of the GLC but have a strategic south-east authority that covers the whole of the south east of England. That is a different argument. Some peole are in favour of regional policy although I am not one of them. However, that is a completely different thing. I do not see how my hon. Friend can argue like that. He is arguing there for something completely different.

I said that something was left, and that is the representational role. By that I mean a purely representational role and something that has been abrogated by the present regime in county hall, which does not like being representative. I would be in favour of having a lord mayor for Greater London——

Mr. Wilkinson: My hon. Friend would be marvellous.

Mr. Ashby: I would rather enjoy that role, and am grateful to my hon. Friend for that remark. But there is a case for having someone who is truly representational with a budget of several million pounds who is able to give great dinners — [Laughter.] — and to go to the great cities abroad representing London. But the very laughter that I hear illustrates the absurdity of the only representational role that one can think of for the GLC. It would be frivolous, and it would not be acceptable or understood — [Interruption.] Wandsworth can run Battersea park. There is nothing special about that park. There is nothing special either about Burgess park. They can all be run by the boroughs.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Ashby: There is absolutely no reason for maintaining the GLC.

Many people who are now speaking against the abolition of the GLC, not so long ago were in favour of its abolition. Many ex-members of the GLC, who are not protecting their own hides and are looking at the issue objectively, are saying that enough is enough. They favour abolition. There are dozens of hon. Members with——

Mr. Charles Morrison: By giving way, my hon. Friend has saved me the need to make a speech. With his great experience and knowledge of the GLC, will he comment on the report of Lord Marshall about the future of the GLC? After all, it was drawn up on the basis of a careful inquiry. Lord Marshall was empowered to recommend, if he felt so inclined, the abolition of the GLC, but he actually came out against that.

Mr. Ashby: Lord Marshall really stressed the representational role of the GLC. Anyone who has seen the recent agendas of the GLC will realise that it is an expensive debating shop on every subject except London — [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), who intervenes from a sedentary position, wants to replace the GLC mark 1 with a similar GLC mark 2 talking shop, producing nothing. I suspect that any attempt to find a solution to the problem will produce the same results.

The remaining areas that cause some of us concern, such as historic buildings and the green belt, are dealt with effectively in the Bill. With those out of the way, there is no other function for the GLC or any GLC mark 2, 3, 4 or 5.

Mr. Straw: With this group of amendments is included amendment No. 46, which proposes that the precepting authorities should be subject to election. As many Conservative Members wish to speak in this debate, and as it will be for the convenience of the House generally if it is concluded at a reasonable hour, I shall not say anything further about that amendment. There will be another opportunity, as the vote on the amendment will not arise until tomorrow evening.

On the issue raised by amendment No. 12, the speech by the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) was frivolous and ill-informed. It emphasises how important it is that there should be the fullest parliamentary scrutiny of these matters before the House and the Government reach a final decision. Although the amendment is not perfect, it is far better than the Government's proposal, and for that reason we shall support it.

I hope that the Secretary of State will realise that he has been lumbered with a commitment with which he probably disagrees and which he believes is not worth the candle. It is still not too late for the right hon. Gentleman to listen to counsel from both sides of the chamber. Proverbs have warned of the dangers facing the Government:

> "Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall".

Despite the fact that the Government have an enormous paper majority—they have not been able to wheel out that majority tonight; on three occasions tonight, the Government's majority has been cut to less than 50—it is important that the Government should listen to the arguments and the merits of the case and, for that reason, support the amendment.

Mr. Wilkinson: The last thing I would wish to do at this hour is to delay the Committee. I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to treat this matter with the seriousness it deserves. Throughout the spring and summer, between 12 and 15 of his hon. Friends representing London constituents sat long hours and worked hard trying to work out the best institution for London's government when the GLC was abolished. We support the abolition of the GLC. We are not convinced that the Government have adequately thought out what is to replace it.

The principle is simple: those aspects that can sensibly be devolved to the boroughs should be devolved; those that can more effectively be fulfilled at the centre should be carried out at the centre. The instrument for the power of execution should be directly elected, because in the past the Conservative party has not been afraid of direct elections. The support that the Government have enjoyed from hon. Members representing the shires has been given because they, like Conservative Members representing London constituencies, believe that the extra arrogation of powers to the Secretary of State, the degree of centralisation and the multiplicity of joint boards—the quangos—are not helping.

This legislation may prove to be boring. Indeed, the Government may wish to bore us into submission. I believe, as I said on Monday night, that, for our party, this will prove to be a devolution Bill. It will prove to be a parliamentary morass. We shall get deeper and deeper into the morass, and that will not be for the good government of London. London needs an elected voice to represent its interests to Government and to the nation. The Government may not realise that, but most Londoners do.

Londoners will judge this measure by how it affects their pockets. The financial implications are extremely sketchy and have not been thought through. I know that a careful and thorough analysis has been done by a highly qualified person, known to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. That document, which has been suppressed for the time being, proves that, far from reducing the costs to London ratepayers this measure means that they will pay more. I shall not say more than that. That document will be published shortly, and I suspect that it will, at a stroke, destroy the main rationale for what I regard as a thoroughly undemocratic measure which is not worthy of our party. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will oppose this measure in supporting the most excellent amendment on the list—amendment No. 12.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I shall be brief. I have two questions to ask my hon. Friends who are opposing this amendment. London is our capital city, and we all know what it means to us as our capital city. What is this geographical entity for which a few of my hon. Friends are pleading on behalf of some new local authority?

12 midnight

All right, it would include the City of London; it would include Westminster. I suppose that it would include Blackheath, where I was born, which used to be part of Surrey. Does it include Greenwich, Woolwich, Richmond — ancient old boroughs — Hendon, Dagenham and Camberley—umbilically attached to London? How far does it go? Does it go as far as Rugby 82 miles away and 56 minutes by train, closer in terms of communication with London than many of the places on the undefined periphery of this London that my hon. Friends are talking about?

My second question is one that has been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). What is the institution that my hon. Friends want? What is the scope of it? What powers should it have? The reality surely is that either it will be an embarrassment—an unloved and unwanted extravagance like the European Assembly, forever sentenced to posturing, lacking power and forever seeking power—or it will be instead a resurrected, second GLC? That is what they have said that they do not want. If they do not want it I suggest that they vote against it.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I agree with one thing that was said by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—that this is probably one of the most serious debates on the Bill. The amendment spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) raises one of the issues relating to London that has caused the most argumem. Many issues have been aired.

If I have one criticism of the debate—it is perhaps churlish of any Minister to criticise a debate, but I think it is a fair point, and I hope I shall go some way to remedy it—it is that many who spoke about London perhaps did not do so with the historical perspective of why we are where we are and why the Government have brought forward this measure.

When the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) quoted from the document called "The fight for the county council — an elector's catechism of February 1898" he made the fair point that the argument was raging then. I shall rehearse with the Committee why I think we are where we are, and justify the decisions that the Government have taken and the proposals that we have brought before the House.

There are three amendments in this group. They all have a common theme. They all seek to retain some form of directly elected body for each of the seven metropolitan areas. The amendments are different. The amendment moved by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey would preserve the GLC as it is—warts and all—with no changes. There are few hon. Members and few people who have been involved with the GLC or local government in the London boroughs who can support that.

There are arguments for some form of Londonwide body—and I shall deal with them—but not for the GLC as it is. Amendment No. 12 relates to some form of replacement authority. Amendment No. 46 which was spoken to by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) is different. It contains the strange proposition of an elected precepting authority separate from the joint boards that have operational responsibility for the services. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said that he hoped to be able to argue that point later. Perhaps in view of the time I will not deal with that at length now. I will say only that I hope that, when the time comes, the Committee will reject amendment No. 46.

I have just referred to amendment No. 11, which would leave the GLC untouched. I do not think that anybody wants that.

I shall devote the rest of my remarks to amendment No. 12, to which most of my hon. Friends and one or two Opposition Members have spoken. It deals with one of the key issues in the Bill. We welcome the fact that those who have put their names to the amendment recognise that the GLC in its present form must go, but I do not think that they have made out a case for a replacement body directly elected.

The word "metropolis" emerged about 150 years ago in the history of London government. That is how far the arguments go back. We have to remember that the formation of the first Londonwide body, when London was very much smaller than it is today, arose out of the need to have a sewerage system. It was the sewerage commissioners who first established the Londonwide body. I have nothing whatever against sewers; indeed, Disraeli was chided by his opponents as having a policy for sewers. But the public health legislation of Disraeli was, of course the foundation of much of our public health today. Today our main sewerage system is the responsibility of the Thames water authority.

There followed the Metropolitan Board of Works in 1855. It was a compromise between those who wanted local government for the vestries and those who wanted some form of metropolitan authority. But by the end—[Interruption.] If I may say so, the Committee has asked me to take the debate seriously, and I hope I am doing so. The argument is a very real and genuine one and it has lasted for over a century. [Interruption.] By the end of the 19th century there was a strong Conservative commitment to localism and a strong Liberal commitment to centralism.

When the Conservative party established the LCC in 1899 they saw it as part of a system that would consist as well of strong London boroughs. In 1899 they went on to create the boroughs, but they did not become the powerful bodies that were envisaged at the time. Even then they were having worries, concerns and doubts about the LCC. On Second Reading I quoted the words of the then Prime Minister, Lord Salisbury, and I quote them again. He said:

"We might have obtained a much more efficient machine if we had been content to look upon London as what it is, not as one great municipality but as an aggregate of municipalities". —[Official Report, 3 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 28.]

The argument continued. The Ullswater Commission was appointed in 1921, when the London suburbs fought off control by the LCC, but in 1950 London's rapid growth gave rise to pressure within the Tory party for reform. The hon. Member for Blackburn mentioned the "Powell plan", conceived by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in 1955. It proposed the abolition of the LCC and the transfer of most of its functions to seven new county boroughs, which would form what is now recognised as the inner London area.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Secretary of State is giving us a very interesting historical lecture, but will he agree that each time the government of London was examined by the various bodies they came to the conclusion that a citywide body and a citywide voice were necessary?

Mr. Jenkin: I do not deny that at all. It is a matter of history. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop the historical perspective. I was asked to treat this as the most important amendment in the Bill. I am sorry —although the hour is late, my hon. Friends deserve a full reply.

The Powell plan led to the establishment of the Herbert Commission, which reported in 1960. It recommended a single council for Greater London, originally with 52 London boroughs, smaller than the present ones, but with the enormously important provision that the London boroughs should be the primary units of local government——

Mr. Dykes rose——

Mr. Jenkin: I am sorry. I hope that my hon. Friend will bear with me. The point is that until then there had not been powerful boroughs in London. None of the boroughs up to 1964 had ever had full powers anything like those of most purpose authorities with three exceptions—the three county boroughs of Croydon, East Ham and West Ham. All the rest had lesser powers. The creation of the GLC, so vigorously defended by the Labour party today, was bitterly opposed, line by line, clause by clause by the Labour party in 1962 and 1963.

The most important point is that the creation of those powerful London boroughs alongside a GLC——

Dr. Cunningham: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Jenkin: May I develop this argument?

Dr. Cunningham rose——

Mr. Jenkin: All right, I shall give way.

Dr. Cunningham: Why does the right hon. Gentleman keep emphasising the point about powerful London boroughs when he introduced a Rates Act to stop them being powerful in the way that they want?

Mr. Jenkin: With respect, that is irrelevant to the argument. The great majority of London boroughs will not and will never need to be rate-capped, and the hon. Gentleman knows that.

The point that I was making before the hon. Gentleman diverted the argument is that the creation of the strong London boroughs in 1964 contained within it the seeds of the destruction of the GLC, because what has become clear in the 20 years since then is that once one has the London boroughs, responsible as they are for over 80 per cent. of local authority spending in London, most purpose authorities with all the major local authority functions, it becomes impossible to have a viable separately elected authority on top of that without the inevitability of conflict, argument and confusion.

In a long and perceptive lecture on the history of local government in London, an academic, Mr. Kenneth Young, commented:

"The GLC has always been too weak to be effective. But at the same time it has been too powerful to be accepted."

Mr. Wilkinson: Could my right hon. Friend explain to the Committee who will pay in the boroughs for the cost of the additional functions transferred from the GLC, upon abolition, to the boroughs? That is an important point as this year, for example, my own borough of Hillingdon already faces a rate increase of about 40 per cent., as my right hon. Friend knows, largely because of central Government policy. This is an important point, and I ask my right hon. Friend to give the Committee a clear explanation.

Mr. Jenkin: That does not directly arise on this amendment, but I can assure my hon. Friend that in the financial provisions towards the end of the Bill there is a series of clauses designed to make sure that the GRE, rate support grant, and so on, which go or should go to the GLC if it spends at a reasonable level will, of course, be distributed among the London boroughs so that they have the resources as well as the rateable capacity to pay for the services that devolve upon them.

12.15 am

These are complicated and technical matters, but the provisions are intended to ensure that no fortuitous gain or loss occurs as a result of the redistribution of the powers among the boroughs. The London rates equalisation scheme will also preserve a substantial measure of redistribution, as happens between the wealthy and the poorer boroughs of London. We shall come to that matter at a later stage. My hon. Friend does not have anything to worry about.

It is scarcely surprising that the argument for the abolition of the GLC began to be heard quite soon after it was set up in the early 1970s. Serious thought was given within the Conservative Party to the abolition of the GLC. Before the 1974 general election a Conservative policy statement promised an urgent review "of what further powers should be devolved to the London boroughs by the GLC".

The same Mr. Kenneth Young put forward the view that, had the Conservative party won the general election in 1974, a Bill would have been introduced to abolish the GLC.

The conflict that has taken place during the last 100 years has represented a conflict between the centralists pressing for uniformity and central control and the localists who are arguing for as much power to be given to the borough councils as possible. It is the Conservative party which has usually, though not always, followed the localist cause while the Liberal and Labour parties have always followed the centralist cause. In his speech the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey put forward the traditional centralist argument for London: that as much power as possible should be given to the centre. He followed the very honourable tradition of the Liberals who during the last century have put forward the same argument. Those who support the Conservative party have argued consistently, and successfully in 1964, for devolution of power to the boroughs.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): It was the Secretary of State's party that took away from democratically elected local government their powers over health, water and transport and it was my party that opposed him.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) made a powerful speech in which he indicated how the various powers have been withdrawn from the GLC and given to other appointed bodies, which are accountable ultimately to this House. Very few people now argue that health or the water authority functions should go back to the GLC. The Thames water authority covers a far greater area than that of the GLC. And so it should. There is a conflict between the localists who favour local government and those who favour big authorities with a strategic role. The Committee know that this Government's view is strongly localist and that it was the starting point of "Streamlining the Cities". The Bill gives effect to those principles. Virtually all of the service functions of the GLC which I spelled out on Second Reading — 95 per cent. of them — will go to the boroughs.

There will be only one joint authority for a Londonwide service to look after fire and civil defence. That is to be a joint responsibility with the boroughs.

An interesting aspect of the debate — I say this without implying critisism — is that we have heard a variety of different views upon what this replacement, directly elected body should do. My hon. Friend for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) gave a very long list of functions which, with the exception of section 137, seemed to me to make it indistinguishable from the present GLC. My hon. Friend may have an opportunity to spell that out.

The amendment moved by my hon. Friend for Staffordshire, South approaches this problem from the other end. He does not ask what that body should do. I listened to every word that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshitre, South said and he did not address himself to what the proposed body would do. The amendment does not spell it out. It says that there should be a body and that a Select Committee should decide what it does. That is standing the argument on its head.

The only way to decide whether there should be a replacement body is to consider in detail what it would do.

Mr. Cormack: I intervene at the request of one or two of my hon. Friends to point out that the amendment refers the matter to the House of Commons and, thereby, provides an opportunity for proper consultation, which we have not had up to now.

Mr. Jenkin: I responded to that argument some hours ago on the first amendment. I told the Committee how much consultation there had been and spelt out the considerable extent to which the Government had responded.

If we are to have a replacement body, the first question to ask is what it will do. Could it have service functions? My hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West effectively made it clear that there are almost no service functions of the GLC that cannot perfectly well be devolved to the boroughs. The Government have identified the fire brigade and civil defence, but no one in his right senses would argue that we needed a separate body for the whole of London to deal with those services.

Mr. Charles Morrison: Will my right hon. Friend address himself to the question that I asked my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) about the Marshall report?

Mr. Jenkin: I have discussed the matter with Lord Marshall. He made a number of recommendations about what the GLC might do. He has since recognised that few people accepted his proposals and thay they are now a dead letter. The fact that he reached a different conclusion in the 1970s is a fact of history which should not govern what we do now.

The real question is whether there is a strategic role for the proposed body. The word "strategic" never appeared in the Herbert report. That committee was concerned only with service functions. There is no strategic role for the Greater London area. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) asked a reasonable question. If there is a strategic planning role, it will inevitably cover a substantially wider area than Greater London.

Let us examine the major decisions that have had to be taken about London. We are now considering the future of London's airports; that is not a matter for the GLC. We have had to consider the east London river crossing; that has had to be a matter for the Department of Transport. The GLC had all the planning powers necessary to redevelop docklands, but nothing happened for 20 years until those powers were taken out of its hands.

Mr. Gorst: My right hon. Friend has not yet replied to the important question whether there are any Londonwide functions, considerations or discussions on which the London boroughs will have to reach agreement or whether there will be an enormous debate on that level that will go unresolved.

Mr. Jenkin: We have always recognised that the London boroughs will need to reach agreement on certain issues — waste disposal is clearly one — and the Bill contains a reserve power if that is necessary.

There is also the power relating to charities — [HON. MEMBERS: "Get on with it."] I sense that the Committee is anxious to reach a conclusion on this amendment. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

Finally, there are deep contradictions between the boroughs as main organs of local government and the idea of a separate elected authority on top. As has been shown in London, they really cannot coexist. Local government should be local and powers should be devolved to the boroughs. That is what the Bill does. I shall certainly keep an open mind, as a number of my hon. Friends have requested, but I have heard no arguments today to convince me that it is right to have a separately elected upper-tier authority for London. I therefore ask the Committe to reject my hon. Friend's amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I shall take but one minute. The Secretary of State has been thrown many lifelines in the interests of democracy for London, but he has taken none of them. The 6,750,000 people of the largest capital in western Europe want to be able to participate in the way in which their city is run in the future. There are two options before the House, either of which is preferable to the Government's proposals. I urge all hon. Members to support at least one and preferably both proposals to amend the clause and keep elected government for London.

Question accordingly negatived.

Dr. Cunningham: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I ask the Secretary of State to recognise that he and his Cabinet colleagues have just suffered a moral and humiliating defeat.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: It is worthy of note that the Labour party did not vote for the amendment to keep the Greater London council. It has changed course. The public will be interested to note that.

Pound Note

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

12.50 am

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): This debate, coming as it does before the end of 1984, ensures that the pound note will not be reduced to small change without at least a voice being raised in the House of Commons on behalf of the millions of people who, like me, believe that the pound note has become part of our heritage and must be saved. Having studied the speeches of Lord Glenarthur in another place this week, and recalling the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn Budget statement, may I say that the drastic decision to abolish our pound note is a financial decision that does not measure up to strict examination.

We are advised that an annual saving of £3 million will result. That is nonsense. It is within my knowledge that the sheer weight of the £500 bags of £1 coins will dramatically increase the transportation costs of foreign exchange, and inter-bank branch circulation will be more expensive. Banks supplying currency to industry and commerce to meet wage bills will have to pay more for security. It may take security officers two or three journeys from bank to vehicle against one at present, thus adding to their time and risk at each end of the contract. Storage of £1 coins is also a headache for the banks.

We hear today that job losses may occur in the paper producers and printers of banknotes. I ask the Government to reflect on the queues that will result at cash desks when the staff and customers have to deal with 10 or more coins in change for a £5 note. It is widely believed that to abolish the £1 note will cost £14 million a year rather than save £3 million. Against that background, the House is entitled to demand a financial inquiry before the pound note is withdrawn from circulation.

It cannot be argued that people will get used to the new pound coin in time. We have had it for months and it is unwelcome. The small pound coin hides itself away in the middle of our coin range. It is almost identical in diameter to the 5p and 20p coins, and is slightly larger—but not by very much—than the 1p coin. Our coinage is in a mess, derived from a mixture of inflation and decimalisation. The 50p and 10p coins are both larger than the £1 coin. Switzerland has a complete coin range, with the major coin—the five franc coin—as the largest, then down to two francs, one franc and half a franc. Even in France, the 10 franc coin is large and substantial. The United States coinage is sound. Charities, which rely on impulse donations of £1, £2 or £3 slipped into an envelope, claim that they will suffer. Many people cannot afford to give £5. This also applies to pensioners who like to slip £1 or £2 into birthday cards or letters to their grandchildren. London taxi drivers find the £1 coin confusing and they handle money all day long. For the elderly, we are creating a financial horror.

Bank headquarters are asking their branches to push the new £1 coins, but many people refuse to accept them. We are flying in the face of public opinion, and have produced a psychological devaluation of our respective currencies. Lloyd George introduced the £1 note when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer back in 1914. It was a state financial provision because of the war in Europe. The House may be surprised to learn that that happened during an Adjournment debate. Therefore, it is fitting that today I use the same parliamentary procedure in my endeavours to save the £1 note.

In the name of the people of this nation, I beg the Government to pause and reflect on public opinion, which is calling out to save the £1 note. Let the Government hold a financial inquiry, and if any doubts remain, let us have a referendum so that the House may have the benefit of the advice of the millions of our citizens who hold such affection for the £1 note.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): After the excitement that we have had today, I wish to deal seriously with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) about a matter so important to all of us as our national currency. I begin by congratulating him on having obtained this debate at such an appropriate time, so that we can deal with the issues that he has put before the House.

My hon. Friend has made a number of important and telling points about the change from the pound in note form to the pound in coin form, and in particular he commented on public opinion. No Minister offers a referendum from the Dispatch Box because, as my hon. Friend knows, in our political system a referendum has been used only for the most major constitutional questions. In recent times, it was used on the question of membership of the European Community and it was proposed in the case of the Scottish and Welsh Assemblies, all of which were constitutional matters. We do not deal with our affairs by referendum. However, it is not on those grounds that I must resist the beguiling plea to consult the public in that way. I do so because of the nature of the problem of changing currencies.

I entirely accept my hon. Friend's comments that there is an untidiness about the structure of our coinage. Unfortunately, after the period of rapid inflation that we suffered in the 1970s, the existing structure of the coinage was no longer convenient because some of the coins were the wrong size in relation to their purchasing power. My hon. Friend pointed to Switzerland, which has a more self-evident graduated currency. That is enviable, but it is no accident that it has happened in a country such as Switzerland, which has not suffered the ravages of inflation and has been able to maintain such a pattern. I have no immediate further proposals about alterations in the currency, but I assure my hon. Friend that I shall take serious note of what he says about the structure of the currency. It may be that, in the years ahead, we shall consider that further changes are needed.

We have responded to a number of the difficulties caused by the size of the coins already. The introduction of the 20p coin was a good example of this. When the 10p coin was doing service on a much larger scale, unless a 50p coin was offered in change for a pound for a very small purchase, one was apt to get nine 10p coins that formed an extremely inconvenient cylinder in one's pocket. Therefore we introduced a 20p coin to reduce some of the weight. But the 20p coin was not popular when we introduced it, and had we at the time had a referendum or a public opinion poll, or whatever might do service for that, it is very likely that the verdict would have gone against the coin. It certainly would have gone against the 50p coin 15 years ago, when that was introduced. But after a short while the 50p coin was found to be a very useful part of the currency.

If we go back a bit further to the introduction of the Treasury note in 1914, to which my hon. Friend alluded, we know that there would have been an absolute outcry if it had not been the beginning of the war. The note was introduced then because of the emergencies involved in the war breaking out. But people at that time felt that to have the pound in the form of a piece of paper was a great insult to the currency.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will remember that a few years ago the size of the pound note shrunk. There were all sorts of disparaging references to pieces of paper like soap coupons, and so on. But concern is now expressed about that same shrunken pound. Although cost is a significant factor in the decision, it is not the reason that triggered it. With the persistent inflation of the 1970s, the purchasing power of our units of currency fell to a point at which their usage changed. By 1976, the pound's purchasing power was less than that of the 10 shilling note when it was withdrawn from circulation. Of course, it is considerably less than that again today. Indeed, the purchasing power of the pound today is about equivalent to that of the half-crown when I was at school. In those days people were not saying that they must have a half-crown note. We managed pretty well without such a note. Of course, in those days the 10 shilling note was worth much more than the pound note is today.

Because of the change in the purchasing power of the pound note, its usage has also altered, particularly in recent years. No hon. Member could say that pound notes are not now in a much dirtier state, and are more often torn and damaged than they were a few years ago. That is because people no longer keep pound notes carefully in a separate segment of a wallet or in a hip pocket as they used to, separate from their coins. They tend to keep them in their pockets or purses, alongside coins, and so the notes suffer. If one looks at the issue in that way, paper is not a very satisfactory material for something that is being used as a coin.

Various comments have been made about the possibility of doing more to maintain the quality of notes in circulation. We have obviously looked at many of the options. A year ago my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) suggested plastic notes. But of course forgery is an absolute bar to that solution. We have looked at other means of dealing with the problem, because the servicing of the note issue has become increasingly expensive as notes have been used in that way. But we have not found a satisfactory solution. It is because of the way in which pound notes are now used that we were led to this decision. They now circulate much more between individuals and retailers without going back through the banking system where they could be replaced by new notes.

It is not just a question of the cost of replacing the notes through printing new ones, but also of the notes staying longer in circulation than before, without coming back centrally for renewal. That situation has been deteriorating over the past few years. It was in response to that change that the Government decided that they should introduce the pound coin. It is not some extraordinary decision by the Government alone. It has happened in other countries. In France a 10 franc piece was introduced in 1974, and no notes of that value are now issued. The Germans have a five deutschmark piece, worth about £1·40, which was introduced in 1974 and there are now no notes of that value in Germany. The Japanese introduced a 500 yen coin, worth about £1·70 in 1982, and the note has long ceased. The Swiss five francs is worth about the same, and that has been around for many years. It is not an isolated decision. Other countries are also making the same decision. For example, Australia and Norway are introducing new, higher value coins in 1984.

My hon. Friend made a fair comment about the difficulties faced by people using the pound coin. It is sometimes criticised as being too heavy. It is not as heavy as the 10p piece, which is worth only a fraction of its purchasing power. Its thickness and edge, apart from its different colouration, are deliberately designed to make it easily distinguishable by touch from other coins. As they come into use more generally, they will be easy to distinguish—especially by the blind, whose interests we consulted before taking a decision. They thought it a great improvement on the note.

My hon. Friend mentioned that people liked to put a pound note in an envelope at Christmas or send it to a charity. I assure him that it will not disappear overnight. It will be around this Christmas and next Christmas. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that it would continue for at least a year. I cannot say more than that as we shall have to see how things progress. It will be around at this time next year, so it is not a sudden change. In fact, by this time next year it will be two and a half years since the pound coin was circulated, which is a long transitional period.

Mr. Dickens: Is my hon. Friend saying that we shall print more pound notes during 1985?

Mr. Stewart: No, that is not what I said. The issue of new pound notes will cease at the end of 1984. However, there are more than 500 million notes in circulation, and they will, no doubt, continue to be in circulation for some considerable time. There will not be a sudden change on 1 January from all notes to all coins. The pound note will remain in circulation for at least a further year.

The pound coin is already increasing rapidly in circulation and it is only when it comes into common usage that it will be more readily distinguished by the public and its advantages will be fully realised. Quite apart from the convenience to the blind, there are specific applications for a coin of that value that have not been fully taken into account for the very good reason that not sufficient of them have been in circulation to encourage those who have meters and vending machines to convert them. For the sake of those who have gas and electricity meters, it will be convenient to have a £1 coin, which is not too large, and which will save the collection of a large number of smaller value coins.

Many businesses held back converting machines until the pound coin was in wider use. The Royal Mint has issued more than 200 million pound coins, and more coins are being produced. I believe that, in a few years' time when people have become used to the pound coin, they will like it as they have learnt to like many other coins which were initially unpopular. At the time the 50p and 20p coins were issued, there was substantial resistance to them, but I do not receive any letters of complaint about them now. It is always difficult to make a transition of this kind, because the public are naturally conservative about currency. They are always reluctant to have any currency changes. If we had had to conduct a referendum or public opinion poll on currency changes, we would still be using groats and nobles, or the Scots among us would be using placks, bawbees and unicorns. There has always been an inherent conservatism about the currency.

The Government have a duty to ensure that the currency is maintained not only in good condition but in accordance with the current needs of individuals, shopkeepers, the financial system, and so on. I assure my hon. Friend that all those factors have been considered. The decision might well have been taken several years ago, but we felt that it was right to wait until there was a clear-cut case. We have allowed an unusually long transitional period for circulation of the coin and note together. The decision was right. The factors that led us to make the decision were justified and they have not changed.

I understand the point that was so well put by my hon. Friend. The public are instinctively suspicious and, therefore, hesitant about using new coins until they have been in circulation long enough and in sufficient quantities to be widely familiar. I accept that, until recently, that has not been the case with the pound coin. With increased usage, the pound coin will be a much more useful and respectable part of the currency than initial reactions suggested. I take on board my hon. Friend's point about the relative size and weight of coins. Those factors must be considered. As I said, already we have introduced a much lighter 20p coin to reduce the great weight of 10p coins. We shall continue to examine all the options. It is helpful for the House to have an opportunity to discuss the questions raised by this change.

I genuinely thank my hon. Friend for giving us an opportunity to consider these matters. I frequently discuss the future of the coinage with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he is the Master of the Mint and has overall responsibility for the nation's coinage and currency. My responsibilities are more to do with day-to-day matters of the Royal Mint. We take account of the public impact of changes we make and carefully research coin specifications before introducing a coin into the currency. At that time it was necessary to make the change.

Some of the reactions have been exaggerated. I am not accusing my hon. Friend of that. It is frequently said that people will not take the pound coin and that most people regard it as highly unsatisfactory. There have been one or two tests. One major store found that less than 3 per cent. of its customers actively disliked the coin. The Post Office test showed that that applied to an even smaller proportion of people. It is an instinctive reaction to a new coin and not one that attaches to the pound coin as distinct from other new coins.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that the factors that he mentioned have been and always are taken into account when any decisions are made affecting our currency. There are sound reasons for our decision in this case.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes past One o'clock.

Job Creation

1. Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what new fiscal and monetary measures he plans to achieve a higher level of employment.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): Employment is already rising. Our policies offer the best chance of sustained growth of output and employment.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with the statement in the 1944 White Paper on employment that a country will not suffer from mass unemployment as long as total demand for its goods and services is maintained at a high level?

Mr. Rees: I prefer to direct my hon. Friend to the measures introduced by this Government to improve the supply side of the economy, which will make a more lasting impact on this problem.

Mr. Loyden: What evidence is there that the Government's economic policies are working, when unemployment is rising, and all the signs are that it will continue to rise in the coming years?

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman is taking counsel of his fears. I can cheer him up by reminding him that the number of people in work has increased by 250,000 over the year to June 1984.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Would it not be constructive to encourage a reduction in interest rates in London, which would have the effect of reducing the exchange rate, thereby making our goods more competitive overseas and imports more expensive, and putting us on purchasing power parity with the Common Market?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend, with his knowledge of these matters, will know not only that interest rates have come down, but that the policies of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer are designed to reduce interest rates. Therefore, I am sure that my hon. Friend will support the Government's policies to contain public expenditure.

Mr. Terry Davis: Do Treasury Ministers repudiate the Treasury's economic model, which shows that increasing public expenditure by £1·5 billion would generate more jobs than using the same amount of money to reduce income tax? Will the Chief Secretary come clean and tell the House that the Government care more about cutting income tax than about cutting unemployment?

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman is obviously referring to some assumptions fed into the Treasury model by various commentators with whom he is in sympathy. Therefore, I do not necessarily accept that conclusion. If the hon. Gentleman will reflect a little, he will realise that cutting taxes by raising thresholds could make a considerable impact on the labour market. Therefore, I hope that we shall have his support for any measures that we wish to carry out in that direction.

2. Mr. John Browne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of current economic trends upon the creation of new jobs.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The number of people in work has risen by about a quarter of a million in the year to June 1984. Growth in employment is set to continue in 1985.

Mr. Browne: I thank my right hon. Friend for that most heartening of replies. Does he feel that, to an important extent, this rise in employment is due to the growth of new and smaller businesses, which in itself is a reflection of the Government's introduction of policies for enterprise?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. Self-employment, for example, has increased by some 400,000 between the middle of 1979 and the middle of last year, and the recent CBI survey suggests that prospects are best in the small firms and services sectors. The importance of small firms was marked by the reduction in the small firms rate of corporation tax, which was reduced substantially in this year's Budget. I hope that there will be further progress in the small firms sector next year.

Mr. Wainwright: Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that many of those new jobs are part-time only and involve relatively low skills? What will he do to enhance public demand for the skilled labour that is now on the scrap-heap because of his policies? Will he give those people a chance to get back into the labour market, by Government investment in public works?

Mr. Lawson: I do not think that many of the self-employed are part-time, as they are working full-time and very hard indeed. Of course there is a need to create more jobs, and that is why I am determined to find room within the scope of our public expenditure policy to reduce taxation in such a way that it will create greatly increased job opportunities in the years ahead.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that abolition of the wages councils would do a tremendous amount to increase employment opportunities? Is he aware that the electricians' union has already slashed the rate of pay for apprentices from 37 per cent. of adult wages to 23 per cent., and that, as a result, the number of apprentices has doubled?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend's example is correct and important. Clearly, the Government will have to consider the question of wages councils very seriously.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that he has failed to convince even business economists that his policies are working? They do not believe his forecasts for inflation—they think that it will be higher — or for the rate of growth — which they believe will be lower—and they say that the outlook is depressing, as unemployment will continue to rise.

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Lady always finds everything very depressing — and I am not surprised, given the company she keeps. But the CBI forecasts are very much in line with those of the Treasury.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

3. Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the most recent estimate for the public sector borrowing requirement for 1984-85.

12. Mr. Leigh asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Peter Rees: The PSBR for 1984-85 is projected at around £8½ billion.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the effect of the coal strike this year has been to increase the public sector borrowing requirement and, therefore, that the consequence of Arthur Scargill has been to reduce the scope for job-creating tax and national insurance cuts in next year's Budget?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The coal strike has made a very considerable difference, in that it may add, over the financial year as a whole, about £1½ billion to total borrowing.

Mr. Leigh: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with the wise words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) in the debate on the autumn statement last week, to the effect that losing control of the PSBR in a vain attempt to create jobs would be to fail to address the fundamental cause of our problem, which is not shortage of demand, but failure to meet it? That would be a cruel deception on the unemployed, as President Mitterrand found to his cost.

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The only way to create sustained long-lasting jobs is to contain inflation, which is a principal strand in the Government's policies.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: How much will have to be added to the PSBR as a result of the abolition of the GLC?

Mr. Rees: Nothing.

Mr. Skinner: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that since the coal strike began orders for more than £1,000 million have had to be laid before Parliament to finance the deficit of the NCB and that there is the prospect that an order for more than £600 million will be laid before Parliament? Does he accept the Chancellor's view that the strike was a worthwhile investment, given that some of his own Back Benchers now refuse to support those orders? Why will the Government not admit that they have caused the economy to run down as a result of the miners' strike and have kept the strike going because they would not negotiate and wanted MacGregor to smash the NUM?

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman has entirely misquoted my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. My right hon. Friend never said that the miners' strike was a good investment — [Interruption.] He said that the restructuring of the coal industry was a worthwhile investment, and any hon. Member who cares about the long-term future of this country's coal industry should adopt that point of view.

Mr. Robert Atkins: What detrimental effects would there be for the PSBR if finance were made available to ensure that certain major contracts to sell aircraft abroad did not make a loss? Does my right hon. and learned Friend recognise that the creation and containment of jobs that would result from making such finance available would more than offset any potential losses to the PSBR?

Mr. Rees: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the exposure of the Export Credits Guarantee Department. He will know that, in the current state of the world market, that exposure is considerable. He will also know that the ECGD covers a range of Airbus orders. It may even have a favourable impact in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Dalyell: What is the Treasury's latest price tag for the Falklands?

Mr. Rees: It will not add to the public sector borrowing requirement this year, which was the original question put to me.

Books and Periodicals (VAT)

4. Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about the imposition of value added tax on books and periodicals; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): Over 500 representations from individuals and organisations have been received by Treasury Ministers during the last two months opposing VAT on books, newspapers and periodicals. Although the Government favour a shift in the burden of taxation from taxes on earnings to taxes on spending, we have no set views at present on how this might best be done. However, the representations on this subject are being carefully considered.

Mr. Winnick: Are the Government aware that extensive damage will be done to educatiom, libraries and the book trade generally if VAT is imposed, and that that damage will extend to newspapers and periodicals? Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer bear in mind that there is no more support for the imposition of VAT on those items than there would be if it were to be imposed on food?

Mr. Hayhoe: A great deal of exaggerated speculation and comment is taking place. As I have said, representations have been received, and they are being considered carefully.

Mr. Cormack: Why does my hon. Friend not end damaging speculation and prevent a major revolt—one that would make last night's Tory revolt look like a storm in a teacup—by saying that such a monstrous proposal will not be considered.

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend, who is a helpful supporter of the Government, must know that it is a well-established and accepted principle that we should not anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: How many of the representations received are in favour of the proposals? Can the Minister tell us whether such a tax was ever contemplated in time of war, let alone in peace? Does he understand that there is almost unanimous hostility to such a proposal from both sides of the House and throughout the country?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have seen the early-day motions on this subject which have been signed by hon. Members from both sides of the House. As I said, 500 representations have been received, and all are opposed to the proposal.

Mr. Adley: Will my hon. Friend state simply what factors, other than financial, tend to influence a Chancellor of the Exchequer — indeed, this Chancellor of the Exchequer—in reaching difficult decisions, such as that referred to on the Order Paper?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am sure that my right hon. Friend will take account of financial, social, economic and political considerations in forming his judgment.

Mr. Hattersley: The Minister said that he cannot anticipate the Budget. However, the Prime Minister has already done so by promising that there would be no VAT on new buildings or food. Why cannot the Budget be anticipated in this respect? Otherwise, it confirms our suspicion that it is the Treasury's intention to impose VAT on books and periodicals.

Mr. Hayhoe: The comments by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister were made in June and July, and they have been reiterated many times — [Hon. Members: "Yesterday."] The ignorance of Opposition Members is extraordinary. My right hon. Friend yesterday reiterated, in precisely the same words, what she wrote in a letter to the House Builders Federation on 5 July, and which Treasury Ministers have confirmed on many occasions.

Value Added Tax

5. Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy that all items at present zero rated for value added tax will remain zero rated.

Mr. Hayhoe: No, Sir, I cannot give such a wide-ranging undertaking.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that there is great concern about the fact that switching to indirect taxation penalises the low-paid and those on fixed incomes and that we should take more income from the higher paid? Does he also accept that any introduction of VAT on newspapers, food, gas, electricity or children's clothing and footwear will be totally unacceptable? The Minister should give categorical assurances that VAT will not be imposed on any of those items.

Mr. Hayhoe: Any reasonable commentator looking back on my right hon. Friend's Budget earlier this year, with its substantial increase in income tax thresholds and modest extension of the VAT base, will have seen that the Budget was not regressive, but was in fact helpful to low-income families.

Mr. Hayes: In the light of Her Majesty's Inspectorate's estimate that 33 per cent. of educational books are bought by parents, does my hon. Friend not feel that the imposition of VAT on books would be a catastrophe for education?

Mr. Hayhoe: My right hon. Friend will certainly take those facts into account in forming his Budget judgment.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Is it not possible for the EEC —to our membership of which I am no friend—to argue logically that, since own resources are raised on the basis of a percentage of VAT in the respective member states, it is a demand of equity that the base should be the same in all the member countries?

Mr. Hayhoe: The theoretical base upon which the calculation is made is the same for all countries, and any extension of the VAT base does not change the amount that we pay under our EEC obligations.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that many, if not most, European countries manage to survive and prosper with a much wider range of items subject to VAT than Britain? Does my hon. Friend further agree that that is another item that should be considered when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor makes his Budget dispositions?

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend's comments are perfectly true. Most member states of the Community have a wider VAT base than this country.

Job Creation

6. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many jobs he estimates would be created by an across-the-board 10 per cent. reduction in wages; and if he will indicate those sections of the economy which would respond most to such a policy.

Mr. Lawson: Each 1 per cent. reduction in the rate of increase of real pay would be likely, in time, to add between 150,000 and 200,000 new jobs.

Mr. Atkinson: Does the Chancellor recollect that on 30 November he proposed the idea that a 1 per cent. reduction in wages would produce 200,000 jobs? Since then, most industrial analysts have said that it is deceitful gibberish to present such ideas when there is not one scrap of evidence to associate reduced wages with job creation? Will the right hon. Gentleman now stop this deceitful performance and tell the nation the truth? The fact is that many of the jobs created since the end of the war have come from firms which pay far above the national average.

Mr. Lawson: Every reputable economist is aware of the straightforward proposition that, just as people can price themselves out of work, so they can price themselves into work. The figures which I have cited are based on an examination of all the available evidence, which I shall publish in due course.

Mr. Maples: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, to the extent that reductions in real wages encourage employers to employ more people, a similar effect could be created by reducing the employers' national insurance contributions, and that that would be a good deal easier to achieve?

Mr. Lawson: I am not too sure about my hon. Friend's last point about it being easier to achieve that effect. I should have thought that it was also a straightforward matter for employers, particularly those in the private sector, to be concerned about the level of pay settlements for which they are responsible.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Chancellor accept that there is no short-term solution in pay cuts to beat the market leaders of the world in Japan, Germany, and similar economies, where high pay, high productivity and competitiveness are the rules of the day?

Mr. Lawson: As the hon. Gentleman must know, wage costs per unit of output have been going down in Germany and Japan. If we do not achieve the same type of performance, we shall find things increasingly difficult. One of the elements in the equation is an improvement in productivity. That is something that we have been achieving to a remarkable extent. The other side of the equation—moderation in wage settlements—has so far eluded us.

Mr. John Townend: My right hon. Friend tells the House that it is up to private employers to have wage levels that encourage employment. Is it not therefore important that, without any further delay, the Government should announce that they will abolish wages councils.

Mr. Lawson: I understand my hon. Friend's point. As I said earlier, that is a factor that the Government must take seriously.

Mr. Hattersley: Is the Chancellor advocating a reduction in real wages as a serious way of reducing unemployment, or is it simply a debating point? Will he confirm that a return to the unemployment level which the Conservative Government inherited from their predecessors—on his formula—would require a real wage reduction of 13 per cent.? That is very unlikely.

Mr. Lawson: I do not accept the right hon. Gentleman's figures on this or anything else. I am not calling for a cut in real wages. I am calling for real wages to go up less rapidly than they have hitherto. That is what I have made clear time and again.

Economic Situation

8. Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the current state of the economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: In spite of the coal strike, GDP rose by 3 per cent. in the year to the second quarter of 1984, inflation was about 5 per cent. and employment was up some quarter of a million.

Mr. Nellist: If the Minister is so confident about the state of the economy, why, within the next few hours, are the Government proposing to introduce regulations in the House to cut housing benefit for up to 16,000 single, striking miners, and tens of thousands of other people who live with relatives? The impact of that, in economic terms, may be a few million pounds, but it will be disastrous for individuals. Does not that type of cut pale into insignificance when compared with the £4·5 billion that the Government have spent trying to destroy the National Union of Mineworkers?

Mr. Rees: I am not aware that the Government have spent any money trying to destroy the National Union of Mineworkers. On housing benefit, the rest of the House, if not the hon. Gentleman, will be aware that claims have been made which were not envisaged when housing benefit was introduced.

Mr. Forman: Would it be possible to make a modest but significant improvement in the state of the economy by implementing, at an early date, the recommendations of the recent Management and Personnel Office report on Government purchasing, which showed that savings of between £400 million and £1·5 billion could be made if they were followed through?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend is right. We are considering urgently how those measures could properly and practicably be introduced. Significant economies could be made if those proposals were adopted.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Chief Secretary accept that to cut wages is no way to bring about an economic revival? Does he appreciate how nauseating it is to see well-paid business men on the Conservative Benches advocating the abolition of wages councils? Why does the Chancellor not accept that the wages councils offer minimum protection for the lowest paid in our country?

Mr. Rees: I shall not comment on the hon. Gentleman's nausea. He has his own tastes and approach to these problems. I suspect that those of my hon. Friends who have been advocating that course feel that it would enable people who are at present excluded to be priced back into employment.

Occupational Pension Funds

9. Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to change the tax treatment of contributions to occupational pension funds.

Mr. Lawson: I am well aware of the speculation on this subject, which I can assure my hon. Friend did not emanate from Treasury Ministers. As my hon. Friend also knows, it has not normally been the practice of any Chancellor to comment on pre-Budget speculation.

Mr. Waller: Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who wish to provide for their own retirement should not in any way be deterred from doing so? Does he accept that it is important for those at work to be able to plan with reasonable certainty?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend will understand that I can neither confirm nor deny rumours about the contents of my Budget. I am concerned, however, about reports that some people may be contemplating premature retirement on the basis of rumours about the tax treatment of pension lump sums. I can assure the House that there is no reason for anyone to retire early on account of such rumours. This Government would not propose and the House would not accept retrospective legislation of that kind.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer accept that his answer will give some encouragement to those who might be making their decisions in such a way as to cover themselves against a legislative change that is contrary to what he intends? Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that the task of the tax reformer is a very difficult one? If he gets it wrong he is in difficulty, and even if he gets it right the benefit will accrue only to his successor—and it is very unlikely that he will get this one right?

Mr. Lawson: There is a kernel of truth in what the right hon. Gentleman says. The task of the tax reformer is indeed a very difficult one.

Sir William Clark: Will my right hon. Friend accept that his statement will be welcome, at least on the Government Benches? Does he agree that if there is any change in the tax arrangements for pension funds, and if the pension that has been promised is to be maintained, contributions to the fund must inevitably increase? Does my right hon. Friend agree that if there were an increase in contributions that would add to the unit cost of labour, which is contrary to Conservative policy?

Mr. Lawson: I have noted carefully what my hon. Friend has said. He will understand, as an experienced Member of the House of Commons — and being particularly experienced in financial and budgetary matters — that it is impossible for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to confirm or deny or comment in any way on rumours as to what may or may not be in a forthcoming Budget.

Mr. Kirkwood: From the Liberal Benches I concur with the welcome that has been given to the right hon. Gentleman's statement. He has probably gone as far as he can go. If I am asked by my local police, for example, whether they should retire early to avoid tax, am I secure in saying no?

Mr. Lawson: Yes.

Mr. Tapsell: Does my right hon. Friend recall that when some of us first entered public life it was one of the prime aims of the Conservative party to ensure that as many people as possible in the years ahead would come to enjoy two pensions — the state pension and an occupational pension? Enormous improvements have been made in that respect in the past 25 years. Will my right hon. Friend be careful to take no steps that will reverse that trend?

Mr. Lawson: On this occasion I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. He knows that I do not agree with him on every occasion. I, too, want to see a further expansion of private occupational pensions. That is the policy of the Government as a whole, and it is one of the reasons why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has put forward his proposals on personal portable pensions.

Mr. Robert Hughes: The Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to have recognised that many people on modest occupational pensions are seriously alarmed at reports of his proposals. When he says that there will be no retrospective legislation, is he saying that those who are currently in occupational pension schemes will not have their position changed, or is he simply saying that any such proposals would not be retrospective to the coming Budget?

Mr. Lawson: If the hon. Gentleman studies the Official Report tomorrow, he will see precisely what I said.

Mr. McCrindle: May I press my right hon. Friend to go a little further than his welcome statement of a few minutes ago? As the tax-free lump sum under pension schemes is frequently seen as a nest-egg by millions of people, and as plans are made well in advance with regard to the use of the nest-egg, would it not relieve a great deal of anxiety if, in addition to what he has told us this afternoon, my right hon. Friend were able to say that any tax change would apply only to membership of pension schemes which began after the presentation of his Budget?

Mr. Lawson: I have noted carefully what my hon. Friend said. I am grateful to him for the words of welcome with which he began his question.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer accept that many people on modest incomes have been making provision for retirement along these lines and would welcome a categorical statement now, notwithstanding the convention of not saying things in advance of the Budget? In this instance, surely there is every case for saying categorically that such a scheme will not go forward.

Mr. Lawson: I am quite sure that the hon. Gentleman is right. I am sure that many people would welcome categorical statements about several matters in advance of the Budget, but, for the reasons that are well known and well hallowed, I shall not make any such statements. However, there was a particular problem in this case, in that there was a possibility that people might take premature retirement on the basis of the premise of retrospective legislation taking effect, which was wholly false. I should not like to see that happen. That is why I made my statement, which will be important to many people in both the private sector and public services.

Mr. Higgins: I welcome my right hon. Friend's condemnation of retrospective legislation, but does he agree that it would also be retrospective if changes were made in future taxation of lump sum pensions in relation to contributions that had been made in the past?

Mr. Lawson: I am not quite sure of the precise point that my right hon. Friend is making—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—but I think that the answer is yes.

Mr. Hattersley: In his carefully prepared and read supplementary answer, the Chancellor promised no retrospection in this particular. He must know — or at least he should know — that what has caused the uncertainty, particularly in the public service, and the early retirement, is not the fear of retrospection, but the fear that the new regulations will be applied for a period after the Budget. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to end that uncertainty now, or is he prepared to see early retirements and the damage caused thereby going on?

Mr. Lawson: As usual, the right hon. Gentleman does not understand the point. The point is that several people were concerned that if they retired after the Budget they would be disadvantaged, as compared with retiring before the Budget. Therefore, they sought to retire prematurely. The assurance that I have given them means that they no longer have to make that disposition of their affairs.

Public Expenditure

10. Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate what proportion of total public expenditure in 1984-85 will be represented by capital investment programmes.

Mr. Peter Rees: Total capital spending by the public sector in 1984-85 is expected to be about one fifth of the public expenditure planning total.

Mr. Chapman: Is that proportion planned to decline in the next financial year and, if so, will it be in the construction and civil engineering sector of the planned capital investment programme? If so, by how much?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend must await the table that we shall produce in the public expenditure White Paper, which mirrors table 1.13 in the previous public expenditure White Paper. Let me assure my hon. Friend and the House that the latest Department of Trade and Industry investment survey suggests a 10 per cent. increase and, indeed, a new high in construction and service industry investment in 1984 and a 9 per cent. increase in 1985.

Oil Revenues

11. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much more he expects to receive in oil revenues in the current year as a result of changes in the sterling-dollar exchange rate in 1984.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): The autumn statement forecast of total tax take from the North sea in 1984-85 is £12 billion, £1.8 billion higher than expected earlier this year. Most of that increase is attributable to changes in the sterling-dollar exchange rate.

Mr. Brown: Will the Minister confirm that the fall in the pound and the rise in oil revenues is the only reason why the Government can contemplate tax cuts in the next Budget? Now that the Minister has this windfall from oil revenues to spend, will he confirm that public investment of those revenues could create up to 150,000 jobs throughout this country?

Mr. Moore: No, Sir, I shall not confirm the premise on which the hon. Gentleman makes his point. The figures that I gave reflect one facet of many aspects of the autumn statement. One cannot take just that one facet in isolation and extrapolate such conclusions from it, as the hon. Gentleman did.

Mr. Blair: Does the Minister realise that, having confessed that this windfall from North sea oil has occurred, he cannot escape the language of choice and priority? When will the Government choose to make the unemployed their priority?

Mr. Moore: There is no confession, but there should be recognition in all parts of the House of the unbelievable bounty that the nation has received because of the successful investment, essentially by the private sector, in the North sea, and the benefits and jobs accruing from that.

Small Businesses

13. Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will take further steps to reduce the tax burden on small businesses.

Mr. Moore: The Government have already provided substantial help to small businesses through tax reductions and other measures designed to encourage their growth. In particular, the tax reliefs available in the business expansion scheme enabled more than 400 small companies to raise about £80 million of new equity in 1983-84. I hope that further reductions in taxation will also be of benefit to small businesses.

Mr. Fallon: Does my hon. Friend agree that small rather than large businesses will be the major source of new jobs in the future? Will he confirm the rumour that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor intends to offer a continuing programme of tax relief to small businesses?

Mr. Moore: I am delighted at my hon. Friend's welcome for the Government's measures in relation to small businesses, but big businesses must also be successful to increase employment. I confirm that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will seek in the Budget to help employment in small and large businesses alike through the tax system.

Mr. Stephen Ross: As the greatest difficulty faced by small businesses is high interest rates, what plans have the Government to lower interest rates for small businesses? Will they introduce a differential, with lower rates for small businesses to give them a chance of succeeding?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that lower interest rates help. The reduction from more than 16 per cent. when the Government took office to 9½ per cent. today is a clear sign of our success. I know that the hon. Gentleman will not seek to press upon the Government demands for further public expenditure, which would drive interest rates up and deter small businesses.

Children's Shoes (VAT)

14. Mr. Roger King asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received concerning the possible introduction of value added tax on children's shoes.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury Ministers have received some 250 letters.

Mr. King: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. I appreciate that no commitment can be made one way or the other, but will he note that for many families, especially those on low incomes, the imposition of VAT on children's shoes would represent a real cost to their living standards? [Interruption.]

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Wakeham) took his seat.

Mr. Hayhoe: The whole House has shown how very pleased it is to see my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury in his place at Treasury Question Time. I am afraid that I have forgotten what the supplementary question was.

Mr. Speaker: I echo the Minister's statement. I, too, have forgotten the supplementary question.

Departmental Services (Privatisation)

15. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the current estimated savings for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Moore: The Treasury is responsible for co-ordinating the Government's privatisation programme. Special sales of assets receipts this year should be not less than £2 billion, but the overall benefit to the economy in terms of increased efficiency and better services will be far greater than this.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend comment on yesterday's radio statement by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), who said that a Labour Government would seek to renationalise British Telecom?

Mr. Moore: My attention was drawn to that broadcast. The Opposition clearly have an innate desire to stay firmly in opposition and have no interest in Government.

Books and Periodicals (VAT)

17. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his consideration of the possible imposition of value added tax on books, magazines and newspapers.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the price of many of the major newspapers is already beyond many millions of people? Is he also aware that if VAT is introduced, as has been suggested, many local newspapers will be put out of business and many local communities denied the knowledge that they provide?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have met a deputation from the Newspaper Society, which made many of those points in greater detail. The Government are well aware of the representations that are being made, and those representations will be given careful consideration.

Publishers' Association

19. Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has yet met the Publishers' Association or its representatives to discuss his forthcoming Budget; and what was discussed.

Mr. Hayhoe: No, Sir.

Mr. Adley: May I assume that my right hon. Friend, with his usual courtesy, would be willing to meet them if requested?

Mr. Hayhoe: I think that the arrangements have been made and a date has been fixed.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Lewis: What forecast has the right hon. Lady made of a reduction in unemployment, and when is such a reduction likely to take place?

The Prime Minister: I follow the example of successive Ministers and Prime Ministers in not making forecasts about the rate of unemployment.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that an order for the biggest oil rig ever to be built has been obtained on Clydebank? Is it not true that that has happened because the firm concerned has had a 12-year strike-free record? Is my right hon. Friend aware that, as a result, the firm will now be able to take on 500 men?

The Prime Minister: I have noted that the oil rig order has gone to that shipyard. I congratulate the yard on its record and on winning the order. I hope that others will take the hint that strikes destroy jobs and that a good working record wins new orders.

Mr. Hattersley: First, may I welcome the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury back to his place on the Treasury Bench? The right hon. Gentleman represents — indeed, personifies — the triumph of democracy over terrorism. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

Secondly, may I ask the Prime Minister whether she has read the three surveys published today, including one based on the Treasury's own model and one from the London Business School, previously the fount of all economic wisdom? Those surveys prove that increases in public investment are by far the most effective way of reducing unemployment. Will the right hon. Lady now respond to the demands from both sides of the House and accept that whatever additions can be made to public expenditure in the spring will be used not for cutting taxation but for reducing the wholly unacceptable level of unemployment?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not accept some of the findings of those three reports or the right hon. Gentleman's specific description of them. Other findings point to other conclusions. As the right hon. Gentleman will know, we realise by now that one cannot spend one's way out of recession. That has been tried before. It leads to higher inflation and ultimately to higher unemployment. There are some 12 million taxpayers with an income of £8,000 a year or less. They, too, have a right to look to the Government to raise thresholds so that they pay less tax. They will never get equity from Labour; they will get it only from us.

Mr. Hattersley: It should be obvious even to the Prime Minister that money invested directly in the United Kingdom is more likely to create jobs than money devoted to increasing consumption, which, by its nature, is likely to result in higher imports and to create jobs abroad. On the Labour side of the House and, I believe, widely throughout the country, it is understood that the right hon. Lady's obsession with a cut in direct taxes is matched and mirrored by the increased indirect taxation that has more than compensated for the reduction in that particular over the past five years.

Most important of all, as the Prime Minister has chosen the high unemployment option, are we to be relieved from now on of the lowered voice and the bogus compassion? The truth is that the Prime Minister and the Government choose high unemployment. That is the message that should be given to the country.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is not correct. Increasing infrastructure is not a cost-effective way in which to increase the number of jobs. The cost per job through increasing infrastructure can vary from £35,000 to £55,000. It is an expensive method, which tends to lead to a lot of hire of plant but not much hire of men. Reduction of tax can lead to extra jobs, as it leads to extra demand. The right hon. Gentleman's thesis that investment always leads to purchases from home sources while reduction of tax leads to purchases from abroad is not correct. In an age of specialisation, much of the investment in equipment and machinery goes abroad.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: In her worthy enthusiasm for reducing unemployment, will my right hon. Friend concentrate on the unincorporated sector of the self-employed and bring home to many of her Ministers the fact that it is not just reducing tax rates but reducing the burden of non-productive administrative work—dealing with tax returns such as VAT and national insurance — that discourages them from taking on new employees?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There are still many restrictions that inhibit the self-employed from taking on more employees and inhibit small businesses from taking on extra people. Each of them raises difficult issues, but we are examining the regulations. My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Trade and Industry hope to bring proposals before the House.

Dr. Owen: We on the alliance Benches also welcome the Patronage Secretary, although he will understand our not wishing him great success, as we hope that the rebellions will continue at the pace that has been set during the past few months. The Prime Minister is rumoured in the press now to be contemplating increased expenditure on the community programme and a restructuring of employees' insurance contributions. Why should we wait for the Budget? Many hundreds of thousands of people want action, and now. Why not action this day?

The Prime Minister: I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would know that there is a time for public expenditure surveys and a time for the Budget. I confess that there are many occasions when I wish that they happened together so that the choices that have to be made were more clearly put. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister without Portfolio are seeing whether we can better spend the £2 billion that we spend on special employment measures.

Q2. Mr. Budgen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Budgen: In the discussions about the BBC's licence fee, will my right hon. Friend recognise that introductin of advertising would change the nature of the BBC? Will she also examine carefully the recent introduction of early morning television and BBC local radio stations? Will she please ask the BBC why it cannot concentrate on those things that are most important to it?

The Prime Minister: I think that a number of people will agree with my hon. Friend and wonder why the BBC has to take on so many new programmes when their needs can be fulfilled by other programmes. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has to take into account the fact that the BBC licence fee is a sort of compulsory levy on the television viewer, irrespective of whether he watches BBC programmes a great deal. He will wish to balance the needs of the BBC with the interests of the licence fee payer. For that, he will need to take many things into account, but I doubt whether, this time, he will consider the introduction of advertising, although, in the longer term, we might have to consider other methods of raising the requisite revenue for the BBC.

3. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Davies: Is the right hon. Lady aware that her Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the Department of Transport has written a letter to all Conservative Members of Parliament promising them preferential treatment from himself, his Department and his civil servants in dealing with parliamentary inquiries — [Interruption.] — from their constituents? Has that letter been written with the authority or knowledge of the Prime Minister? If so, does it mark a change of policy, in that the Government are prepared to use Government funds to advance the cause of the Conservative party?

The Prime Minister: I do not know of the letter to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and there seems to be a good deal of dissent in the House to the interpretation that he gave of it. Inquiries from all Members of Parliament are dealt with expeditiously and courteously.

4. Mr. Marland asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marland: Is my right hon. Friend aware that some of our Common Market partners are seeking to use bogus methods to prevent our exports penetrating their markets? Will she take this opportunity to reassure our exporters, be they in industry, agriculture or commerce, that she will use her best offices to make sure that our exporters can compete in Europe on equal terms?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is the purpose of the Dooge committee of the Common Market. We are urging the completion of the internal market. The Common Market treaty prohibits barriers to trade, and my hon. Friend will have special reason to know of the success of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in getting rid of the barriers to the importation of whisky by Italy—something on which he is to be congratulated.

5. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lloyd: Knowing that the Prime Minister places a high priority on conforming to the letter of the law, will she join me in condemning the Conservative-controlled Trafford borough council, which is refusing to conform with both the spirit and the letter of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act by not providing adaptations for handicapped people until July next year? Will she have a quiet word with the Secretary of State for Social Services and ask him to use his powers to make that council conform?

The Prime Minister: I seem to remember that in that Act there is a good deal of discretion as to how it is applied. It is not absolutely mandatory. Any question arising from the case to which the hon. Gentleman referred would not be for me but would be a matter for the courts to decide.

Mr. Jessel: Does my right hon. Friend recall that Mr. Justice Glidewell, the inquiry inspector into the fourth terminal at Heathrow, said that if permission were granted for that it would be essential for the Government to reiterate that there would be neither a fifth terminal nor any other major expansion of Heathrow? Do the Government accept that Mr. Justice Glidewell was a distinguished inquiry inspector, whose views should carry at least as much weight as those of Mr. Graham Eyre?

The Prime Minister: I recognise my hon. Friend's very special interest in this matter. He will also recognise that, as the inspector's report is in front of us, I am unable to do other than note his question.

Q6. Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fisher: In respect of the right hon. Lady's reply to me on Tuesday, does she agree that she gave a very good answer to a question that I did not ask? Will she now answer that question and say whether she thinks it sensible and reasonable to include in the costs apportioned to pits when they close costs that will continue for years afterwards, whether or not a pit closes? Will she be good enough to answer that question?

The Prime Minister: I am not an expert on accountancy—[Interruption.]—and neither, I believe, is the hon. Gentleman. It is not for me or for him to distinguish between, or pontificate upon, different specific methods of accountancy. The National Coal Board cost taxpayers £1·3 billion last year. That is not a matter of accountancy, but something that taxpayers have to find. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that there is no need for a subsidy for the coal industry, his remarks are most welcome.

Q7. Mr. Proctor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Proctor: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the most unpopular acts that the Government can commit is the transfer of additional resources to the European Community, with the loss of sovereignty that such an act would entail?

The Prime Minister: The decision to join the EC was made many years ago. I believe that it is and remains in the interests of the United Kingdom to remain part of that Community and to make a great success of it. It gives us tremendous opportunities in trade, and, when the internal market is complete, it will give our financial and insurance services greater opportunities than they have now.

Mr. Ron Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall follow my usual practice. In the interests of the whole House, I shall take points of order now only if they arise directly from questions.

Mr. Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have heard the answer to the question I put to the Prime Minister when, in effect, she denied the existence of the letter to which I referred. Can you advise me how I can pursue this matter? I believe that it is clear that the rules of the House have been breached by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport. Preferential treatment has been promised to Conservative Members in a matter of vital importance to all hon. Members in the discharge of their parliamentary duties. Will you, Mr. Speaker, advise me how that matter is best pursued?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not seen this letter. I cannot be responsible for letters that Ministers write to hon. Members.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister seemed to indicate in her reply to my hon. Friend that the letter might be capable of different interpretations, would it not clear the atmosphere if she and the Government gave authority for it to be printed in Hansard?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May we ask you how we can protect the House when there is a clear indication that the facilities of a Ministry are being used in a specific political way? As the Leader of the House is present, may we ask him to make a statement about whether it is now the intention of the Conservative party to use all the facilities of the Civil Service to promulgate its own highly individual and extremely prejudiced views?

Mr. Robert Atkins: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. When you consider this matter, can you also advise the House how I and other Lancashire colleagues can raise the fact that the Labour-controlled Lancashire county council is spending £134,000 of ratepayers' money——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House can go on for ever on a subject such as this. It is plainly not a matter for me.

Business of the House

3.33 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business of the House for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 17 DECEMBER — Until seven o'clock, private Members' motions.

Afterwards, motions on the Merchant Shipping (Liner Conferences) orders.

Motion on the Appropriation (No. 3) (Northern Ireland) Order.

TUESDAY 18 DECEMBER—Estimates day (1st Allotted Day). Consideration of the following Estimate: Class IV, Vote 5 (Industrial Support (Department of Energy)) The appropriate report will be shown on the Order Paper as relevant. The house will be asked to agree the Civil and Defence Votes on Account and the winter Supplementary Estimates.

Motion on the Industrial Training Levy (Construction Board) Order.

Debate on European Community documents on transport measures.

The relevant numbers will appear in the Official Report.

WEDNESDAY 19 DECEMBER — Motion for the Christmas Adjournment.

Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

THURSDAY 20 DECEMBER — Debate on a motion to take note of the review by Sir George Baker, Cmnd. 9222.

Motion on the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance) (No. 2) Order.

FRIDAY 21 DECEMBER—It will be proposed that the House should rise for the Christmas Adjournment until Wednesday 9 January 1985.

[Debate on Road Transport Measures on 18 December 1984

Estimates Day: 4th Report Select Committee on Energy 1984-85 in respect of British National Oil Corporation H/C 126.]

Mr. Hattersley: The Leader of the House will know that hon. Members on both sides of the House have received much correspondence about the threatened closure of post offices. Can public anxiety be assuaged in some way by an announcement that we shall have a debate on this subject in the early part of the new year?

The Leader of the House will recall that it is 10 months since the publication of the Government's Green Paper on the long-term proposals or alternatives for public expenditure. We were promised a debate on that Green paper. May we have such a debate before and separated from next year's White Paper on public expenditure, and sufficiently early in the year to ensure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer can take part without taking refuge in the impending Budget?

Mr. Biffen: The possibility of a debate or a statement on post offices, the debates that we shall have early next year on economic affairs, and the possibility of a debate on alternatives in public expenditure can be reasonably pursued through the usual channels.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Will my right hon. Friend provide time in the not-too-distant future for a debate on BBC financing? Contrary to the view that was expressed during Prime Minister's Question Time, several of us believe that an element of advertising for the BBC would be desirable. Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people are extremely worried that the BBC may obtain a considerable increase in its licence fee, which would be unacceptable to many of us?

Mr. Biffen: I am very much aware of the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend and I shall draw them to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. The fee must secure approval from Parliament, possibly through the negative procedure.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Prime Minister's memory failed her when she replied today to my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) about the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970? The Act places clear and mandatory duties on local authorities, as I made clear in a reply in the House to my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 22 March 1978. Does the Leader of the House agree that it does the reputation of the House no good for right hon. and hon. Members to be misled in that way? Will he arrange for the Prime Minister to apologise to my hon. Friend and give him a proper answer next week?

Mr. Biffen: I pay proper respect to the right hon. Gentleman as the author of the legislation, but I match that with an assertion that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister needs no lessons in courtesy to the House. I shall draw her attention to the right hon. Gentleman's point.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Will my right hon. Friend consider a matter that is causing increasing anxiety for the orderly progress of business in the House? I refer to Foreign and Commonwealth Office questions and European Community questions. Yesterday, 77 questions were set down for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, to be answered in 35 minutes, and only nine were answered; six questions were down for EC matters and all were answered in 20 minutes. I have raised this point previously, and I ask my right hon. Friend to consider it urgently because the position is becoming absurd. I strongly suggest that the EC element be abolished and that we have one hour for Foreign and Commonwealth questions.

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the force of my hon. Friend's question. This is a matter for the usual channels. I shall ensure that the usual channels are informed of the anxiety that has been expressed and the view that all foreign countries should be treated as equally foreign for the purposes of Question Time.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): May I ask the Leader of the House to arrange a debate on the De Lorean affair? The Public Accounts Committee considered it to be one of the greatest abuses of public money that we have seen for very many years. Since there are a number of political aspects to this matter which the Public Accounts Committee is not really fitted to discuss, will the right hon. Gentleman make sure that there is a debate to dispose of it at the earliest possible opportunity?

Mr. Biffen: I am in correspondence with the right hon. Gentleman. I very much hope that we can continue that correspondence and come to an amicable conclusion.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): May I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to early-day motion 36, the case for a blindness allowance, which stands in my name and which has been signed by no fewer than 146 hon. Members of all parties?

[That this House, whilst appreciating all that has been done for the blind by this and previous governments, wishes to remind the Government of the acceptance by successive Ministers of the case for a blindness allowance; and, in particular, the statement by the then Minister of State for Social Security and the Disabled (the Right honourable Member for Daventry) on 24th July 1979 that the case for an income in the form of a blindness allowance is unanswerable on its merits; points out to the Government that the blind do not normally qualify for mobility, invalidity, attendance or other allowances, unless suffering from a second disability; and calls upon the Government to take immediate action to replace the existing range of benefits available to the blind with a means-tested blindness allowance.]

A similar motion standing in the name of another hon. Member has been signed by no fewer than 88 hon. Members. This clearly demonstrates a very high degree of concern on the subject among hon. Members. Will my right hon. Friend therefore find time for an early debate on the blindness allowance?

Mr. Biffen: I acknowledge at once the importance of the subject and the large number of signatories to the early-day motions mentioned by my hon. Friend. On this occasion I shall content myself by referring my hon. Friend to the Adjournment debates which will take place after the Third Reading of the Consolidated Fund Bill next Wednesday.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the Leader of the House make specific provision for us to debate the motions relating to orders on regional industrial development which have been tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends? Could he also arrange for a statement to be made next week by transport Ministers so that they can make it clear that they will follow the practice, which the Leader of the House always follows, of treating all hon. Members with equal courtesy rather than offering to reply "personally more quickly than I would normally be able to do" to members of his own party?

Mr. Biffen: The first point which the hon. Member makes relates to business which will be before the House after we return from the Christmas Recess. I shall be in touch with the hon. Member on that point. As for his second point, I believe that the transport Ministers are the embodiment of courtesy. I shall relay to them the points which have been made this afternoon.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend take note of the considerable concern which has been expressed about the quite incredible suggestion of the BBC to shove up the licence fee by 41 per cent. to £65? Given the reluctance of that state-owned leviathan to be financed in any way other than by a compulsory tax and taking into account the additional costs associated with the licence, such as detector vans, the courts, the licensing authority and all the other paraphernalia associated with it, will my right hon. Friend please make time available, long before we have to vote on the amounts to be given to the BBC, for a debate upon how the BBC should be financed in the future?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of the points which have been put very powerfully by my hon. Friend. As I have said, I shall refer those points to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Leader of the House confirm that on Wednesday next Foreign Office Ministers intend to lay an order—the Consular Fees (Amendment) (No. 3) Order—to give effect to a proposal which was announced on 22 November to introduce fees for entry certificates? As this is conveniently the day after a meeting of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, will the Leader of the House talk to his colleagues in the Foreign Office and, in view of the widespread concern, ensure that if they are determined to pursue this matter they will do so by means of a parliamentary procedure which is subject to approval or annulment by this House?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly look into the matter and will be in touch with the Foreign Office, as requested by the hon. Gentleman. As for the widespread concern which the hon. Gentleman alleges to exist, he may be persuaded to take such advantage as there is of the Adjournment debates which will follow the Third Reading of the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the BMA is now behaving as badly as the drug companies over the Government's proposed limited drug list? Will my right hon. Friend arrange for a statement to be made next week in the House by the Minister for Health so that he can dispel the misinformation which is being peddled and remind the country that doctors all over Europe, and hundreds of doctors in our own hospitals, are prescribing generically, and off a limited list, and that if the BMA genuinely wants to help patients it should consult the Government in order to make sure that the limited list, when finalised, is as comprehensive as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I agree that a great deal of counter-productive lobbying is taking place on this issue. I shall refer my hon. Friend's point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Has the right hon. Gentleman seen early-day motion 215 on the closure of the BSC mill in Jarrow, which will throw 246 men on to the dole?

[That this House urges the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry not to give approval to the formation of the new company named United Merchant Bar plc in which 75 per cent. of the equity will be owned by Caparo Industries and 25 per cent. by the British Steel Corporation, since this plan involves the closure of the Jarrow (Tyne and Wear) and Monks Hall (Warrington) Mills, making 500 employees redundant in areas of high unemployment, and also means that the British Steel Corporation will have only a minority share which could lead to an increase of imports and an adverse effect on the balance of payments; and urges that more investment should be made in the Jarrow and Monks Hall Mills to ensure their future competitiveness and their survival.]

Bearing in mind that 100,000 jobs have been lost in the northern region since 1979 and that we had a statement from the Government last week to the effect that regional grants will be cut by £300 million, may we have an early debate on the subject?

Mr. Biffen: Time will be provided for a debate on regional employment shortly after we return from the Christmas Recess. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to bring his constituency problem before the House, I suggest that he uses the advantages provided after the Third Reading of the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that there were no fewer than 13 documents to be discussed in Tuesday's European debate but there was time for only 10 Back Benchers to speak. Will he undertake that if we have important EEC matters to discuss in future, as we may, there will be adequate time for those debates? I am sure that he would not wish us to be subjected to unfettered dictatorship from Brussels.

Mr. Biffen: As long as my hon. Friend is around, he will be a reasonable protection against that spectre. I shall take account of what he says and, in striking the balance that we have to strike between competing claims, I will try to ensure that we have adequate time to deal with these important subjects.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Will the Leader of the House bring to the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment the fact that in the Oxpring community near Barnsley 2,500 gallons of petroleum have been leaked into the river Don and that wildlife has ceased to exist along 2·5 miles of that river and that all the fishing has gone in that area? There is an urgent need for cleaning, restocking and compensation.

Mr. Biffen: I will certainly fulfil the hon. Gentleman's request.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what has happened about the proposal to pay a further £120 million to the EEC to help finance its overspend in 1984? Does he agree that even if, contrary to all the practice that he fought for in the past, the House is not allowed to vote on the issue as a matter of substantive legislation, there ought at least to be a full debate in prime time so that the full constitutional and financial issues can be properly considered?

Mr. Biffen: I am afraid that my hon. Friend must exercise his generous patience a little longer. Then he can assess to what extent his anxiety has been met.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Will the Leader of the House take a slightly less laid-back attitude to the letter, issued by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport? It would be bad enough if the letter promised preferential treatment for Conservative Back Benchers on constituency business, but it refers to political speeches made by Conservative Members at weekends. It would be intolerable if the Department of Transport were used as an adjunct of the Tory party and set against the rights of hon. Members who have serious constituency problems. Will the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, ensure that a statement is made by himself or by the Secretary of State for Transport to clear up this serious matter?

Mr. Biffen: I have not seen the letter, so I have made no comment on it. I will certainly not stand here and engage in a quick reading course. The hon. Member who first raised the issue suggested that it breached the rules of the House, and that is something on which only the Chair can rule.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Will my right hon. Friend ensure that time is given for a Government statement on the visit of Mr. Gorbachev particularly to cover the point of whether or not the Government have detected any change or shift in the Soviet's understanding of the term "peaceful co-existence", away from the mere absence of war in an atmosphere of antagonistic tolerance towards a mood of co-operation and development under which we may together achieve verifiable arms control and the curbing of nuclear proliferation and international terrorism, and thereby divert economic resources to the betterment of mankind?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises important points, and I shall ensure that they are drawn to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange with his hon. Friend in the Ministry of Transport to send me a similar letter to that which he sent on 30 November to his colleagues so that when I hear from my constituents about these matters, I can more easily demolish the Minister's arguments?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly draw my right hon. Friend's attention the points that have been raised about this letter, because clearly there is concern in the Chamber that he should know of that interest.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend give thought to the fact that some 80 per cent. of our people are said never to read a book? Will he respond to questions that came up both in Treasury questions and in early-day motion 196, which by today had been signed by 189 hon. Members?

[That this House requests Her Majesty's Government not to impose value-added tax on books.]

Will he also bear in mind that Dr. Johnson said that a well-read man is the best-educated man, and arrange for a debate so that hon. Members on both sides can make clear their opposition to the imposition of VAT on books?

Mr. Biffen: There is not much that I can add to the interesting and comprehensive exchange that took place on this matter in Treasury questions earlier today.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the right hon. Gentleman either confirm or deny that during next week's business it is the Government's intention to introduce regulations to amend the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 to deny up to 16,000 single striking miners the right to housing benefit if they pay rent to relatives and to affect tens of thousands of other people in a similar position? If that happens next week, will it not demonstrate the Prime Minister's obsessiveness to the point of insanity with her attacks on miners, and show the effect that her pursuit of the NUM will have on tens of thousands of other people?

Mr. Biffen: That is not set down as business of the House next week, but I shall look into the matter and be in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Has my right hon. Friend seen a report in The Times today about a speech made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on VAT for new house building, and the fact that VAT was not to be applied to that category? Should there not now be an opportunity for the unrest and concern that is felt in the country about the possible imposition of VAT on newspapers, books, periodicals, children's clothes and shoes to be alleviated by a statement before Christmas? The public need to know about this, because there is great concern on it. There has already today been a useful hint on retirement pensions. Could we not now have another hint from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Biffen: No. I think that it is time for a close season, and Treasury questions today dealt satisfactorily with this matter.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 195 concerning the death or killing of Mrs. Nora McCabe, which is supported by 79 hon. Members?

[That this House congratulates Yorkshire Television for making the programme on the killing of Norah McCabe; and calls upon the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to set up a public inquiry to look fully into the circumstances surrounding the shooting and to state what action has been taken against those responsible for the death of this young mother.]

In view of the concern expressed by the House, will the Leader of the House ask his right hon. Friend to institute a public inquiry into all the circumstances surrounding the tragic death of this young woman?

Mr. Biffen: I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to this point and to the request for an inquiry. The hon. Gentleman may wish to extend his argument somewhat if he is fortunate enough to obtain an Adjournment debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Mr. Francis Maude (Warwickshire, North): Will my right hon. Friend note that, in view of the widespread concern felt in all parts of the House, it is essential that a full debate on the financing of the BBC should take place in the very near future, and particularly before the decision on the increase in the licence fee is taken, so that the BBC may fully understand that it will be subject to the most stringent financial discipline?

Mr. Biffen: Two of my hon. Friends have already asked questions on that point, and I can only repeat that I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to it.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): May I refer the Leader of the House to the answer that he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) in which he used the word "alleged" concern? May I tell him that it is more than "alleged" concern? Has he yet been able to digest the terms of early-day motion 200, which is still gathering signatures?

[That this House requests a reconsideration of a proposal made on 22nd November to introduce, for the first time, a charge for entry certificates for Commonwealth citizens; and points out that refusal of an entrance certificate, simply because the fee cannot be paid, would not be lawful under the Immigration Act 1971.]

Although at present the signatures belong solely to Opposition Members, we could equally well gather signatures from Conservative Members.

The proposed charge for entry certificates represents an innovation for Commonwealth citizens. People who have a lawful right to come to Britain from countries such as Bangladesh, including dependent relatives, already face long delays without this extra imposition. I hope that the Leader of the House will pass on that message to the Foreign Secretary. Indeed, as arguments are probably going on now as a result of the protests, will the right hon. Gentleman get the Foreign Secretary to come to the House to withdraw his proposal of 22 November?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point and I have already promised that I will refer to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary the anxieties expressed. Those anxieties will, of course, have been reinforced by the points that have just been made.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend will have heard all the demands for a debate on the alleged discrepancies in accounting with regard to mines that are scheduled for closure. Has he seen early-day motion 58, which suggests that the NCB could offer the mines scheduled for closure to the NUM?

[That this House, concerned at the possible adverse effect the strike in the coal-fields may have for job prospects in the coal industry and other related industries, recognises that the miners' leaders are concerned over planned pit closures, and calls upon the Government to urge the National Coal Board to draw up plans to offer to miners in pits scheduled for closure the opportunity to continue to work their own pits as mineworker co-operatives and to offer the pits complete with mining equipment at a peppercorn rent and, in the event of the miners declining, to offer the private sector the same mines at a peppercorn rent.]

If the NCB offered those mines to the NUM, Mr. Arthur Scargill and his friends could show clearly their confidence in them by taking them over.

Mr. Biffen: I thought that that was a well-judged contribution to our debate, and I am happy to have this opportunity to acknowledge it.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): May I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to early-day motion 128 and the relevant amendments to it concerning the death grant?

[Mr. Donald Coleman]

[That this House regards the present level of death grant at £30 for an adult man or woman born after 1894 as being totally inadequate; and calls for an increase in the grant to a level of at least £350.]

[As amendments to the proposed motion, in line 2, leave out from 'for' to end and add 'a substantial grant'; in line 3, at end add 'in this Session of Parliament'.]

I remind the right hon. Gentleman that this issue has often been raised in the House. When will the Government make a statement about their intentions? It is a serious matter for old people, and delay for so long is a disgrace.

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the matter is still before a Government committee that is formulating policy, but I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to the point made about the importance of arriving at a speedy decision.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a debate on the effects of the Government's rate-capping proposals on less-well-off people, including the 100,000 people in the city of Leicester who were identified by a recent survey as living in the most adverse conditions? Is he aware that the most swingeing proposals in the country for rate capping have just been made for the city of Leicester, which will impose savage, vicious and wicked cuts on the services that every citizen requires? May we have a debate on the issue before it is too late?

Mr. Biffen: I believe that the rate limitation orders will require a debate in the House, and that will take place reasonably soon. The hon. and learned Gentleman will have a chance to make his powerful speech then.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Secretary of State for Scotland—who is not a million miles away—when he intends to make a statement to the House on the disruption to schools in Ayrshire that has been caused by the provocative action of the Scottish region of the NCB and which has been testified to by impartial officials of Strathclyde regional council? That action has resulted in the stoppage of coal to one third of Ayrshire schools. Those schools are now closed and some of them may be closed in the new year. Indeed, some of them are in the Secretary of State's constituency, although he shows no apparent concern about that. When will we have a statement? When will this Scottish issue be given the degree of concern that it would attract if it were happening in the capital?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, sitting at my left elbow, will have heard every word of that powerful tirade. Doubtless he will react appropriately.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): In view of the concern expressed by Tories about the upholding of the law for miners and other working-class people, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a list to be placed in the Library of all Tory Members and any others who hold directorships and consultancies associated with firms trading on Sundays? To avoid the charge of hypocrisy, would not that be a good idea? Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Prime Minister to have a word with her husband, who has a long-standing connection with Halfords, to find out whether he approves of that firm breaking the law?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot arrange for such a list to be made available. However, I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me an opportunity to say that I deplore the breaking of the law on Sunday trading.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the Leader of the House aware that the rules of engagement for soldiers at military installations are issued on so-called pink cards? Is he further aware that the rules of engagement have recently been changed to allow soldiers to shoot unarmed civilians and, to go even further than that, to shoot dead an unarmed civilian in the back as he runs away from the establishment? Is it not worrying and outrageous that the Secretary of State for Defence has not been to the House to explain this matter?

Mr. Biffen: I shall most certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): In the light of the publication this week of the report on Stansted, because of the great anxiety in the north of England about that development and because the Secretary of State for Transport has promised a debate on the matter, can the right hon. Gentleman tell us when there will be such a debate so that we can, we hope, allay the fears of those who want to see the development of regional airports?

Mr. Biffen: Obviously the debate should take place reasonably soon. A number of hon. Members have spoken of their anxiety that a reasonable amount of time should be allowed to cope with the massive amount of reading implicit in the report.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does not the Leader of the House think that there should be an urgent and early debate on foreign affairs, considering the tense position in central America, the current position in South Africa and the troubles in Sri Lanka, with which the Government have close links? Should not these matters be debated in the House so that we can find out the Government's attitude towards the peace process in central America and other areas?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the importance that many hon. Members attach to those aspects of foreign affairs. I confess that there is no early prospect of a full debate on foreign affairs in Government time. Other opportunities are available to the hon. Gentleman, especially at this time of year, and I suggest that he tries his luck with them.

Consolidated Fund Bill

Mr. Speaker: I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund Bill on Wednesday 19 December.

Hon. Members should submit their subjects to my office not later than 9 am. on Tuesday 18 December. A list showing the subjects and times will be published later that day. Normally the time allotted will not exceed one and a half hours, but I propose to exercise a discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours.

Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different hon. Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will be shown on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of hon. Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

I remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 21 December up to eight hon. Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm. on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Public Expenditure and Rate Support Grant (Scotland)

4.5 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): With permission, Mr. Speaker. I should like to make a statement about public expenditure allocations and the rate support grant settlement for Scotland for 1985-86.

Total expenditure on the programmes within my responsibility for 1985-86 will be £7,158 million. The figure is broadly the same as that published in the 1984 public expenditure White Paper earlier this year and shows that the Government remain determined to keep public expenditure within planned limits. An annotated table giving the allocations for each service is available in the Vote Office and I am arranging for it to be published in the Official Report.

In allocating my total sum I have continued to give priority to spending on the Health Service. I plan to increase cash provision for the NHS in Scotland by £94 million more than the expected level of expenditure on the service this year. Of this, some £75 million will go to the health boards' hospital and community health services programme and associated centrally managed services, where cash provision will be increased by 5·5 per cent. more than expected expenditure this year and 1 per cent. more than the forecast level of inflation. That should enable boards to find the resources that they need for pay and price increases and for the expansion of services to meet demand from demographic change.

Law and order provision will be sufficient to meet the cost of the police service with a modest increase in manpower to meet priority requirements and to allow for a further 150 prison officers by 1 April 1986.

For housing I have increased total net provision by £5 million over the White Paper level to £598 million. This allows for gross capital spending of £568 million when estimated capital receipts are added to net capital provision of £392 million. To ensure that new investment is not, as this year, sacrificed to subsidise current expenditure, I am proposing to use my new power to limit rate fund contributions to require local authorities to reduce these contributions to £90 million. This enables me to increase capital spending on authorities' own stock to facilitate action on problems such as dampness, condensation and defective housing. I am also making additional resources available for tackling those problems. The combined increase in local authorities' HRA block allocations is £43 million.

The provision which I have made for education takes account of the changes I announced last week on student awards and includes £2·1 million as the first element of the recently announced increased expenditure on the central institutions. Improved academic staffing and a reinforcement of non-academic staffing and equipment resources should result in a significant increase in the output by the central institutions sector of engineering and technology graduates.

I can also announce that I have completed my consultations with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities about the rate support grant settlement and I shall lay before the House in due course the relevant rate support grant order. This will provide for a total relevant expenditure figure of £3,399·3 million and aggregate Exchequer grant of £1,924 million. Taking into account adjustments consequent upon the transfer of colleges, this is an increase of £19 million on the figure I announced in August.

The provision for relevent expenditure is, excluding loans charges and interest receipts, 5 per cent. above the figure for 1984-85 and £98 million above the provision in the White Paper, Cmnd. 9143.

In 1985-86 the needs element which accounts for 87 per cent. of rate support grant, will, as in 1984-85, be distributed on the basis of client group assessments. Grant changes between one year and another will again be limited, but good progress will be made towards the full implementation on the client group method.

As a result of the revaluation of property which takes effect from 1 April 1985, the share of the rating burden borne by industry will be reduced. I have therefore decided to reduce from 1 April 1985 the level of industrial derating from its present 50 per cent. to 40 per cent. This will still leave industry as the sector which gains most from revaluation. The revaluation will increase considerably the domestic ratepayer's share of the rate burden. I have therefore increased the domestic element of rate support grant from 1p to 5p in post-revaluation terms. This will reduce by half the effect of revaluation on the domestic ratepayer. I now look to local authorities to bring their expenditure down to the realistic guidelines which they have been given.

The decisions which I have announced today reflect the priority which the Government attach to keeping public expenditure on course, while recognising the need to make adequate resources available for important services. The flexibility in the Scottish block arrangements has again enabled me to ensure that Scotland's needs and circumstances are taken properly into account.

Following is the table:

† Includes Regional Development Grants.

‡ Treated on GB basis in Autumn Statement.

Note:

Owing to rounding individual figures may not sum to totals.

Agriculture: Changes in capital grants announced on 11 December will lead to a reduction of some £5 million in grant payments in Scotland in 1985-86. Support for hill farmers will be maintained through hill livestock compensatory allowances and in some cases improved.

Industry: Changes in regional industrial policy (including transfer of responsibility for regional development grants in Scotland) were announced on 28 November. Provision for selective financial assistance has been increased by £10 million to reflect its increased importance. Cash provision for grant-in-aid to the Scottish Development Agency and the Highlands and Islands Development Board has been increased over the underlying 1984-85 level.

Roads and Transport: Provision will be about £37 million more than was planned for the current year. This will maintain the momentum of the motorway and trunk roads programme enabling further significant progress with important bypasses, dual carriageways and other improvements. The Government will continue to honour its commitment to subsidise certain shipping and civil aviation services. Local authority investment in roads and public transport will also be maintained.

Housing: The reduction in housing provision mainly reflects lower capital expenditure on private sector improvement and repair grants following termination of higher rates of grant at March 1984.

Other Environmental Services: The urban programme will receive over £30 million compared with £26 million in the current year. Capital provision for water and sewerage will remain a priority with provision of £95 million compared to £92 million in 1984-85.

Law, Order and Protective Services: Provision should meet police service costs including some increased manpower; allow for a further 150 prison officers; support continued improvement in upgrading of prison buildings including work on two major projects at Greenock and Shotts; enable fire cover to be provided at minimum standards; carry forward civil defence planning and meet the cost of expected growth in demand for legal aid services.

Education: Provision reflects decisions already announced on student awards and central institutions expenditure. It takes account of the transfer to the central institutions sector of Napier college and Glasgow college of technology in September 1985. Increased local authority capital expenditure should enable faster progress on building improvement and rationalisation of schools.

Arts and Libraries: Provision has been increased to allow improvements in the staffing of national institutions and an expanded programme of repairs and maintenance. A modest increase in grants to the Scottish Museums Council and Scottish Film Council should also be possible.

Health and Social Work: The provision made for this programme allows for a cash increase for the hospitals and community health services programme of about 5·5 per cent. to enable health boards to meet the pay and price rises and also new demands for health care arising from demographic change. There are also sufficient additional resources to enable expenditure on the family practitioner services programme to match rising public demand, after account is taken of the effects of measures introduced or planned to control the cost of drug supplies and to contain the cost to the NHS of prescriptions. Government assistance to voluntary social work bodies, including community care and projects related to drug abuse, will also be increased.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I start with the public expenditure figures. Does the Secretary of State accept that it is clear that today's announcement means a cut in real terms as against the 1984-85 figures, even though the cash figures have been increased by the inclusion, for the first time, of regional development grant? If the Secretary of State had not had the benefit of comparing unlike with like, we would almost certainly have had a cut in real terms of nearly 3 per cent. Is it not true that his complacency is staggering, given the mean and inadequate provisions that existed in 1984-85 and the fact that only a blinkered loyalty to the Treasury makes the right hon. Gentleman look for further cuts on top of last year's cut of almost £200 million in real terms?

The right hon. Gentleman gave a remarkable performance, particularly in dealing with housing. He gave the impression that his statement was full of good news and festive cheer. In fact, housing has been sandbagged again. I estimate that the cut in real terms this year compared with last year is about 14 per cent. Housing support grant will be cut to £48 million. Towards the beginning of the Conervative party's period in power the housing support grant was more than £220 million. The right hon. Gentleman boasts of increases in the HRA capital allowance, but he fails to say that that increase has been more than offset by massive cuts in the non-HRA programme and that there has been an overall reduction. The right hon. Gentleman's gift for citing a nice selection of statistics calculated to give an impression which bears no relationship to reality is becoming tiresome.

Will the NHS allocation fully cover demographic changes and improved techniques? The right hon. Gentleman referred to an increase of 1 per cent. above the inflation rate, but, as I understand it, that is not sufficient to cover the agreed figure, which requires an increase of about 1·2 per cent. to stand still. Would there still be a sufficient increase to cover those improvements and demographic changes if the NHS pay and price deflator were applied to the figures?

The right hon. Gentleman gave the impression that the £3 million that he has to find for his budget because of the student grant debacle is coming from the education budget and not from some other part of the Scottish Office budget. Will the right hon. Gentleman make clear to the House what has gone to make room for this additional cut?

The House will note with dismay that the rate support grant has fallen from 62·2 to 56·5 per cent. I believe that it has been cut every year since the Conservative party came to power. It is extraordinary that the right hon. Gentleman did not see fit to mention the grant rate. I accept that the relevant expenditure has increased by 4·9 per cent., but will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the combined effect is a £6 million reduction in the grant payable? That is a significant reduction in real terms.

I ask the Secretary of State to deal more fully with the effect of revaluation. Is it not a disgrace that the £50 million which must be found to meet partially the impact of revaluation on the domestic ratepayer is to come from the needs element, particularly the needs element of district councils, to which the Secretary of State has contributed only £19 million?

There was a deafening silence about the likely rate increase as a result of the right hon. Gentleman's decision. I suggest that the inevitable victim will be the ratepayer. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, on a standstill budget for local authorities in 1985-86, the ratepayer will have to find another £194 million for the increase in relevant expenditure, that the local authorities will receive £6 million less in grant and that the £50 million will have to come from the needs element and, therfore, at the expense of services? That money will have to be found by the ratepayer. It looks like an increase of about 16 per cent. on a standstill budget.

Even if local authorities lowered their figures, cutting services by £100 million to meet the guidelines, the increase would still be almost 10 per cent. across the board, before taking into acount the impact of revaluation on the domestic ratepayer, which I would put — I understand that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities agrees—at about 8 per cent. Depending on whether it is a standstill budget, with no question of growth, or whether it is a budget for local authorities which come down to guidelines, the range of rate increases will be between 17 and 25 per cent. I ask the Secretary of State to comment on that aspect of the matter.

What will be the position—this will be of particular interest to Conservative Back Benchers — of those authorities which are below or at the guidelines? If they remain at the guidelines set by the Government, they will have to bear, through their rates, the entire burden of increases in relevant expenditure, the entire cut in the grant allocated to them and the entire strain on services of the switch from the needs to the domestic element. Those local authorities will be looking at 24 or 25 per cent. rate increases, with not even the option of cutting to come down to the guidelines, because they are already at those guidelines. The local authorities will be able to mitigate the impact only by spending well below the guidelines set by the Secretary of State. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that that is a fair analysis? If so, is that the reward for the loyalty that he has demanded from those local authorities?

Is it not typical of the whole fraudulent approach that —[Interruption.] I am coming to the end. This is an important statement. Normally, we would have had two separate statements. We are considering the whole rate support grant and the whole of the public expenditure figures rolled into one, and that explains why so many points must be raised. It is typical of this fraudulent approach that the industrial ratepayer, who might have been expected to benefit from the revaluation, has largely had the benefit promptly taken away from him with a reduction in industrial de-rating from 50 to 40 per cent. The gain has been offset, and the Secretary of State has taken with one hand what the assessor has given at the other end of the equation. This is a miserable outlook. It will cost jobs and will mean deteriorating services in the public sector. That is exactly what we would expect from the wretched but predictable petty prejudices which now dominate the Scottish Office.

Mr. Younger: I know that it was a long and difficult statement, but I am flabbergasted at how much the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) managed to get wrong. He said that we should have had two separate statements. He has a cheek to say that. No Labour Secretary of State has ever made a statement in the House on this part of the rate support grant. No Labour Secretary of State has ever made a statement in the House on the Scottish block. The hon. Gentleman should have the grace to admit that since taking office I have adopted the practice of making these statements, and I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would be grateful for that.

The hon. Member for Garscadden described the cut in overall expenditure as a cut of 3 per cent. in real terms. He made a completely misleading comparison, because the programme includes the electricity board's external financing limits, which, as he well knows, are declining because the construction work at Torness, which took a large proportion of the finance, is tailing off. If we exclude the EFLs and the change in regional development grant, which is an exceptional item, the cash increase is about 4 per cent. of the total figures that I mentioned. In real terms, this is a decrease of about £30 million on a total budget of more than £6 billion. The year-on-year increase in the Scottish block is close to the forecast rate of inflation.

The hon. Gentleman said that the housing measures involved a cut of 14 per cent. The housing cut, such as it is—today's announcement showed an increase over the White Paper figure to which we are referring — is accounted for almost entirely by the change in improvement grant from 90 to 50 per cent. The hon. Gentleman was trying to cut out completely from his consideration the extra money that I have allocated towards the alleviation of dampness and condensation, which the hon. Gentleman has always made out he is tremendously keen to mitigate.

With regard to the National Health Service, we calculated that the demographic changes would require an increase of just under 1 per cent. for them to be covered fully. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the amount is well over the increase in inflation—without allowing for any savings that health boards can make—and will allow for those changes and other matters.

On the question of student grants, with respect to the hon. Gentleman, I did not say or imply—it is not the case—that any of these measures had resulted from the announcement that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State made 10 days ago about extra money for science and technology. As I told the hon. Gentleman the other day, the figures for the Scottish block were not worked out when that happened. We have, therefore, been able to incorporate our calculations within the normal considerations of the Scottish block, which, at over £6 billion, has not had great difficulty in absorbing £3 million of extra expenditure resulting from the changes in student grants. The announcement that my hon. Friend made about extra money is unchanged. It will still amount in total to £14 million and there will be a first component of it, as I mentioned today.

Understandably, the hon. Gentleman made a small error when he talked about the rate support grant. It is not a £6 million cut, because he has failed to take into account the transfer of two colleges—two central institutions—from local authorities. That is a £10 million difference. If hon. Members wish to make a comparison, that is a £4 million increase rather than a £6 million decrease.

I made it clear that I have provided from Government sources £19 million extra to help local authorities to bridge the gap resulting from revaluation. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this is making history. I agree with one of his figures. The effect of revaluation changes on the domestic ratepayers, without taking anything else into account, is about 8 per cent. the figures that I have announced, it is calculated that if local authorities were to spend in line with the provision that I have suggested there would probably be an increase in rates of no more than the rate of inflation above the 8 per cent. resulting from the revaluation. The effect on domestic ratepayers will be only 8 per cent. because I have provided extra money to reduce by approximately half the effect that the revaluation would otherwise have had.

The hon. Gentleman was remarkably churlish about industrial ratepayers. Opposition Members are supposed to be interested in and keen and worried about jobs. Industrial ratepayers will have an average rate reduction of about 7 per cent. I can imagine the fuss that there would be if they had to face a 7 per cent. increase. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would be decent enough to welcome what has been done.

The hon. Gentleman raised a point about those local authorities which are below the guidelines. When they are on the guidelines they will have a problem with the effect of their expenditure on rates from now on, but ratepayers in those authorities already have the greatest and most coveted advantage, because they have had prudent authorities which have kept within spending limits for many years. On the whole, their rate levels are much lower than those of the mostly Labour-dominated authorities which have been extravagantly overspending for years. I hope that on reflection the hon. Gentleman will give a much warmer welcome to the statement than he did.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I welcome the fact that authorities such as Dumfries and Galloway, which keep within guidelines, will receive an increase in their budgets? Will he accept that I welcome also the fact that he is increasing expenditure on the Health Service? Can he confirm that, in real terms, overall local government expenditure is far above the levels of 1979?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. I, too, greatly appreciate the splendid efforts that various local authorities, including Dumfries and Galloway, have made to keep expenditure down to the levels of the provision. I am sure that that is much welcomed by their ratepayers. I can confirm that, despite all that has happened in recent years, local authorities are still spending over 2 per cent. more than they were in 1979. That gives the lie to all the cries abou the terrible slashing of services. That has not happened yet.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): In view of the rigt hon. Gentleman's remarkable statement about looking to local authorities to bring their expenditure down to realistic levels, may I ask whether he has taken into account anything inside or outside the confines of the statement that could be done to ease the problem of the Western Isles islands council, which, with the highest domestic rate in Scotland, cannot spend up to its own mean guidelines? What is the reason for the delay in implementing the client-group method, which was expected to be introduced during 1985-86?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety about the Western Isles. He and I have discussed this subject on several occasions. I have been able to give what I hope will be seen as considerable help to the Western Isles, through the distribution of the rate support grant. I hope that that will be of some help. As regards the client-group method, the settlement makes a large stride towards getting most authorities much nearer to their client-group assessments, and that will be generally welcomed.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Can my right hon. Friend give any informtion on progress in reducing of overmanning by some local authorities? When Opposition Members and some high-spending local authorities huff and puff about his statement, will he bear in mind that some Labour-controlled local authorities seem to have no difficulty in finding unlimited funds to support the miners' strike?

It is difficult to evaluate a local authority's rate record over a run of years when a revaluation has occurred during the period. I wonder whether my right hon. Friend could do anything, such as producing a ready reckoner, to enable people more readily to establish the rate record after revaluation, because there should not be any increase in expenditure as a result?

Mr. Younger: On the latter point, I appreciate my hon. Friend's wishes. I shall consider issuing a ready reckoner or some other easy means to make comparisons. That is an interesting suggestion.

As my hon. Friend probably knows, there has unfortunately been a considerable increase in manpower since 1979. I calculate that the non-manual increase has been about 10 per cent. since then. There again, the story of vast redundancies in local authorities in Scotland does not bear analysis. I fully appreciate my hon. Friend's feelings about local authorities' donations to some of the miners on strike. Without going into the legalities of that, I find it astonishing that the authorities which dish out that sort of money can still complain that they do not have enough money for their ordinary and proper services.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Why does the Secretary of State, who is a member of a Government who boast about cutting public expenditure, try to pretend that he is not cutting public expenditure when he comes to the House and makes the statement that we have just heard? His statement on housing is typical. He makes £589 million sound like an increase. This year's figure is £650 million. The real reduction next year is therefore—as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said—14 per cent. Why does the Secretary of State not admit that? He is now trying to exclude nationalised industries in his figures for total public expenditure. He did not, of course, exclude them when the figures doubled between 1982-83 and the current year.

There is a 2 per cent. reduction in total expenditure in Scotland on a like-by-like comparison between this year and next. In real terms, this represents substantially more than £100 million. That is what is being cut from public expenditure in Scotland next year. Why does the Secretary of State not admit his responsibility for that and for the poorer services and increased unemployment that will result from his announcement?

Mr. Younger: I feel that I should sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman on his sudden attack of deafness. He accused me of trying to pretend that there was a vast increase in public spending. I remind him that in my statement I said that this "shows that the Government remain determined to keep public expenditure within planned limits."

I cannot be much clearer than that. I have explained that the reductions in the housing figures which he mentioned are due almost entirely to the reduction in the non-HRA portion, which is reflected in the reduction in improvement grants from 90 to 50 per cent.

I remind the right hon. Gentleman—I hope that it will not embarrass him too much—that the resulting level of improvement grants is miles ahead of anything that he ever achieved in any year, or even after adding all his years together. He mentioned a reduction in real terms. Unfortunately, it must be a question of deafness, because I explained in my first answer that that is largely accounted for by the change in the Torness EFL, which is an understandable and correct procedure.

Mr. John Corrie (Cunninghame, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he will continue to support ferry services to the islands as generously in the future as he has in the past? Is he aware of how important these ferry services are to the people in the island communities?

Mr. Younger: I confirm to my hon. Friend that I have written into the figures further provision for assisting with those services.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Is it not the case that the £75 million cash increase to be allocated to the hospital boards assumes a wage increase for nurses of not more than 3 per cent? Since they would need at least 20 per cent. to get back in real terms to what they were earning 10 years ago, does it not mean that if there is any improvement at all in the Health Service it will be at the expense of people who are already grossly exploited within it?

With regard to housing, is it not the case that more than 12 months ago one district council alone, Kirkcaldy, estimated that to bring its non-traditional houses into habitable condition it would need to spend at least £50 million?

Will the Secretary of State read the recent report of the National Economic Development Council, on which the Government are represented, which says that billions of pounds will have to be spent on the infrastructure—roads, the transport system, education, hospitals and so on—and that these services are being ruined by the Government's gross neglect of them?

Mr. Younger: I hope that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will think that he is overstating his point very seriously. The nurses have had from this Government what they have never had from any other Government—a proper review body for their pay system. I think that they are very grateful for that. There are now far more nurses than there were under the last Labour Government, as the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to recall.

Health authorities are expected to find the cost of pay and price increases in 1985-86 from within the general increase of 5·5 per cent. made available for this programme. The Government consider that a pay increase of 3 per cent. would be reasonable, and at that level hospital and community health services would have resources to expand by about 2 per cent. It is entirely up to those concerned with negotiations to decide what level of pay settlements there should be, although it follows that if pay settlements are higher there will be less money for expansion and development.

With regard to housing, I remind the hon. Gentleman that we have found an extra £16 million to go specifically towards dealing with dampness and condensation. I should have thought that that would be welcome to the hon. Gentleman, particularly as the rest of the allocations to local authorities include money for maintaining their houses, and it can be used for helping with the dampness problem if they give it a high enough priority.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton (Edinburgh, West): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that £43 million extra is being provided for housing and that this will mean increased provision for the housing associations, through the Housing Corporation? Not only will there be a special allocation for housing affected by dampness and condensation; ill there not also be an allocation for defective housing, such as Orlit housing?

Mr. Younger: I confirm that there is £43 million extra on the housing revenue account.

I am glad that, taking into the account the local authority component, the housing associations will once more be able to look for a total expenditure of about £100 million this year—a figure miles higher than anything remotely achieved by previous Governments. I hope that Opposition Members will welcome that, as they are supposed to be in favour of the housing association movement.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement will do nothing but exacerbate the very difficult circumstances that exist between central and local government in Scotland?

With regard to the provision of the relevant expenditure, will the Secretary of State confirm that the increase of 5 per cent. to £98 million coincides with a reduction in the grant from 60·2 to 56·6 per cent., and that that difference will have to be found by the ratepayers?

With the Secretary of State also confirm, with regard to the revaluation, that although he has made a welcome increase of £19 million, that will leave £34 million—the 8 per cent. that he talked about—to be found by the ratepayers?

How long will it take the Secretary of State to implement fully the client-group approach? Will it take two, 10, or 20 years?

Mr. Younger: With regard to the hon. Gentleman's last point, I cannot give a precise number of years, but on this occasion there has been a major step in that direction. I accept the hon. Gentleman's wish that we should get to full implementation as soon as possible.

As for exacerbating local authority and central government relations, if that were to happen anywhere, I am sure it would not be in the hon. Gentleman's part of the world, because the Borders regional council has not only done extremely well in keeping expenditure down to a reasonable level, but it has been particularly helped by this settlement, as have several other authorities. I hope the hon. Gentleman will find that that is helpful to him and his constituents.

With regard to the reduction in grant, of course it is the case that the Government have been trying to reduce the percentage of rate support grant. There is ample evidence to show that whenever that has not been done — for three years running it was not done — the local authorities have simply put up their spending in order to spend the difference that they could afford and put it on to their ratepayers.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for welcoming the extra amount provided for housing. I hope that that will be generally welcomed, although the Opposition Front Bench have not felt able to say anything good about it.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the increase of £38 million in expenditure on education and the £27 million extra expenditure on health and social work, but I am deeply disturbed and disappointed by the £19 million cut in agricultural support. Will he bear in mind that there has been no increase in capital grant since 1981? This morning I received a telex from the Banffshire NFU, which said:

"Shocked by cuts in capital grant. Disastrous for the future of the hills and the uplands."

As there is a £5 million reduction in the capital grant that my right hon. Friend is suggesting in his statement, I should like him to have another look at it and find a bit more money for farmers.

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he said about the increase in expenditure on education. It is of the greatest importance that we have found a considerable sum to increase the amount of technical education and scientific research.

I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern about agriculture, but, when he has time to look at the figures more closely, I think he will find that the decrease shown there still indicates a strong commitment to agriculture. The main reductions are in the spending on schemes which are pre-funded by the European Community. The difference amounts to £17 million. Capital grant reductions amount to about £5 million. The main increases result from the enhancement of the suckler cow premium and payments of £1 million under the milk outgoers scheme. Both schemes were announced earlier this year. We remain strongly committed to firm support for agriculture, and the increased rates of hill livestock compensatory amounts recently announced have been widely welcomed by the industry.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand that his statement will be met with dismay in Scotland, that he has a responsibility to reduce unemployment, and that the cuts that he has announced today, taken with the cuts in regional aid, will mean that 1985 will be a record year for unemployment in Scotland? Would he care to predict what the unemployment figure will be for 1985? Will he accept that responsibility for that tragedy lies firmly with him?

Mr. Younger: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is on a bad point. His right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) will remind him that, as Secretary of State, he did not make forecasts about unemployment. I remind the hon. Gentleman that, as a result of revaluation, if local authorities have any reasonable reduction in their spending, industry will have a reduction in rates of about 7 per cent. on average. Anyone who is worried about jobs must surely welcome that. The hon. Gentleman might also like to note that within those figures there are increased provisions for regional development grants, which have now been transferred to the Scottish Office. They, too, will help to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the changes that have been made in the rating to affect industrial users will benefit coal mines which are working, because they will be paying rates? Is there not scope here for miners to set up co-operatives in the mines that are scheduled for closure, so that they can invest in their own future and take advantage of those rates?

Will my right hon. Friend look at the way in which the support measures are produced for road networks? He will be aware that Tayside supplies the two main roads going north in Scotland. I believe that there is scope for looking at how the roads are funded, particularly with the heavy traffic that is flowing through.

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the present manning levels in local government in Scotland are above those for 1977, which was the year before the Labour Government introduced the real cuts in manning levels in Scotland?

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend's final point. That was the biggest reduction in manpower that the right hon. Member for Govan ever achieved, a fact of which I am sure he is extremely proud.

My hon. Friend referred to the possibility of miners wishing to make use of the grants and so on that are available. I agree that that would be useful. I should make it clear that the extra provision is for selective assistance. There is a greater emphasis on that now. The regional development grants are, of course, non-cash limited, so they will be provided at whatever level they have to come — I correct what I said previously about that. The figures announced today allow another satisfactory increase in the roads programme money in Scotland, which will enable the programme to carry on as planned, and there is also somewhat of an increase for local authority roads, which again I think will be welcomed by them.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Behind all the weasel words, is there not a real and desperate cut? Is it not the case that every piece of economic advice that the Secretary of State is getting is that tax cuts will not produce jobs, but investment will? Further, is it not the case that the right hon. Gentleman's boast about the increase in regional development grants is phoney? He referred to a transfer payment, but in reality there is a cut, which has already been announced.

Is it not the case that the right hon. Gentleman's figures on housing will again mean a cut and unemployment in the construction industry? Will he admit the fact enunciated by my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton), which is that the figures for the National Health Service mean an effective pay award of 3 per cent. for nurses, which is below the rate of inflation — yet another deplorable and appalling cut?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman's rhetoric depends entirely on there being cuts all over the shop, because that is all that he really understands. However, he has not appreciated that it is no part of my or the Government's case to try to increase public expenditure — quite the reverse. The hon. Gentleman has not appreciated that the Government's objective is to try to keep public expenditure under control, and that is perfectly clearly and openly stated. What we are trying to do, and what the figures demonstrate can be done, is to maintain a good level of services by good housekeeping and savings, while not putting extra strain on public expenditure, which would result in a mad increase in spending, which is all that the hon. Gentleman ever wants. Of course investment is important, and we do all that we can with the money available to keep investment up. The construction industry's component from the public sector in Scotland in the year ahead will broadly remain level in real terms, as it has done over the past few years. That is another example of what good housekeeping can produce, even at a time when we are trying to keep down the overall levels of public expenditure.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): I share my right hon. Friend's justified objective to contain public expenditure, but would he care for a moment to bask in the glory of the Opposition's philosophy and bear in mind the fact that expenditure on local authorities is, in real terms, above what it was in 1979?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is quite right and is helping to explain to Opposition Members the realities of the situation, which they are criticising from all the wrong angles. It is true that local authorities are still spending more in real terms than in 1979. It is against that background that the terrible doleful cries of the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) have to be seen. More manpower is being employed and more money is being spent in real terms. What the hon. Member for Paisley, South said bears no relation to reality.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Does the Secretary of State admit that it is politically unacceptable and socially disgraceful that he has allocated only £16 million towards dealing with dampness in housing in Scotland when the Scottish Select Committee report estimated that £500 million was needed to tackle the problem?

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it is a disgrace, when parents throughout Scotland are becoming increasingly worried about drug abuse by young people, particularly in the central belt and elsewhere, that insufficient funds are being given to the Scottish NHS, beyond the 1 per cent. which the Treasury reckons it needs to stand still and keep pace with demographic changes, to provide specific thrust to deal with the problem?

Mr. Younger: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman has the housing figure wrong. Perhaps the way in which it has been expressed is wrong. The £16 million is not what I have allocated for dealing with dampness and condensation. It is a specific extra amount over and above the allocation that is given normally to cover that and other associated services. The hon. Gentleman may remember that when I met the Select Committee about the matter we went into it in some detail, and it was made clear that if local authorities regard it as a high priority, as I do, to deal with dampness and condensation, large sums of money are allocated to them—much more than £16 million—from which they can find quite a lot to deal with the dampness problems in their areas. The local authorities' own checklist of the amount of money needed to put those difficulties right is £190 million. That is their calculation. If one takes what is allocated generally for housing maintenance and repair and the £16 million extra, one sees that that represents a major gesture towards dealing with the problem. I hope that on reflection the hon. Gentleman will welcome that.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman recognise once and for all that one of the heaviest burdens for local authorities in Scotland is the high incidence of unemployment? Does he agree that because of his statement, with the inevitable cuts in education, social services, home helps and fire services, there will be a further increase in unemployment? Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that the 7 per cent. figure that he mentioned as being beneficial to industrialists is one that he has plucked out of a hat, and will aggravate the situation?

Mr. Younger: I do not recognise the terrible headings under which the hon. Gentleman listed cuts and so on. I do not know about cuts in the fire service. I have not announced any. With regard to unemployment, the hon. Gentleman's area is in the largest top-tier authority in Britain and has the best attractions compared with other areas in any part of Britain. I should have thought that he would be glad about that. There are several features which directly help to tackle unemployment, including the lower rates for industry and the money which is not cash limited for assistance to industry, which I mentioned.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Is the Secretary of State aware that just over an hour ago the Prime Minister admitted that she was not an expert in accountancy and that his statement shows that he joins that select group of self-confessed illiterates in accountancy? Who does he think he is kidding when he tries to pretend to the Scottish population that he is not savagely cutting the housing budget? It is pure fiction to pretend that he is finding new money, when all that he is doing is finding it at the expense of other programmes at a time when Scottish housing need is at its greatest and when the Scottish building industry is in crisis.

Mr. Younger: I do not pretend to be an accountant, and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman does either. Whether either of us is an accountant, perhaps the hon. Gentleman is good enough at arithmetic to tell me whether an extra £43 million on housing means a cut or an increase.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Will the Secretary of State admit that his statement confirms that he has reneged on promises given to the ratepayers of Ayr, Prestwick and Troon on revaluation, which he gave in a desperate bid for re-election? As the Secretary of State is so confident that there are no cuts, and as he is so enthusiastic about law and order, will he indemnify any local authority for legal action taken against it because it cannot fulfil its statutory and legal responsibilities in education, social work or any other service because of what are clearly cuts? I ask that because I calculate that the per capita expenditure in Scotland is less than 1 per cent. of the per capita expenditure by this Government, by our taxpayers, on the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Younger: I confirm that I have reneged on no undertakings to any ratepayers in Ayr or any other part of Scotland.

Mr. Foulkes: In the right hon. Gentleman's election address——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Younger: As for legal responsibilities, I cannot see how local authorities spending over 2 per cent. more in real terms than they were five years ago can have difficulty in keeping up their legal obligations. I think that the hon. Gentleman has been reading too many Hans Andersen fairy tales.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): It has taken the right hon. Gentleman half an hour to admit that he has done a "star chamber" job on his Department. On the question of funding for the National Health Service, the right hon. Gentleman has made it clear that the Government are providing for a 3 per cent. increase in nurses' pay. Is he aware that in real terms that is a cut and that nurses' pay has fallen about 20 per cent. below where the last independent review said it should be, and that nurses are now on the breadline? What have Scotland's nurses done to deserve that?

Mr. Younger: As the hon. Gentleman knows, a pay review body has been set up to consider nurses' pay.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Secretary of State suggested that the increased cash provision for the NHS would result in expanded services. As part of that expansion, will there be increased geriatric provision and better, more comprehensive hospital facilities for the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped?

Mr. Younger: The figures that I have announced provide for an increase of 5·5 per cent. over the previous provision, which allows the NHS at least 1 per cent. more than the expected rate of inflation to cover extra demands on services, and so on. I agree that the priorities set out by the hon. Gentleman are very important, as do the health boards. Under the share arrangements, it is up to the health boards to use the money available to them within the figures that I have announced to deal with those very high priorities.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Adding all the Secretary of State's years of office together, why is he so blindly indifferent to housing investment and unemployment in Scotland, as shown by the halving of housing investment in cost terms since he came to office in 1979? Why is he short changing Scotland's domestic ratepayers on revaluation by giving only £19 million to local authorities for domestic relief and leaving them to pick up the tab for the other £51 million? Finally, what will be the average weekly increase in rates and in rents as a result of the Government's revaluation and housing policies? Will he produce figures on those two matters?

Mr. Younger: I shall try to give the hon. Gentleman as many figures as possible. His comments about housing suggest that he prepared them before hearing my statement. Nothing that he says alters the fact that, on the housing revenue account, which he should regard as important, this year's provision is £227 million and next year's provision will be £270 million. To everyone but the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), that is an increase of £43 million.

On revaluation, my calculation is that after the extra help that I have given—the £19 million and the increase from 1p to 5p domestic rate relief — the effect of revaluation alone on the domestic ratepayer will be an increase of about 8 per cent. For the industrial ratepayer it is minus 7 per cent. I have approximately halved the adverse effect on domestic ratepayers which would otherwise have occurred. A proportion rightly remains to be paid for by the domestic ratepayer, but it would have been double that amount if I had not taken my action.

As for rents, on my calculation the average rent increase in Scotland will be £1 per week. That must be set against the fact that Scottish rent levels are very substantially lower than those south of the border, while average earnings are now higher than those south of the border.

Local Government Bill (Standing Committee)

4.55 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order concerns the composition of the Standing Committee to consider the Local Government Bill. Earlier this morning the Government suffered a major political setback with the most humiliating vote of this Parliament when little more than half—58 per cent.—of Conservative Members voted for the centrepiece of the Government's legislative programme, cutting the Government's overall majority from 150 to 23.

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State said on the radio today that he would be prepared to listen to further argument, but he will not have that opportunity as he has not been included in the membership of the Standing Committee to consider the Bill. I understand that membership of Standing Committees is in the hands of the Committee of Selection. But is it in order for the House to express a view about this, and, if so, how can that be done?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has answered his own question. It is entirely a matter for the Committee of Selection. The hon. Gentleman can certainly express a view at Question Time, or in any other way, but there is no formal way of raising the matter on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to labour the point or to stray out of order, but the practice in the House has been for Secretaries of State to serve on the Standing Committee when they introduce major Bills which have constitutional implications, as the Local Government Bill has. Is the Select Committee not accountable to the House in any way? Can we not do something about the fact that the Secretary of State seems to be ignoring precedent by declining to take part in rather than being excluded from the Standing Committee on this very important measure?

Mr. Speaker: That is entirely a matter for the Selection Committee. The hon. Gentleman, however, is not entirely correct. There have been many cases in which this has not happened.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As my hon. Friend has said, there is an important constitutional point involved, because this is a reform of local government without a Royal Commission or any public and objective inquiry. May I remind you that in the local government reform of 1962 the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph), served on the Standing Committee? Would it not be of benefit to the whole House if we had the experience, wit and wisdom of the present Secretary of State on the Standing Committee to consider the present Bill? I look to you, Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State's hon. Friends look to him, for guidance on these matters. Is there any way in which we can bring the matter to the attention of the House so that we may discuss this important constitutional issue?

Mr. Speaker: It would be more effective for the hon. Gentleman to look to the Chairman of the Selection Committee than to me.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If it is not possible for the Secretary of State to find his way on to the Committee, will it be possible for you, in selecting amendments for Report, to take into account the fact that we shall not have had the opportunity to obtain answers from the Secretary of State in Committee? Will you therefore look sympathetically at the matters that we raise so that the Secretary of State can make his views clear on Report?

Mr. Speaker: That is ingenious. Like the hon. Gentleman, however, I have as yet no idea what amendments will be put down on Report.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): As it seems to be unprecedented for a senior Minister not to serve on the Committee in these circumstances, can you, Mr. Speaker, advise us as to what will happen if the other Ministers are not available? Who will represent the views of the Cabinet and the Government in those important discussions?

Mr. Speaker: I never give replies to hypothetical questions.

STANDING CHARGES (ABOLITION)

Mr. Christopher Murphy presented a Bill to abolish public utility standing charges: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 18 January and to be printed. [Bill 42.]

ESTIMATES

Resolved,

That this House agrees with the Report [11th December] of the Liaison Committee.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Orders of the Day

Local Government Bill (Clause 1)

Considered in Committee. [Progress 12 December]

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clause 1

ABOLITION OF GLC AND METROPOLITAN COUNTY COUNCILS

5.1 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 1, line 10, leave out from 'Council' to end of line 11.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 15, in page 1, line 11, at end insert 'except the Greater Manchester County Council.'.

Mr. Hughes: The effect of the amendment would be to delete the metropolitan counties from the provisions of the Bill, with the result that, for the time being, only the Government's proposal to abolish the Greater London council would remain. That proposal succeeded in gaining a tenuous level of support from the Committee early this morning, but it may of course be subject to further consideration later.

This part of our debate will be solely about the metropolitan counties. I hope that it will provide an opportunity for the Committee to talk about six counties which, because their future is dealt with in the same piece of legislation as the future of the GLC, appear to be playing second fiddle to London. Clearly, that impression is misleading. Proper consideration should be given to those areas, too.

We should not underrate the importance of the amendment and of the parts of the Bill that relate to the metropolitan counties—especially clause 1. We should remember that the population of six metropolitan counties amounts to 24 per cent. of the population of England, or 11·2 million people. The West Midlands has a population of just over 2·5 million people. Greater Manchester is very nearly the same size. West Yorkshire has a population of 2 million, Merseyside a population of 1·5 million and South Yorkshire 1·3 million. Tyne and Wear is the smallest of the counties, with a population of 1·1 million. The metropolitan counties cover substantial areas of industrial and metropolitan England, and the future of each of those counties should be considered as comprehensively as possible.

Our main objection to the inclusion of the six counties is that, if they are treated in the manner proposed, it will not be possible to consider their individual and differing circumstances, sizes, areas and needs with the necessary attention. The effect of considering them all together will be to impose on all of them a structure devised by the present Government. Our first proposition is that such treatment is in any event inappropriate, because the six counties are substantially different. Arguments about levels of services in Greater Manchester, and whether or not they should be retained at district or higher than district level, may not apply equally to Tyne and Wear, for example.

It is interesting that we are now considering only metropolitan government. We are considering only the six MCCs, but four non-metropolitan councils—Hampshire, Kent, Essex and Lancashire—have larger populations than Tyne and Wear.

When considering the future of government outside London, there is a strong argument for looking at the whole matter entirely afresh. That was the proposition that resulted in the setting up of the Royal Commission—the Redcliffe-Maud commission—which took three years to debate the matter and form its conclusions. It took the commission three years to decide what should be the next step in the reorganisation of what was generally agreed to be a muddled system of local government that had grown up over the previous 100 years.

We are considering not just the creations of an Act passed some 12 years ago, but the government of the premier cities of England, apart from London. We are considering the future of Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Liverpool, Bradford, Manchester, Coventry and Wakefield. Many places such as those deserve to have individual and proper consideration, because of their different and varying circumstances.

If it is necessary to add one further point to make clear how substantially the six counties differ from each other, one has to consider not just the population, but the fact that the sizes of the counties and the numbers of districts included in them vary widely. Greater Manchester covers 10 districts — by far the largest number — with Manchester in the centre and a radial structure of districts. There are seven districts in the West Midlands, and Merseyside, West Yorkshire and Tyne and Wear each includes five districts. The smallest metropolitan county in terms of the numbers of second tier authorities within it is South Yorkshire, with four districts. If we consider Greater Manchester and the neighbouring county of South Yorkshire in the same way, we shall not accord proper respect to their different sizes and make-up on local government terms.

On every objective argument, it would be proper for there to be separate considerations for each of the areas. At the same time—the point has already been made—it might be appropriate to give separate consideration to the other counties in England. There may well be an argument for reconsidering the provision and level of services in the shire counties at the same time as we consider the counties set up in 1972.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's line of argument. His amendment would not abolish any of the metropolitan counties, but it would allow the abolition of the GLC. Many alliance Members have expressed the opposite view. They are in favour of the abolition of the MCCs and the retention of the GLC. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us how the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) and the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) will vote on his strange and curious amendment?

Mr. Hughes: I am glad that the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) has raised that point. He has given us an opportunity to clarify our position and the position of the Labour party in relation to these proposals. There were attempts yesterday to remove the GLC from the provisions of the Bill. An amendment to that effect was proposed by my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself. Interestingly, our proposal to remove the GLC from the Bill was not supported by the Labour party.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: Labour Members abstained on the fundamental point about which they have been arguing so vociferously for months. It is telling that, at the time of trial last May on the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 and last night on the abolition Bill, they were found lacking. I only hope that the Labour party's friends in county hall in London will be satisfied with the abstention of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on the amendment which would have allowed the GLC to continue.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I shall in a moment.

We have never said that the GLC does not need reform. That has been the Labour party's view. However, it did not stand by that last night.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin) rose——

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way soon.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Hughes: I see that Labour Members want to rescue themselves.

Mr. Corbyn: These are devastating attacks.

Mr. Hughes: They are self-inflicted. The Labour party scored another own goal last night by not voting for what it has campaigned for so expensively during the past several years.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way shortly.

When the Conservative Government established the metropolitan councils, their proposals were opposed by the Labour party and the Liberal party. We opposed them because we believed that there should be proper regional government, not a half-way house. That was also the Labour party's argument. We have maintained that view. We did not want and are not keen on the metropolitan counties. The question is whether it is better for the time being to keep the metropolitan counties, with all their faults, until we can get what we want—a system of regional government—or whether we should abolish the metropolitan counties and have what my right hon. and hon. Friends and I believe to be a much worse arrangement. My hon. Friends the Members for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) and for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) have always made it clear that they do not like the metropolitan counties. We have to judge whether preserving the metropolitan counties is better than what the Government propose. With the exception of my hon. Friends the Members for Rochdale and for Mossley Hill, the parliamentary Liberal party believes that it is better to keep the metropolitan counties until the system can be improved.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose——

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way in a moment.

We believe that the metropolitan counties should remain until we have a proper examination of local government functions and can establish an improved structure. We have held that view ever since the original proposals were made 14 years ago, unlike the Labour party which has changed its views.

Mr. Straw rose——

The Chairman: Order. Has the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) concluded his speech, or is he giving way?

Mr. Hughes: I am giving way.

5.15 pm

Mr. Straw: In case you failed to notice it, Mr. Walker, that was merely a parenthetical interjection in anticipation of the question that I am about to ask the hon. Gentleman. He has made it clear that the alliance's stance on abolition of the metropolitan counties and the GLC is as confused and inconsistent as its stance on, for example, trade union legislation. There are as many alliance views as there are alliance Members. Perhaps I might put the hon. Gentleman out of his misery. He has done sterling stuff in trying to plait sawdust. We refused to vote for the alliance amendment last year—[HON. MEMBERS: "Last night."] It just seems like last year, as I am sure that the Secretary of State agrees—because it was ill drafted, ill thought out and reflected the confusion of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. Amendment No. 13 will save the metropolitan counties and abolish the GLC. The Liberal party amendment last night proposed the reverse. Our stance is clear. We want to save the GLC and the metropolitan counties. That is why we shall vote against clause stand part.

Mr. Hughes: I note, as no doubt do others, that the Labour party must justify its abstention. Matters are taken in sequence. Today we are debating whether to retain the met counties, all of which are Labour-controlled, yet the Labour party intends to abstain again. That is a most amazingly inconsistent and unprincipled attitude.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The Liberal party amendment which we considered last night would have abolished the met counties but not the GLC, and it was defeated. The sequence that the hon. Gentleman has described now means that we are discussing another alliance amendment which proposes the abolition of the GLC but not of the met counties. The sequence does not continue, however, with a third alliance amendment which will save the GLC, as such an amendment has already been defeated. On that basis, will the hon. Gentleman not press the amendment to a Division?

Mr. Hughes: If the hon. Member for Bootle, who has been here somewhat longer than I, does not yet understand the procedures of this place, I am disappointed. He knows that we debate issues in sequence. Last night we debated whether the GLC should continue, and the Labour party decided to abstain. Another amendment, which proposed saving the GLC, was defeated by only 23 votes. Ours would have been defeated by a similar margin if the Labour party had voted for it. The idea of keeping the GLC has therefore been lost, so we move on. If amendment No. 13 is successful, the met counties will be taken out of the Bill and only the battle about abolition of the GLC will continue.

Mr. Tony Banks: When the Secretary of State came to the Dispatch box for the third time last night, he claimed that the Labour party's abstention was a vote against the GLC. His argument was almost as intriguing as watching the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) disappearing up his own Division Lobby trying to explain what happened. My colleagues in county hall had decided that the Labour party at county hall did not want to be split from the met counties, as the Liberal party tried to do. The campaign has always been united. That is why we abstained on a typically splitting Liberal party amendment.

Mr. Hughes: There are many factual inaccuracies in what the hon. Gentleman has said. Two campaigns are being run—one by the met counties and another by the GLC. If he does not believe that, he should examine some of the documents that I have with me which set out the case for the met counties. They clearly come from a separate office in London. Apart from that sort of inaccuracy, the hon. Gentleman may choose not to support amendments moved by parties other than his own. However, that is an unprincipled stand, based purely on politics rather than on the issue. If he and his colleagues choose to make that decision, that is their affair and they must accept the political responsibility.

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): While the hon. Gentleman is lecturing the Committee on how our procedures work, he might reflect on the fact that by separating the two issues there was a distinct possibility of one being carried while the other was defeated. That would have destroyed the case he is now making. In order to avoid that possibility, the Labour party has chosen to link the two issues. Therefore, instead of lecturing us, the hon. Gentleman should perhaps learn.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans), who is considerably more experienced in parliamentary procedure than I, does not seem to realise that there has always been an opportunity to do better on one of the proposals than on the other, simply because the GLC case is stronger than the case for the metropolitan counties. For evidence of that, one only needs to look at the Labour party's manifesto and, subsequently, at the answers given and speeches made by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who refused to say that the Labour party would reinstate the metropolitan counties. If that is not clear, I am not surprised that Labour Members remain confused.

The Liberal party belief, which is historically, chronologically and factually true, is that the case for the retention of the GLC is stronger than the case for retaining the metropolitan counties, but that does not mean that the Government's proposals for the replacement of either are acceptable.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): The hon. Gentleman feels that the case for the retention of the GLC is stronger than the case for the retention of the met counties. Does he recall his comment on Second Reading, when he told me that he felt that Liberal councillors in the metropolitan areas should resist the abolition of those county councils with all the power at their disposal, which frankly is not a great deal? In view of the comments that he has just made, will not the morale of those Liberal councillors be weakened?

Mr. Hughes: I have no difficulty about that. Indeed, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that Liberal councillors in the met counties, all of whom I visited and spoke to during the summer and subsequently, are much more united and clear about this issue than any group of Labour councillors in any of the metropolitan counties. The Labour district councils would be quite happy to get their hands on the powers of the metropolitan authorities, and they have said so until recently, whereas their friends in the metropolitan counties in large measure want to hold on to their powers. I do not detract from what I said on Second Reading. The view of the 250 or more Liberal councillors in the metropolitan counties is that they should not assist the Government in passing bad legislation and that only when and if the Bill becomes law should they be obliged to follow it. That they will do, but not until then.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in Greater Manchester there is a fairly substantial library of Liberal pledges? Only two years ago the Liberals there were petitioning to abolish the GLC, but they are now defending the GLC. I assure the hon. Gentleman that by Friday there will be an addition to that library, because Hansard will show that the hon. Gentleman has sold those people right down the river.

Mr. Hughes: As the hon. Gentleman well knows, we shall not be happy until in each region of England there is proper regional government, with the powers that Whitehall should have devolved to those regions and with the powers that are at present in the hands of the quangos, such as the water and health authorities, also devolved to such democratic regional authorities. We have never departed from our view that where power can be exercised more locally it should be done so at every available opportunity. There has never been any alteration to that view. Indeed, last night the Secretary of State was kind enough to say that on this issue the Liberal party has been principled and consistent throughout this century. Although other hon. Members may wish to disagree, we are happy to bring that consistency to the attention of the Committee. We shall continue to argue for proper regional and democratic local government until we achieve it, and that may be sooner than many hon. Members think.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): As we are discussing election pledges, will my hon. Friend consider the Labour party's 1983 election commitment to introduce unitary authorities? How is it possible to have unitary authorities in the metropolitan areas while retaining metropolitan districts and counties?

Mr. Hughes: I shall reaffirm that point and then proceed because I am sure, Mr. Walker, that you would wish me to conclude — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Apparently, the unanimous view of the rest of the Committee is that I should continue. However, I shall not do so, because I respect the desire of the Chair to allow the debate to proceed.

The more one exposed the changing values and principles of the Labour party, the more interesting this debate would become. Since the interim provisions legislation was introduced in the last Session of Parliament, the Labour party's policy has been ambiguous about what would happen, except to say that it hopes to introduce unitary local government throughout England. If that does not mean merging the county and district councils, I do not know what it means. If I do not know what it means, no one else will be able to interpret the ambiguity in that manifesto document. The Labour party is still using that ambiguity, because it has not sorted out its policy on local government. It is simply on the defensive, and it will continue to be for a considerable time to come.

Mr. Allan Roberts: I have always been a keen supporter of regional government. The hon. Gentleman has said that on his trips around the country he met many Liberals. Did he find that the Liberal party on Merseyside is campaigning for abolition while the Liberal party in Greater Manchester is campaigning against it? Is that what he means by unity?

Mr. Hughes: I began by saying that if the metropolitan counties could be taken out of the Bill, we could argue on the merits for the form and structure of local government appropriate in each of the areas presently governed by the metropolitan county councils. It was clear that part of that argument was that there would be different solutions in different areas simply because the counties are of a different size and shape and have different characteristics and histories. I accept that in some of those areas there is a necessity for county-wide services.

I shall give one practical example. In a county such as Greater Manchester, as the hon. Member for Bootle pointed out, there has been considerable support for attention at higher than district level to many of the services — transport, waste disposal and technical services. Clearly it would be seen to be a disadvantage if they were split up between the joint boards, quangos and other Government concoctions. There should be a simple, clearly intelligible, local government regional structure.

5.30 pm

The hon. Member for Bootle knows that the same arguments may not apply to the Wirral, which is a district council in Merseyside, as to Sefton, which is the authority in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, because it is on the edge of Merseyside. Some authorities have expressed a wish to run their own police, fire, and transport services, as many of them did previously. Many of them ran their own police forces and bus services—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) says that boundaries have changed. He is right. The districts, boroughs and county boroughs ran their own services, and many of them wish to do so again.

I now press on to the other substantive reason why the Government's proposal to replace the county authorities with an amalgamation of different bodies is unacceptable to us and, I hope, to the Committee. Implicit in the proposals is an enormous degree of intervention by central Government, which is unparalleled in areas of local government activity. The proposals present a prospect for change, not only this year but again in a few years' time. There is an opt-out procedure. That will allow, in West Yorkshire, for example, a county-wide joint board to be set up to run the police force, from which a district may later opt out. It would be cheaper and better, if a district wished to opt out, for it to do so at the beginning. When there are joint boards, appointed bodies and residual bodies it will not be clear who is running which service.

People will not be able to vote, either often or in some cases at all, for those who will run the local services. Democracy is about the population understanding who run their services and being able to vote for them. It is not about having an indirect and unsatisfactory form of accountability, such as that of joint boards which do not work well, or about having a set of appointees over whom the electors have no control.

There is no evidence that the Government's requirement that districts should co-operate with each other will be met. Over the years many of the districts have not co-operated with each other. That has often been the recipe for duplication, waste and bad local services. That is why it would be better to take out the proposal as it stands, which is to abolish the metropolitan counties, as it were, by summary trial by the Government on the basis of a last-minute election pledge. No independent analysis has been commissioned in the proper way, and there is overwhelming evidence from chartered accountants, such as Coopers and Lybrand, other management consultants, bodies and people concerned, that the proposals will not work and will lead to the entire system having to be reorganised in a few years' time.

Our amendment seeks to prevent the Committee from following that road to chaos and to allow us to reconsider the metropolitan counties and their government in a way that will result in a better, not a worse, service for people in those areas.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) started on a good point, but, sadly, proceeded to destroy it. Had he argued that at this stage we should probe the Government's intentions to see whether they are prepared to be sympathetic to the view that we should treat each of the different English regions separately, it would have been useful. It would have put down a marker on a subject which we want to develop in Committee.

The hon. Gentleman developed the point effectively by pointing out the considerable differences in size and geography between the metropolitan counties. However, he then more or less said, "The Liberal party's policy is to impose regional government on all regions in the same way." That defeats his argument. It would have been better if he had suggested that he was probing the Government's intentions to find out whether they would give each area the option of a different form of local government. Some hon. Members will wish to return to that point in Committee. It is illogical to insist that all areas should be treated in the same way.

The hon. Gentleman also made the mistake of assuming that people are greatly interested in the minutiae of the tactics of the Liberal party. It is important that we show united opposition to the abolition of the GLC and the six metropolitan councils by maximising our votes. It would have been logical to ensure, therefore, that we get a maximum number of votes on clause stand part.

I wish to draw attention to the strong opposition in Greater Manchester especially to the abolition of the Greater Manchester authority, but also to that of the other metropolitan counties, and to make it clear to the Government that they must consider the specific local traditions of the six metropolitan counties. I hope that my hon. Friends will develop the argument equally well for the other five authorities. We have an opportunity to deploy their case.

I make no apology for concentrating on Greater Manchester. My constituency lies in its area, and I was brought up and have lived there for a long time. I am worried that, although many Tories were prepared last night to support the Greater London council, fewer are prepared to support the other six counties, especially Greater Manchester council. We must, however, bear in mind that there are fewer Conservative Members who represent the Greater Manchester area.

The Minister should consider the traditional approach of the people of Manchester. Although the great demonstration at Peterloo took place in the centre of Manchester, the surrounding towns, most of which are now included within Greater Manchester, sent substantial numbers of people to it. Since then, Manchester has been the natural focus for most of those towns. That was demonstrated when the old royal exchange functioned as the cotton exchange. People came from Oldham, Rochdale, Bolton and Stockport regularly and consistently to trade.

The old royal exchange is an attractive reminder of the history and unity of the region, although it is now used as the arts centre. Every time I go there to enjoy a play, it reminds me of the time when I was a small child and was allowed to peek into the exchange when it was the centre of the cotton trade.

The area has a fine railway and communications network and there has been much development of municipal enterprise. The geography of the area reinforces that. There is a semi-circle of hills and a set of rivers which flow towards the centre of Manchester. The entire area has achieved considerable unity as a result of the way in which the Government have attacked it by destroying jobs and failing to meet its needs.

There are problems of dereliction throughout the 10 authorities within Greater Manchester. Unemployment varies considerably from one ward to another, but there is a general dearth of jobs and a general lack of Government effort to create jobs throughout the area. There are many problems with infrastructure, and many houses must be replaced. All these problems are common to the area, and all the authorities have a common desire to solve them.

In 1900 the Conservative Government organised a referendum on local government boundary changes in Greater Manchester. Parts of my constituency opted to come within Stockport. It is odd that, at the turn of the century, a Conservative Government believed it sufficiently worthwhile to consult the people of Greater Manchester, yet this Government have rejected any possibility of a referendum to consider their proposals. We know why they are unwilling to consult the people about their proposals. If they did so, the people of Greater Manchester would reject them decisively. It is worth remembering that the Conservative party was decisively defeated in the elections to the Greater Manchester council, and at the general election, when the Conservative party produced a manifesto calling for the abolition of Greater Manchester council, few Conservative Members were returned in that area.

On all those counts, and including opinion poll results, the proposal to abolish Greater Manchester council has been rejected decisively by the people of that area. It is ridiculous for the Government to insist on imposing on those people a form of government which they do not wish.

How will the Secretary of State ensure that Greater Manchester has a voice to express the views of the entire conurbation, which until now have been expressed effectively by the council? How will he deal with strategic planning for the area? My constituents are worried about the way in which the shopping patterns of Greater Manchester are changing. Many people may feel nostalgia for the corner shop, but many others—the elderly, the handicapped and those who must have weekly tick—depend upon it completely. The most disadvantaged in the community are now the only users of the corner shop, yet they must pay the highest prices, whereas those who are fortunate enough to have cars can use large supermarkets. It has been extremely difficult for Greater Manchester council to maintain a policy for shopping because of the continual pressure from supermarket chains to establish out-of-town shopping centres. The latter are fine for those who have cars, but they destroy corner shops and the traditional shopping centres such as those of Manchester, Stockport, Tameside, Oldham and Bolton.

Someone must rationalise the overall shopping pattern in Greater Manchester, otherwise we shall return to rivalry among districts. Traditional shopping areas will be destroyed by the creation of out-of-town supermarkets and the reduction of competition in those areas. With traditional shopping centres people have the choice of a series of shops, whereas in almost all the out-of-town shopping centres large chain stores operate what are almost monopolies.

I should be grateful if the Minister would explain how the legislation will provide a better shopping pattern for Greater Manchester, as I see nothing in the Bill that deals with that.

5.45 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Although I understand how strongly my hon. Friend feels about Greater Manchester and the way in which it has served him and his constituents in the past, does he agree that his analysis could apply equally to Tyne and Wear council and to the other metropolitan authorities?

Mr. Bennett: I accept that, and I hope that my hon. Friends will develop those arguments. I am referring to Manchester because I understand its circumstances. I am not pleading a special case for Manchester, but simply putting it forward as an illustration of the general case.

Will the Secretary of State consider the overall transport pattern for Greater Manchester? The area will have a new transport body, but transport is not simply a matter of moving people from one point to another. We must ensure that the transport policy is co-ordinated with the shopping policy and with the development of industry. We hope that the rapid transport system will be introduced in Manchester, but we must ensure that the transport routes take people from where they live to where they work and to places where they can shop. The Bill does not tell us how the Government will achieve integration of the transport strategy and all the other policies.

Greater Manchester council has been extremely effective in generating jobs, and its efforts would have been greatly enhanced by some support from the Government. We heard the Secretary of State's announcement about intermediate status. This is an extremely divisive policy, in that it has included parts of Greater Manchester with the highest unemployment, but has excluded the land on which jobs could be created for those who live in areas of high unemployment. Above all, we do not want increased competition among the 10 boroughs of Greater Manchester, with each bidding to attract firms that will bring jobs to their areas rather than trying to impose an overall strategy to ensure that jobs are created where they are most needed. It would be better if the Government left Greater Manchester council as it is so that it can continue its co-ordinating role in the creation of new jobs.

Most people believe that a large urban area such as Greater Manchester has little countryside, but the council has regenerated the river valleys as lungs for the community. I developed that point on Second Reading, so I shall not say much about it now. I hope that the Minister will give us a categorical assurance that under the new proposals we can maintain and expand the leisure use of the river valleys in Greater Manchester. At present, the council employs about six people to look after footpaths. I do not know how one could divide six people between 10 authorities and retain an effective service. It seems to me that it is virtually impossible to make economies.

I could argue the case that the police and the fire service should remain under local democratic control, but that point has already been covered. Instead, I shall deal with a matter which has not received sufficient attention—consumer protection. I believe that Greater Manchester has been extremely effective in dealing with consumer protection. For example, one officer in Greater Manchester has the expertise to deal with the carcases of animals which die as a result of anthrax. I am not sure whether a system could be established to deal with such diseases throughout Greater Manchester.

An attractive feature of the Greater Manchester conurbation is its open markets. The vast majority of the traders in the open markets set very high standards for the goods that they sell. However, a small minority of traders do not conform to the trading standards. One of the attractions of the Greater Manchester consumer protection service is that it provides an opportunity to catch up with the small number of unscrupulous traders who move from one market to another. If those duties are handed back to the districts, it will be very difficult for them to chase after a market trader who is at Denton on one day of the week, at Hyde the next day and at Oldham the following week. It would be far more efficient if trading standards could be dealt with by one authority which would be able to test a sample for safety and examine whether it conformed to trading standards. If necessary, it could enforce its decision throughout the district.

The Government's argument is that Greater Manchester and the other metropolitan counties do not have sufficient work to do. I could give the Secretary of State a very long list of services—in particular the health services—which an authority like Greater Manchester could co-ordinate and for which it would be accountable to local people.

I have, I hope, made the point that the Government ought to look separately at each district. When they are able to put forward proposals which are relevant to the problems of each district, they can begin to think about evolution and something better. The metropolitan counties ought not to be abolished. We need a structure which takes into account the local needs of each of the six districts. The Government should take the Bill away and not inflict it upon the electorate of the six metropolitan counties.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I have listened to the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that the metropolitan county councils should not be abolished. His argument is that a further period of investigation is needed. The hon. Member believes that there should possibly be a Royal Commission to carry out an in-depth investigation into the advantages or disadvantages of abolishing the metropolitan county councils. The hon. Member couples that argument with the view that progress towards a regional authority is the way forward.

There may be merit in re-examining the case for direct democratic involvement on a regional scale in water authorities and health services. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman's argument that the metropolitan county councils, together with the Greater London council, should not be abolished is valid. We argued at length about the proposals contained in the Redcliffe-Maud report. At that time I resided in the royal county borough of Solihull. My opinion then is, I am sure, the opinion which is held today in Solihull—that having struggled for many years to become an independent, self-governing local authority the prospect of a second-tier authority acting like a great grey blanket over it is not viewed with enthusiasm. On the contrary, they look forward to more, not less authority.

I need hardly add that the view of neighbouring Birmingham is exactly the same — but more so. Birmingham is the second city of this country. Over scores of years it has developed into the powerhouse of the nation and has taken on major local government roles in the conduct of its affairs. For many years the city fathers of the council were able to govern the city with a degree of independence which they relished and cherished. Every citizen of Birmingham looked to Birmingham for the maintenance of local amenities. There was no question of looking anywhere else. The citizens of Birmingham looked to the town hall from which emanated every local by-law and regulation. When one voted for a councillor, one voted for a person, of whichever political party, who had complete power. He did not carry out half a job. That is what we now elect councillors to do. There is a conflict in terms of local government interest. When a road development scheme is announced local people do not know who is responsible for it. Some people believe that they should approach their district council member. Others believe that they should approach their county council member.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: It is the Secretary of State who is responsible for major road schemes.

Mr. King: Indeed. When local people object to a road scheme, they have to go to their elected members, but they do not know to which elected member they should go. There are at least three elected members, including their Member of Parliament, whom they might approach. I do not believe that that is a very good form of democratic control.

Mr. Allan Roberts: To which elected member will the hon. Member's constituents go when they have points to raise about the services provided by the quangos which are to be created by the Bill? And to which elected member will the hon. Member's constituents go when they want to ask a question about their water authority?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Member for mentioning that matter. I acknowledge that there are difficulties over local water authorities. The answer to the other point is very simple: local people can go to their elected members in the normal way.

I come to the point about the abolition of the metropolitan counties being a last-minute addition to the Conservative party manifesto. Many local authorities, including Birmingham, said that they ought to be abolished a decade or so ago—almost the day after the metropolitan counties came into being. The late Sir Frank Griffin, a notable city leader, said at countless numbers of Conservative party conferences and local authority meetings that the new system of local government was suspect and had been found wanting and that the city of Birmingham must get back the authority which it had lost. To our great regret, we were unable, despite a great deal of pressure, to have such a commitment included in the Conservative party's general election manifesto. However, since then we have been fortunate enough to obtain its inclusion. It was not a last-minute addition to the Conservative party manifesto. Anybody who has taken the time to study the discussions at Conservative party conferences and the innumerable pamphlets issued by the Conservative party would realise that our intention to abolish the metropolitan counties was a major commitment. Local government reform in the early 1970s never got it right. It was a very poor alternative. The present form of local government leads to more delay instead of more control.

Decision-making over planning, roads and other matters always seems to result in conflict between the county council and district authorities. For example, the West Midlands county council is responsible for gritting major trunk roads, but the district authorities are responsible for the side roads. There has been a failure to compromise, which has led to extra costs.

Even the Labour party, certainly in the west midlands, did not want the metropolitan counties. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said that he would not raise a single digit to save the west midlands authority. I suspect that many of his hon. Friends, certainly from Birmingham, are probably ready to follow his example.

The arrangements in the Bill for district authorities to regain powers may leave something to be desired, but the Bill is only a first step. If district authorities feel that they could take on extra powers within a year or so, they will be free to ask the Government for those powers.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that similar statements were made by the Minister for Local Government about Coventry city council and that the Minister has had to apologise and withdraw his statements because they were erroneous?

Mr. King: I assume that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the fact that Coventry wants the West Midlands county council to remain in existence.

Mr. Park: The hon. Gentleman should not make any assumptions; he should study his brief.

Mr. King: Much reference has been made to the proposed joint boards being quangos. In fact, they will be made up of elected members of constituent authorities. There is a precedent for that, because, even before the setting up of the met counties, the passenger transport authorities were established. They seem to work well and there seems to be no danger in going back to a similar system.

If a member of the public has a complaint about the West Midlands passenger transport authority when it is controlled by a joint board, he will go to his local councillor who will make representations to the constituent authority's representative on the board. There will be no major change in the operation of the system. There will be the same accountability.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): If a person wishes to approach his councillor, he can usually find out who he is from the local library. The councillor will be directly accountable to his constituent through the ballot box. However, if the councillor representing the district council on the joint board comes from a ward that is several miles away, there will be little relationship between him and a constituent in another ward. The councillor will have no reason to care whether that voter supports him or opposes him on an issue.

Mr. King: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, but if there is the correct dialogue running between a community and its elected members there should be no difficulty in ensuring that all points of view are put across in the running of organisations that will be controlled by joint boards.

Mr. Cowans: How will we operate the system with residuary bodies?

Mr. King: Did the hon. Gentleman say "residuary bodies"?

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The hon. Gentleman should read the Bill before he comes here.

Mr. King: I have read the Bill carefully. I am explaining how the joint boards will operate.

There are clear indications that the passenger transport undertakings will be subject to a further review. A Bill to be introduced soon will reorganise those undertakings, many of which are run on a countrywide basis. They may be returned to more local control and we may have smaller undertakings. That would be a satisfactory arrangement.

Mr. Fatchett: The hon. Gentleman spoke with some feeling about the water authorities and the difficulties involved in making representations to them. Clause 54 provides that each of the residuary bodies

"shall consist of not less than five and not more than ten members appointed by the Secretary of State".

That reminds me a little of a water authority. If the hon. Gentleman had looked at clause 54, would he not have some hesitation about approving of residuary bodies?

Mr. King: The abolition of the met counties will involve a substantial period of change and the arrangements for handing back responsibilities to district authorities are not as satisfactory as I should like. I hope that eventually the district authorities will be given a lot more control.

Mr. Fatchett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: No. Other hon. Members wish to speak. I have already given way several times.

Responsibility for the police, consumer protection and waste disposal has been the subject of joint community agreement in the past and there is no reason why that should not happen again. However, local authorities will be able to make representations to the Government if they wish to take over responsibility for the police and perhaps for the fire service.

The new arrangements will present an opportunity of which Birmingham city council would like to take advantage. The seven authorities that will take over the responsibilities of the met county will work with the west midlands county police and generally disapprove of the existing police set-up because it is big and unwieldy, stretching, as it does, from Wolverhampton to Coventry.

In theory, it would be possible for all seven authorities to make representations to be given individual police forces, but such an arrangement would not be practical. The chief constable has already worked out a satisfactory arrangement that might be concluded quickly. Birmingham city council would take responsibility for its local police, Coventry and Solihull would go back into the Warwickshire county police area and the rest of the black country area would form a separate police authority. There would be much more local control over the police force. That is what the Bill is all about. We shall not get that arrangement straightaway, but we look forward to having such a scheme implemented in due course.

Mr. Boyes: That is not in the Bill.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Government have taken delivery of the case that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) is making and it will no doubt come forward in due course. Provision is made in the Bill, subject to the conditions that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has repeated on many occasions. It would be open to the local authorities concerned to put forward such a redistribution proposal to the Government, and we would be bound to consider it. When the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) says that it is not in the Bill, he is wrong.

Mr. King: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. I recall that yesterday my right hon. Friend made that point when he was challenged about failing to discuss the Bill in its preparatory stages. The city of Birmingham and some of the constituent authorities in the west midlands made representations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State asking whether this could be considered at the same time as abolition. Such was my right hon. Friend's willingness to consult and discuss that the concession was put into the Bill for which we are extremely grateful.

The ironic thing about the city of Birmingham is that we are not abolishing a Labour authority so that control can pass to a city authority under Conservative control. Instead, we shall be abolishing a Labour-controlled metropolitan county to give great authority to a Labour-controlled city council. Notwithstanding the perils that that might mean for those of us who live in the area, we prefer to pass authority back to one elected authority, because then we shall know who to hold to account for future legislation, costs and development in the area. In the history of Birmingham, the creation of the West Midlands county council cannot be looked on with a great deal of enthusiasm. About a year ago, the citizens of the area, over 1 million of whom reside in Birmingham, were enthusiastically in favour of abolition of the county council. Since then, a campaign, set up by the county councils in legion with the GLC, has been pouring out disinformation, at great cost to the local ratepayer. It has been saying that the Government are seeking to run local authorities from Whitehall, and that the city of Birmingham will have existing powers taken from it rather than having powers returned to it. A basic reading of the proposals shows that this is blatantly untrue. Local democracy will be better served by the implementation of the Bill.

Mr. Boyes: I have asked the Secretary of State about 50 times what his view on this matter is, and he has never given me a straightforward answer. Therefore, it is interesting to note that when I just whispered to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), the Secretary of State heard what I said, and jumped up to reply. I was trying to say to my hon. Friend that what is not in the Bill is that the functions that will be handed over to quangos should be given back to local authorities. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) seems to be arguing as though local authorities will take over the functions of the quangos, but if the Government have their way these powers will be with quangos until the Labour party gets back into power in the next two or three years and destroys the quangos.

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening to what I have been saying. Let us take the example of passenger transport authorities. It may be that the Bill does not categorically say that control of them will be handed back to the local authorities, but there will soon be a Bill which will give local authorities the right to run their own transport authorities if they want to—the decision will be theirs. I cannot imagine anything more democratic than giving local authorities the right to run local transport if they so wish. They may not want to, but the choice is theirs. The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) must not run away with the idea that the Bill is the be-all and end-all. It has to be looked at in conjunction with other pending legislation, which will continue to give more democratic control back to the local authorities if they wish it.

There is no doubt that the people of the city of Birmingham, Solihull and, I suspect, the people of Coventry, who are brave and courageous, as their history has shown, have litle in common with the people of Birmingham, Wolverhampton and Walsall, whatever the geography of or the borders of the counties say. They will welcome the return to their town halls of as much local authority control over their affairs as possible. They look forward over the years to having more authority passed over to them through our policy of decentralisation. To ask, as this amendment does, for yet further investigations and delay before this process can be put into practice is a betrayal of our citizens.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) about giving the control of transport back to local authorities are extraordinary for a Member who spent much of the last Session of Parliament voting to take control of the Greater London transport system away from the GLC and to give it to a Government-appointed body. That is an extraordinary inconsistency, but this is a debate for those who wish to be inconsistent, as it started with a muddled amendment moved by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). The Opposition intend to abstain on this amendment because we are opposed to the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils and we can express that easily by voting against the abolition of all those authorities in the course of the debates on clause 1.

When it was pointed out to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey that this is a muddled amendment, he took some of my hon. Friends to task by trying to give them a lecture on procedure, so I shall reciprocate. I have spent three mornings sitting in the Committee on the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Bill. It was a Committee to which the hon. Gentleman had been appointed, as he has an urban development corporation on the edge of his constituency. It is a pity that, during the three Committee sittings, he was not able to get to the Committee room. Three reasons why he could not get there have been suggested. One is that he cannot get a taxi, but I do not know whether there is any truth in that suggestion. The second is that the cards telling hon. Members to go on the Committee have no street names on them. They say, "House of Commons, Room No. 11", and not "Parliament Street" or "Parliament Square", so perhaps he has not been able to find his way. The third is that, as there were two hon. Members with the name of Hughes on the Committee, he was a little confused.

I point out to the hon. Gentleman, as he gave us a lesson in procedure, that this is not the end of the Committee stage. After this there will be a Committee stage upstairs. When the hon. Gentleman gets the card appointing him to be a member of that Committee, will he please go along and help in the preservation of the GLC, for which he was arguing yesterday? Last night, he was arguing against the abolition of the GLC, and he moved amendments to that effect. However, the effect of the amendment that he has moved today is to allow the abolition of the GLC and the preservation of the metropolitan counties. I quote what he said last night from a photocopy of Hansard, as that part of it has not been printed. He said:

> "The amendment would delete the GLC from the list of councils that the Government propose to abolish. The effect of all the amendments would be to ensure the continuance of directly-elected government for London across London. We seek to do no less than to take the heart out of the Bill."—[Official Report, 12 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 1153.]

Last night, the burden of the hon. Gentleman's remarks was that he intended to save the GLC. Today, the burden of his amendment is that he is in favour of the abolition of the GLC but of the preservation of the metropolitan counties. His arguments remind me of the sweet counters at Woolworths called "pick and choose". One can pick what one likes, chew it and if one does not like it spit it out again. It is not that the hon. Gentleman is deliberately confused. He wants a range of options that will be suitable for the alliance of the Liberal party and the SDP. This will enable its members to take their choice, and will please all people. It will allow for those who argue that instead of abolition there should be a form of evolution. It will allow for dissent by the hon. Members for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) who are in favour of the abolition of the metropolitan counties, and it will enable the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey to make out a different case. Despite the fact that before the general election his party was arguing for the abolition of the GLC, to be replaced by a regional authority, last night he was putting the opposite case.

Will the abolition of the metropolitan counties bring about a form of unitary government in the metropolitan areas? That seemed to be the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Northfield. He seemed to think that there would be a return to some form of unitary local government in his part of the country, but of course no such thing will happen. The effect of the Bill will not be to have a single tier of functions, performed by one authority. The effect of abolishing the metropolitan counties will be to have one set of functions carried out by a directly elected district authority and another set of functions that runs across the areas of the metropolitan counties.

There will be two-tier government, but it will not be two-tier democratic government as between the two sets of functions — [Interruption.] The Secretary of State mutters. I know that he has told the House before that the joint boards will be composed of elected members of the district authorities. I know that that is his argument. He apparently argues that there is a sort of secondary democracy, in that the representatives will be chosen by the district councils. But that is not in the Bill.

Those representatives will not be chosen in the sense that they will be elected by the district councils. Clause 22 says that they will be appointed by the district councils. There is a great difference there. I am against secondary democracy, but regardless of that there is a great difference between people being elected from among district councillors and people being appointed by them.
